allowed to report on current events, but their experience is not available in discussing policy. There are in London several men and women who know the country intimately. They may write or speak or agitate, but, knowing nothing of the detailed proposals of a reform under consideration, their experience and enthusiasm are wasted. The Persian clauses of the Anglo-Russian Agreement afford another instance of the need of some better machinery for taking counsel at the Foreign Office. It is hardly credible that Sir Edward Grey can have realised what immense concessions he was making when he drew the line defining the Russian sphere of influence. Travellers, traders, and geographers rushed into print with their criticisms when once the Treaty was published. That sort of criticism, however valuable and well-informed it may be, is not available until a mistake is consummated.

Alike on the ground of democracy and efficiency, there is a case for the provision of some machinery for control and consultation. Without it there is no security that a Foreign Minister is fairly representing the opinion, either of the country or of his own party, and little probability that he can command the best expert advice. In no other constitutional country is Parliament content with a rôle so subordinate, and in no other is there a two-party system which makes it difficult for Parliament to exercise rights which it does possess. Treaties like that of alliance with Japan, may be signed without any preliminary discussion, though they might commit us some years hence to a disastrous and unpopular war. Even if they could be discussed, Parliament would not express its opinion freely if the fate of the Government and the issue between Free Trade and Protection turned on its vote. The remedy lies, we think, not in the extension of the direct powers of the House of Commons, but rather in the creation of some small representative body which can co-operate with the Foreign Secretary. A committee of experts like that of the India Office would not have a right to speak for public opinion; a committee of the Privy Council would not be likely to possess exceptional competence. The better plan would be, we think, to imitate the precedents of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the French Chamber, the Austro-Hungarian Delegations, and the United States Senate Committee. A small standing committee of the House of Commons, representing its shades of opinion, including, as it doubtless would, several students and experts, would very soon acquire the necessary knowledge. Pledged to secrecy, entitled to call for confidential papers, accustomed to debate questions minutely and intimately, and empowered, if necessary, to summon expert advice, it would make for efficiency, and secure due weight to instructed public opinion. If it had the right to submit any issue in the last resort to the arbitrament of the whole House, it would be unnecessary to define its powers minutely. The proposal is not new, but the case for its consideration was never stronger than at present. Parliament, over-driven, and absorbed in domestic problems, has not the time, even if it had the right, to make its nominal control a reality. Outside it, there is none the less, especially among Liberals, a growing uneasiness and an increasing volume of criticism, which is impotent and ineffective, because it is at once uninformed and irresponsible. A Liberal administration, eager to make popular government a reality, cannot afford to neglect the opportunity of providing some permanent machinery for the control of foreign affairs.

Life and Letters.

THE MOTHER.

SHE walked as though pressed for time, slipping like a shadow along the railings of the houses. With her skimpy figure, in the shabby wisp of its black dress, she did not look like the mother of six sons. She had beneath her arm the little bundle which she always carried to and from the houses where she worked. Her face, with tired brown eyes, and hair as black and fine as silk under the hard black sailor hat, was skimpy, too; and, all creased and angled like her figure, seemed to deny that life had ever left her strength for bearing man into the world.

Though not yet nine o'clock, she had already done the work of her two-roomed home: lighted the fire, washed the youngest boys, given all four their breakfast, swept the rooms, made one bed—in the other her husband was still lying—and to that husband she had served his tea. She had cut the midday ration of the two eldest boys, and wrapping it in paper had placed it on the window-sill in readiness for them to take to school; she had portioned out the firing for the day, given the eldest boy the pence to buy the daily screws of tea and sugar, washed some ragged cloths, mended a pair of little trousers, put on her hat without consulting the cracked looking-glass, and hurried forth. And since a penny was important to her, she had walked.

Having taken off the black straw hat, and changed the black and scanty dress for a blue linen frock which nearly hid her broken boots, worn to the thickness of a paper sheet, she was deemed ready to begin her labours. And while on her knees she scrubbed and polished, a certain sense of pleasurable rest would come to her; gazing into the depths of brass that she had made to shine, she thought of nothing. On some mornings, like this morning, she worked a little stiffly. This was when her husband, a plain-spoken, single-minded man, returning from some late discussion at his Club, "The Jolly Bush," had struck her with his belt, to show he was her master. On such mornings she was longer polishing the brass, often forced to clean it twice, having put her eyes too close to it. And her thoughts would run: "He didn't ought to hit me, he didn't ought to treat me like he does, and me the mother of his children." Thus far her thoughts would run, but—she was a simple soul—they ran no further; nor did it ever penetrate her mind that her six sons would be able too, some day, to beat their wives, by virtue of the sex that she had given them. But soon, because these things had happened to her many dozen times, she would stop brooding, and over the mirroring brass, that gave queer breadth and roundness to her face, would once more think of nothing.

Down in the kitchen, where she had her dinner, she never mentioned such unpleasant incidents, for fear that they might harm her reputation. She talked, in fact, but little, not having much to talk of that would do her good in a social way of speaking. But every now and then something would break within her, and she would pour out, in monotone, an epic on her sons; as though, in spite of everything, she felt that to have borne them was a credit. In consequence of these outpourings, which came not less than once a week, it was usual to regard her as an incorrigible talker.

In the afternoon, though she no longer polished brass, she polished other things. She left at six o'clock. Then, in the dusk, once more attired in black, she slipped along the railings of the houses, still hurrying, more like a shadow even than before. In one of her reddened hands—hands of which, holding them out before some fellow-woman whose soft, ringed fingers she admired, she would say apologetically: "I've got such dreadful 'ands, M'm"—in one of those red, roughened hands she grasped some little extra wrapped in newspaper, in the other the money she had earned.

She crossed the High Street, and diving down a dim and narrow alley, made a purchase at a shop, and hurried on. Entering her door, she tried to tell, by listening, whether her husband had returned; this she always did, although it made no difference to her going up, since in any case her sons were there and waiting to be fed. Silently passing up the narrow stairs, whose noticeable odour she did not notice, she entered the front room. Her husband was not in, but her four sons, their eyes fixed on the door, sat or sprawled about the bed, teasing each other angrily, like young birds waiting for a meal. Taking off her hat, she sat down to rest. But seeing her thus sitting, doing nothing, her four sons tried to rouse her to activity. They pulled her by the sleeve, and jogged her chair, and the youngest kissed her with his little dirty mouth. Rising, she began to peel potatoes. She peeled them fast, working the up-turned knife-blade close to her thin bosom, and round her the four sons, affecting not to care, now that they saw her working, resumed their restless teasing of each other, casting impatient glances at the busy knife-blade, the falling yellow slips of peel. But suddenly the knife ceased working, the voices of the four sons died away; a heavy step was heard, it was their father coming in. He wore an old green overcoat, a muffler, and heavy boots; from his loose lower lip a stump of cigarette was hanging; his face, whiter than a fish's belly, wore a jeering smile. He sat down on the bed, and in the corners of the room his four sons held their tongues, knowing him for what he was, a strong and single-minded man. He spoke:

"I seen a sight!" he said. "Don't want no bloomin' theatres when I can see a sight like wot I seen to-day."

For answer came the sound of potatoes being peeled.

"'Ear wot I say?"

The sound of peeling stopped.

"Best joke I ever see! All the women in London walkin' in the rain, arskin' for the vote."

The sound of peeling rose again.

"'Ear wot I say? The vote! No goin' out for me this evenin'. A man's got to stay at 'ome it seems, an' see 'is wife don't go disgracin' of 'erself."

In the dim light of a single tallow candle the mother's face was scarcely visible above the moving knife-blade.

"A pretty game to let 'em walk about the streets like that! Woman in 'er place, there's nothin' to be said to that; but when she goes forgettin' of 'erself, well—kick her's what I say! Lucky for you you ain't that sort! What's woman ever done to earn the vote?"

The four sons, perceiving that their father's humour did not apply to them, began to fidget nearer to the table. But the chipping of the knife had ceased; in place of it the mother's voice was heard.

"Let the women be!"

The father leered. "I arsk you straight—what's women ever done to earn the vote? What's women ever done to put 'em up 'longside o' men? Answer me that!"

"They brought you into th' world—that's what they done!"

Hearing these unexpected words the father rose, and peered across the table at the mother's face, and what he saw amazed and angered him. Her meagre cheeks were red, her eyes looked swollen, her lips were one thin bloodless line.

"Brought me into the world—did they? You'd better look out what you're a-sayin'!"

Clutched in the mother's roughened hand the knife-blade shook, then fell with a clatter on the basin.

"The carryin' and the bearin' and the bringin' up; isn't that nothin'? Don't I know—that's borne six?" Panting for breath, she stopped.

"Ho! You claim all the credit? 'Adn't I nothin' to say to it, then? Wot about me?"

From the mother's lips broke forth these sounds:

"You! You 'ad the pleasure, you 'ad the pleasure! You! They never gev you a minute's pain. They never tore you; they never dragged the life out o' you! The pleasure—that's all you 'ad. The pain's what come to me!"

A look of hurt amazement on the father's face changed slowly to a furious resentment. He muttered in a queer, hoarse voice: "Pleasure, 'ad I; pain, 'ad you?" And slowly, tremblingly, undid his belt.

"Pain? 'Ad you? Then there, and there, and there; there's pain for you; and 'ere's a vote, an' 'ere's another, an' some on top o' that!" And, with the upraised belt he covered her with blows. "Pleasure, 'ad I?—that'll learn you to see what gives the vote! That'll learn you a woman's place. Pain, 'ad you? 'Ere's pain for you!"

The four sons watching from their corners cowered, and the youngest whimpered. The father flung aside his belt, and sitting down before the fire, stared into it.

"Stow that noise!" he muttered in a thick, uncertain voice; "you deserved the lot, an' more! Pleasure! 'ad I? Don't you ever tell me that again!"

From the bed the woman's strangled sobs arose, and from the hearth the man's thick breathing; for a long time there was no other sound. Then, creeping from their corners the two youngest sons began pulling at their mother's dress. They tugged and tugged, and their eyes were fixed upon the table.

Rising, she wiped her sleeve across her face, and took up a potato; blindly, feeling for the right place with the knife, she began to peel it.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

MAN AND HIS MICROBES.

HOWEVER considerable the services of biology to man through the practical arts of medicine and surgery, it is idle to disguise the fact that its net intellectual and moral influence upon the popular mind has been depressing and disillusioning. It took a long time for the "Descent of Man" to make its full meaning felt. Hitherto, through all the ages, man had been absolutely severed from Nature in all matters of essential importance. His life had been a texture of infinite mystery and romance, upon which the speculators of religion and philosophy wove alluring patterns. In vain did Darwin and Huxley protest that the new biological interpretation of human history was not degrading man, that it left open vistas of human progress no less magnificent because they came in the due course of an inevitable natural sequence. Man was now in origin and essence an animal, not a spiritual being; not only his body, but the thing he called his "soul" was composed for him during the vast aeons of his brute ancestry. The materials and beginnings of his noblest spiritual impulses and emotions were laid in pre-human experiences; the liberty of will and rationality which hitherto were claimed as his unique and priceless endowments were cancelled or reduced to trivial proportions by the dominating part assigned to his animal past. A marvellous, a glorified brute, but still a brute, and like a brute to perish! This is in essence the lesson modern biology has taught, in spite of the efforts of men like Huxley, Mivart, and Wallace in their several ways, to disentangle the spiritual life and the ethical process from the main stream of purely physical causation.

There is, for this reason, something peculiarly pathetic in the efforts of great humane men of science, such as Virchow, Haeckel, and Metchnikoff to construct, through bacteriology and its related hygiene, an improved and elongated human life which shall be some sort of substitute for what is to them a vain illusion of personal immortality. In reply to the demands which the common people make upon men of science for a larger and a better life, such men as Metchnikoff feel that no satisfactory answer is given by pointing to the triumph achieved by mechanics, physics, chemistry, over the material environment of man, so long as so little has yet been done to improve the constitution of man itself. Perhaps the popular mind, haunted by dim memories of ages of scientific search for an "Elixir Vitæ," is unduly exigent, in its half-conscious demand that biology shall destroy disease and banish death. Is man's normal life necessarily limited to fourscore years or so, the last decade dragged out in the growing misery of senile decay, with a dismal shadow of impending dissolution darkening his spirit, while painful diseases ravage his digestion and atrophy his mental powers?

To this great question Professor Metchnikoff gave an optimistic answer in his work on "The Nature of Man," a translation of which appeared in this country four years ago, and now in his new book "The Prolongation of Life" (Heinemann) he enlarges further on his important thesis. The notion that some absolute limit is set upon the term of human life, by the duration of infancy, or of the time required for full growth of bodily structure, he dismisses as an unsupported a priori hypothesis. We cannot, indeed, hope to secure for man the genuine immortality which is claimed for the infusoria and other unicellular organisms, and which attaches to the reproductive cells alone among higher organisms; but an understanding of the degenerative processes which, apart from all accidents, bring man to senility and death, may render the greatest of all services—the delivery from an unnatural old age and a premature decease. For Professor Metchnikoff labours, by many instances, to prove that old men, far from being gradually reconciled to their end as they approach it, shrink from it with increasing fear, desiring to live and not to die. Old men, he insists, are more optimistic than the young in clinging to life. This lack of resignation is not merely an evil of old age, but, in his judgment, a convincing testimony to the fact that the full span of human life is seldom reached. The human structure and its functions he finds to be beset by "disharmonies," the product of an incomplete attempt of the organism to readjust itself to the changing conditions of its environment through its passage from pre-human to savage and civilised conditions of life.

One of these "disharmonies" is the failure of the actual normal life of man to attain that final lap in which the instinct for life would gradually and peacefully give way to the instinct for death. The ideal of human life which biology should set before itself is "orthobiosis"—that is to say, the development of the human life so that it passes through a long period of old age in active and vigorous health, leading to a final period in which there shall be present a sense of satiety of life and a wish for death. How is orthobiosis to be achieved? To a bacteriologist there is only one sort of reply possible. For to him the struggle for life, as civilisation advances, becomes more and more a struggle between opposed hordes and species of bacilli. Every man has in his body a battleground of contending races, destructive or defensive microbes. Nay, the struggle between higher and lower, tropical and temperate races, which plays so dominating a part in the wider world history, becomes less and less a fight fought with knives and guns, more and more a fight fought with novel orders of bacilli. The power of man to survive and to secure for himself a safe, healthy, and happy life, is recognised more and more to depend upon the organised application of his reason to outwit the evolutionary adjustments of the parasitic microbes which everywhere, in order to achieve their private ends, seek to compass his downfall.

The problem of prolonging life Metchnikoff conceives entirely in these terms. Senile atrophy and decay are, in fact, confined to the higher vertebrates; they are directly due to the destruction of the brain cells and other higher elements of the organism by a species of mobile cells, called macro-phags. Systems enfeebled by the inroads of alcohol or syphilis can offer little resistance to these devastations, but a healthy life conducted on careful diet, strengthening the resistance of the protective micro-phags, and retarding the growth of the devouring macrophags, will arrest the process of decay to an apparently indefinite extent. That peace and consolation which religions and philosophies have been powerless to bestow is to be procured by the correct infusion of proper quantities of lactic acid. Such is the contribution which biology can make to the solution of one of the greatest human problems.

Far be it from us to question the far-reaching value of those dietetic analyses which are beginning to transform the habits of living among whole sections of the more educated classes. There is no doubt a solid sense embodied in the saying, "Man ist was er isst." But we cannot help thinking that it furnishes a rather narrow basis on which to build a practical philosophy of life. Can we really interpret the whole complex evolution of individual and social life in terms of food and sex—that is, as a process purely concerned with the physical survival and growth of individuals and species? The fundamental deficiency of such treatment, in our judgment, is strikingly illustrated in this volume by the curious attempt of Metchnikoff to express the genius and career of Goethe in terms of sexual energy, and to explain the baffling perplexities of the second part of "Faust," by reference to the amorous experiences of its author. We have here, in truth, a reductio ad absurdum of the biological interpretation of history which carries with it its own refutation. That there is so much unity in personal life that every strong experience makes its impress upon thought and character, and so is a factor in every typical achievement, is undeniable. But to leap from this to the conclusion that nothing counts in life that is not definitely physiological is an utterly unwarranted assertion of the claims of biology to swallow up psychology and sociology, and to usurp the seat of authority assigned, among or above the sciences, to philosophy. In every scientific explanation of vital processes an equal claim must be put in for the spiritual interpretation of process, not as a sundering of the universe into two antagonistic facts or forces, but as an integral factor in the operative energy. If bacteria do play this determinant part in the ferments which issue in physical growth and degeneration, we need a spiritual bacteriology before we can safely pronounce upon the vital meaning and the manner of the changes. The division of labour rightly required for the physical laboratory needs to be repaired and set in the unity of psycho-physics before it can shed serviceable light upon the conduct of individual or social life. It may be a most excellent thing to drink sour milk, as Metchnikoff insists we ought to do, in order to stifle the energy of hostile phagocytes; but if we are to cultivate a profitable, or even an endurable, old age, it would be well to add some other sort of prophylactic against the spiritual bacilli of unfulfilled hopes, fading memories, and vanished friends, which certainly impair, if they do not overwhelm, the optimism that Metchnikoff holds to be the natural heritage of a ripe old age.

THE ENGLISH RACE.

THE spirit or temper or mettle, not of an individual but of a whole people, offers a problem as fascinating as it is difficult of solution. We are familiar with the "composite photograph" in which thousands of superimposed likenesses result in the elimination of personal variants, the production of a norm or type. What of a mental or moral "composite photograph" showing the average sentiment, the average emotion, the average religion? Here is a field of investigation far more familiar in Europe, where introspection is regarded as a virtue, than in England, where introspection is regarded as a disease. And most attempts at the analysis of the English character have come from the European resident or voyager. Until in books translated from the French, like that of Mr. Boutmy, or from the German, like that of Dr. Karl Peters, the Englishman learns with amazement that he presents this aspect to one or over, that to another. His sentiments are like that of the savage who is suddenly confronted with the looking-glass; or, rather (since he is convinced that all these impressions are distorted or prejudiced), like the crowd which constantly gathers before the shop windows that present convex or concave mirrors—for the pleasure of seeing their natural faces hideously elongated or foreshortened. Yet we are compelled to read such books. We are compelled to read all such books. Even as a result of such unfair description we acknowledge the stimulus and challenge which such description affords. We cannot help being interested in ourselves.

Mr. Hueffer is the latest adventurer into these hazardous fields. In "The Spirit of the People" (Alston Rivers) he has set himself to disentangle from the skein some continuous threads of national character. He calls himself a foreigner. He seems to derive some pleasure from the picture of himself as a looker-on, gazing with some bewilderment and some admiration at the antics of this engaging people. But, as, in his views, all the English race are foreigners, spewed out by Europe upon these little islands on the way to the Western Land of Promise, his particular claim to isolation would seem to be unwarranted. At least, he has remained in the heart of the English countryside, in that particular corner of it where the secret of its ancient strength and character most securely abides. Where those little red-roofed cities of Rye and Winchelsea rise on their tiny hills out of the encompassing marshes, between the English Channel and the good Sussex Lands: there the visiting stranger can feel in the very earth and air some abiding impression of England. And it will be evident to even the superficial reader how much this survival of old things—the old English service in the old English village church, the labourer in the fields at noon-tide or evening, the mere historical proclamation of a great and splendid past—have coloured all his large estimates of present changes. He attempts, from incidents of rest or wandering, to understand the characteristics of the race. His attempt is weakened by two deficiencies, which, indeed, are common to all outside observers. He has never seen England in adversity: beaten to the knees or to the ground. He can never understand what spirit—either of resistance or acquiescence—latent in this kindly, lazy, good-natured people might be evoked by so elemental a challenge. England is sharply contrasted with Ireland. But what spirit or temper would be excited amongst the English people if they had been subjugated by an alien conqueror, with their lands dispossessed, their religion penalised, their national ideals everywhere confronted with opposition or disdain? Such an experience might have been stamped upon history if the Armada had reached these shores; it might have "staggered humanity" with unforgettable memories.

In the second place, he knows nothing about the great multitude of the people who inhabit these islands. In this he is no less fortunate than others. No one knows anything of the great multitude of the people who inhabit these islands. They produce no authors, they edit no newspapers, they find no vocal expression for their sentiments and desires. Their very leaders are either chosen from another class, or, from the very fact of leadership, sharply distinguished from the members of their own. They are never articulate except in times of exceptional excitement, in depression, when trade is bad, in exuberance, when, as on the Mafeking nights, they suddenly appear from nowhere to take possession of the City. England, for the home and foreign observer, is the tone and temper which the ideals and determinations of the middle class have stamped upon the vision of an astonished Europe. It is the middle class which stands for England in Mr. Hueffer's analysis. It is the middle class which is slowly losing its religion—as in his experience of a neighbour who, after a late evening service, suddenly discovered that he no longer believed in the immortality of the soul. It is the middle class whose inexhaustible patience fills him with admiration and amazement as he beholds them waiting in the fog at a London terminus for three hours beyond the advertised time, and then raising a cheer, half joyful, half ironical, when the melancholy train at last emerges from the darkness. And it is the middle class which has preserved under all its security and prosperity that elemental unrest which Mr. Hueffer identifies as an inheritance from an ancestry of criminals and adventurers: which drives them out from many a quiet vicarage and rose garden into a journey far beyond the sky-line to become the "frontiersmen of all the world."

But below this large kingdom, which for more than half a century has stood for "England," stretches that huge and unexplored region which seems destined in the next half century to demand an increasing and dominant control. It was the class of which

Matthew Arnold, with the agreeable insolence of his published criticisms, declared himself to be the discoverer, and to which he gave the name of the "Populace." "That vast portion of the working-class," he defined it, nearly forty years ago, "which, raw and half-developed, has long been half hidden amid its poverty and squalor, and is now issuing from its hiding-place to assert an Englishman's heaven-born privilege of doing as he likes, and is beginning to perplex us by marching where it likes, meeting where it likes, bending what it likes, breaking what it likes." "To this vast residuum," he adds, "we may with great propriety give the name of Populace." To most observers of the classes above, this is the Deluge; and its achievement of power—if such achievement ever is realised—the coming of the twilight of the gods. They see our civilisation as a little patch of redeemed land in the wilderness; always challenged by the impact of the "jungle," preserved as by a miracle from one decade to another. They behold the influx as in the rush of a bank holiday crowd upon some tranquil garden: tearing up the flowers by the roots, reeling in drunken merriment on the grass plots, strewing the pleasant landscape with torn paper and broken bottles. Mr. Hueffer, though he knows little more of this people than any of us, takes a less tragic view of their possibilities. He is, indeed, in error in some minor respects. He declares that—in the cities—they have lost or are losing their religion. They are not losing their religion, because they have never gained a religion. In the industrial centres of England, since the city first was, the old inherited faiths have never been anything but the carefully preserved treasure of a tiny minority. He praises their sentiment, which his European friends frankly condemn as "sentimentality." He instances a scene which came under his personal notice, when an immense traffic was held up for considerable time because a sheep—on its way to immediate slaughter—was entangled between two tram cars. The whole populace cheerfully submitted to this inconvenience, sooner than consummate the decease of the unfortunate animal. Perhaps another example may afford a more striking instance. In a certain pottery manufactory, the whole apparatus had been arranged for the baking process, and the fires were about to be lighted, when the mewing of a cat was heard from inside the kiln. The men refused to proceed with the work. A whole day was spent in an endeavour to entice the cat out again. This proving fruitless, another day was spent in the unloading of the kiln, in order to rescue the creature. When it had been liberated, it was immediately hurled—with objurgations—into the river. The men were exasperated with the trouble which had been caused; but they could not allow the cat to be roasted alive.

Next to this "sentimentality," so astonishing to Europe—because so irrational—comes the invincible patience of the English workman. He will endure almost anything—in silence—until it becomes unendurable. When he is vocal, it is pretty certain that things have become unendurable. The present writer had occasion a few days ago to visit a family whose two sons were working on the railway. He inquired about the strike. There was an awkward pause in the conversation. "Jim won't have to come out," said the mother, "because he isn't on the regular staff." "Of course Jim will come out," said the father firmly, "if the others come out." "The fact is," they explained, after further silence, "we don't talk about the strike here; we try to forget that there ever may be one." It was the experience of a thousand homes. There was no recognised or felt grievance. There was no clear understanding of the purpose and meaning of it all. But there were firmly printed in the mind two bedrock facts: the one, the tragedy that the strike would mean in this particular household: the other, the complete impossibility of any other choice but of the boys standing with their comrades in the day of decision. And this is England: the England which in Mr. Hueffer's vision has learnt more than all other peoples, the secret of acquiescence, of toleration, of settling down and making the best of things in a world on the whole decent and desirable; but an England also of a determination unshaken by the vicissitudes of purpose and time, with a certain ruthlessness about the means when it has accepted the end, and with a patience which is perhaps more terrible in its silence than the violence of a conspicuous despair.

These and other qualities form an absorbing subject of interest. A figure emerges from it all. It is the figure of an average from which all its great men are definitely variants. No body of men have ever been so "un-English" as the great Englishmen, Nelson, Shelley, Gladstone; supreme in war, in literature, in practical affairs; yet with no single evidence in the characteristics of their energy that they possess any of the qualities of the English blood. But in submitting to the leadership of such perplexing variants from the common stock, the Englishman is merely exhibiting his general capacity for accepting the universe, rather than for protesting against it. His idea of its origin or of its goal has become vague and cloudy; definite statements of such, set out in black and white by the average congregation, would astonish the average preacher. But he drives ahead along the day's work: in pursuing his own business, conquering great empires: gaining them by his power of energy and honesty, losing them by his stiffness and lack of sympathy and inability to learn. So he will continue to the end; occupying, not in Mr. Pinero's bitter gibe the "suburb of the Universe"; but rather that locality whose jolly, stupid, brave denizens may be utilised for every kind of hazardous and unimaginable enterprise; fulfilling the work of another, content to know nothing of the reason of it all; journeying, always, like Columbus, "to new Americas, or whither God wills."

A MAN OF THE PEOPLE.

MR. BRYAN has announced his willingness to accept, in other words has proposed himself for, the Democratic nomination in next year's Presidential Election. It is with no anticipatory leap of welcome that the Democrats have thus heard their doom pronounced. Some of them may be genuinely glad to serve under his banner again, but the majority seem to look upon him much as a Tariff Reformer regards a consignment of "dumped" goods, or an overworked hostess the self-invited guest who cannot be put off. He is their leader more by imposition than by choice. He has already been twice defeated, and America is not the land of "old favourites." His political programme, like George Sand's heart, is a cemetery bestrewn with the headstones of last causes. Three times within the past twelve months has the burial service been read over issues that Mr. Bryan has raised, and has had no political option but to abandon. He seems to be losing his electioneering instinct. Free Silver he has, of course, long since discarded; on Imperialism and the question of the Philippines he has nothing to say to which the American people will listen; and that social protest, which was the true backbone of Bryanism, and made it, indeed, a sort of Chartist movement fighting under the insignia of economics, has found in Mr. Roosevelt a far more effective exponent. Mr. Bryan has had the ill-luck of most pioneers. It was he who blazed the trail for American Radicalism, and in a sense made Mr. Roosevelt possible; and his reward is to find his rival in possession of all the outposts. With his old programme either devitalised or annexed by his opponents, and with no materials on hand for manufacturing a new one, Mr. Bryan can hardly present himself as the most desirable of all candidates. His followers will accept him partly because an uncontested Presidential Election is beyond the American conception; partly because he saves them, at any rate, from Mr. Hearst; and partly because, with whatever shortcomings, he is by far the most prominent man on their side, the only Democrat, indeed, who at all touches the popular imagination, and who is known in the remotest corners of the Union. The American masses have a very kindly feeling for Mr. Bryan. They feel that in the always difficult position of a defeated candidate he has borne himself with real manfulness. After years of unreasonable panegyrics on the one side, and of still more unreasonable disparagement on the other, they have come to a juster estimate both of his politics and his personality. And the politicians, for their part, have learned the lesson of the last Presidential Election. They tried in 1904 to make the Democratic Party attractive by making it "Conservative." But the unanswerable argument of the votes proved that Bryanism at its worst was a more appealing card to play than "Conservatism" at its best. The issue of the campaign was at least as much a victory for Mr. Bryan as for Mr. Roosevelt. It made Mr. Bryan the "logical" candidate for the party at the election of 1908, and while it gives the measure of the weakness of the Democrats that he should be their strongest protagonist, no one doubts that he will be a vast improvement on Judge Parker. He may, indeed, prove formidable enough to compel President Roosevelt to take the field against him.

Mr. Bryan's career has been so far typical of America as to be unimaginable outside of it. A man of six and thirty, whose active life had been divided between an Illinois farm, a law office in Lincoln, Nebraska, and four years in Congress, unknown and wholly without distinction, he was suddenly raised by a flashy and opportune speech delivered before an overwrought Convention, to the leadership of his party. In June, 1896, scarcely any of his countrymen outside his native State had ever heard of him; in November, 1896, six millions of them voted for his election to the Presidency. Not many of them probably understood, or even cared to understand, what precisely was meant by Free Silver, "the parity of the metals," and "the ratio of 16 to 1." But they felt vaguely that things were not right, that wealth was too powerful, Capital too truculent, and Labour overborne and oppressed; and they used Mr. Bryan with his youth, his eloquence, and his dramatic personality, to register their protest. It was his complete identity with the average Western American that gave and still gives Mr. Bryan his strength. He is one with them in training, and thought, and instinctive ways of looking at things; he is what any one of them might be, had they that little extra something—in Mr. Bryan's case rhetoric, and, what Americans dearly prize in a leader, "magnetism"—which in a country where nearly all are on the same intellectual level, is enough to raise even a very average man above his fellows, and give him a commanding authority. One must always bear in mind that while the sum total of American intelligence is undoubtedly impressive, it is more by reason of its quantity than its quality. The educational system of the country has rather raised a great many people to the standard of what in England would be called lower middle-class opinion, than raised the standard itself. While, therefore, one may say that the operative force in English politics is lower middle-class opinion revised and corrected by the best, or almost the best, intelligence of the country, that of American politics is lower middle-class opinion left to its own devices. And lower middle-class opinion, especially when left to its own devices, is a fearsome thing. It marks out the nation over which it has gained control as a willing slave of words, a prey to caprice and unreasoning sentiment, and stamps broadly upon its face the hall-mark of an honestly unconscious parochialism. Such, at least, has been its effect on America. There is no country where a prejudice lives longer, where thought is at once so active and so shallow, where a craze finds greedier acceptance, or where men who are fundamentally commonplace attain to such quaintly authoritative prestige.

Mr. Bryan is the product of these conditions, and eminently qualified to profit by them. He is eloquent, studious, sincere; he has the oratorical presence, and the gift of attracting large masses of men; he is a thoroughly good man, and much too elementary to be either cynical or sophisticated. Since his defeat in 1900, and in the intervals of journalism and lecturing, he has honestly tried to improve his mind. He has travelled all round the world, in an effort to see and weigh things for himself. But the experiment does not seem to have been other than a barren one. What else, indeed, could have been looked for? Travel is pre-eminently one of those experiences of which the intellectual profits are directly proportionate to the contributions of the traveller. Mr. Bryan went abroad as the average Western American, with all the ingenuousness of mind and nature that belongs to the character. As a Western American he returned, having seen everything and understood nothing; and a Western American he remains, undiluted and unbroadened, with the same facile command of sloppy metaphysics, the same faith in the universal applicability of the Declaration of Independence, the same untutored artlessness of attitude and outlook. Many readers will recall with pleasure a book, published some six years ago, that purported to be the comments of a Chinese official on Western civilisation. Even to those who had never been to China, it was all but self-evident that no Chinaman was its author. Mr. Bryan, even after visiting China, remained without the least suspicion that the volume was not what it pretended to be. He actually sat down and wrote an answer to it, solemnly defending Western life, polity, and religion, against the strictures of this impudent Oriental. Nothing could have marked Mr. Bryan's intellectual equipment with greater precision. His rejoinder was a performance of almost incredible vacuity and thinness. It revealed, as, indeed, did all the letters he wrote on his travels, his prime and impregnable defect—an incapacity to rise above the most elementary level of reflection and comprehension. He cannot think. But in the peculiar circumstances of America, the limitation is one that confirms, rather than restricts, his hold over the masses. It makes him more indisputably than ever, "a man of the people."

THE CHARACTER OF THE SAINT.

A SAINT is a man who succeeds spiritually, a plutocrat in the realm of the soul. But he is neither overbearing nor aggressive, as are so many plutocrats, because he stands so near the treasure-house of God that to him, his wealth seems poverty.

One thing to be said about spiritual wealth is that it does not create a proletariat. It may be accused of doing so. A frequent charge against the saint, brought generally, though not always, by those who want some logical reason for refusing to be saintly, is that he suffers himself to be exploited by the selfish and invertebrate, and that their failings flourish round him like weeds in rich soil. He fights the battles of men and women who should be fighting their own battles, and supports those who, if they could not cling to him, might learn to stand on their own feet. Again, the fact that his capacity for forgiveness extends to seventy times seven encourages people to keep no account of their offences against him, as they would be compelled to do if he only forgave them seven times. In short, he demoralises his environment by unconsciously creating a monopoly of virtue.

It may be safely affirmed that whoever does this is a lopsided saint—in respect of judgment, no saint at all. The mere hedonist for other people is not a saint, though he lives in a half-way house between egotism and saintship, and probably, in the long run, does more good than harm, because whatever else he forgets, he forgets himself. But the true saint is a person of shrewd discrimination. There is balm in his Gilead: there is also a scalpel, which he is willing to use on occasion. Not that he does not seek to give his fellows joy and comfort; but his safeguard is this, that he loves their souls best, and his great longing to see them unselfish and brave breaks through his instinctive efforts to make them happy—and possibly selfish. You find, not only in Christ, but in Paul, James, John, in Bernard and Francis, you find in the men and women to-day whom in your heart you call saints—a swift flame of indignation, when they see a gracious ideal dragged in the dust. It is as if they had seen a defenceless thing betrayed.

No, saints do not create a spiritual proletariat; they only redeem it. Of course, we may be asked, more subtly, if the proletariat does not create the saint. Was not Judas a necessary factor in Christ's revelation of Himself? If it had not been Judas, it must have been some other. The love of Christ shines out against the background of human sin and hatred. As the cross was to the crucifixion of His body, so were they to the crucifixion of His soul.

True, but they neither created nor determined its intrinsic nature; at the utmost, they only partially determined the mode of its revelation to humanity. But as when Christ triumphed on the cross, the cross itself shared His triumph, being raised from a symbol of shame into a sacred symbol, so those who hated and betrayed Him could not escape His redemption. Men could compel him to die; but they could only compel Him to die for them; and that fact was a Divine promise that one day they would die for Him.

So it is with saints of every age, and to-day. Cruelty and ignorance may force them to lay up treasure in heaven more rapidly than they would otherwise do; but we can never force them to lay it up for themselves. Nor can we shake off a foreboding that in one world or another, we may yet be driven to share it. A foreboding—since few of us wish to be saints.

But why not? and what is a saint? What is his wealth? It is his consciousness of God. The saint is he who has the love and courage and endurance to penetrate through the innumerable disguises of the Power that works for goodness, to recognise God everywhere, and bring the recognition to others. He has a genius for divine things, which is also a genius for human things, and for investing them with a divine significance. It is as if he resolved the rays, broken by our faulty human prisms, into pure white light again.

The saint is not a man whom the world uses, and then tramples upon; but neither is he a man who tramples on the world. We are so accustomed to the kind of isolation sometimes created by material—even by mental—success that we are apt to look upon saints as isolated in the measure of their spiritual achievement. We often say that money spoils people, but we often think goodness does. Of course, it is only the old confusion between saints and Pharisees. The success of the saint is not one of isolation, but of solidarity. His purity is something not abstract, but concrete, not dead, but vital, not remote, but warm and near, and not ignorant, but wise. Saints do not know less about sin than sinners do—they know a great deal more, and that is why they do not sin.

Yet, how the would-be saint is hampered, vexed, and thwarted by the world! It seems to him that all his purposes are broken on its wheel, that his soul is at its mercy, and must compromise with its demands. Sometimes its voice comes from without, sometimes from within, threatening or tempting him. The would-be saint is weary of the world; by the time he is a true saint, he loves it. For there are three stages in the life of love, as in the life of faith: love without knowledge, love shaken and embittered by a partial knowledge, and the steadfast love that has merged knowledge in wisdom.

Yes, the saint understands the world: he has plumbed all its meanness, its cowardice, both in his own experience and that of others. But he has plumbed deeper yet; and he believes in the world—the world on whose essential divineness Christ staked—and lost—His earthly life, but for which He stands hostage eternally. And the saint dies daily for the world: that is why he believes. Perhaps we never really believe in a thing till in some manner we die for it.

Saints are those who realise men and women so clearly on their Godward side that the earthward side grows insignificant in comparison. Sinners are always being alienated by the sins of other people. Saints are the only persons of whom it is possible to imagine that they would not be alienated from us, even if they knew all our sins. They are more apt to consider the distance between their ideals and their achievements than the distance between their achievements and ours. And they are the most companionable people on the face of the earth.

They are very human. You sometimes divine in them a conquered besetting sin, peering, as it were, through a virtue, as, when a photographic plate has been carelessly cleaned by an amateur, the old negative peers through the new one. The patience of the saints is often, quite obviously, impatience held in leash by love; their generosity is spurred by a haunting terror of avarice. Fortunately for themselves, as a rule, they have humour, which is a powerful solvent of many inconsistencies. However strenuous the saint, he must have time to reflect, and if he has time to reflect, he has time to smile, not only at himself, but other men, whose feet, like his own, touch the earth, and their foreheads the stars. That is why we love saints in real life, instead of merely worshipping them; their feet are still on earth, although they press it so lightly, and they never assume to be walking on air. And to be laughed at by them is better than to be prayed for by most people, because their laughter is but one expression of their faith in the essential loveableness of humanity.

Those who look askance at the element of humour in a saintly life hardly realise how deep humour goes, or how its roots are intertwined with the foundations of things. Let humanity cease, in one fashion or another, to believe in the love and goodness of God, and humour would die out of the world. Wit, satire, irony, these would remain, with their keen brilliance, "lighting fools the way to dusty death." But not humour. The pre-requisite of humour is the conviction that sin and pain and falsehood are facts less ultimate than justice and gladness and truth.

There are many more points to note in the saint: for instance, his capacity for unspoiled, childlike wonder, the sense of mystery, the glamour, that go with him to the end. But one must add that the greater the saint, the further removed he is from spiritual egotism, and the more steadfastly his faith, and hope, and love turn outward to God and man, until his soul finds its supreme fruition in the fruition of other souls. To find the whole in the part, the part in the whole, that is the measure of his wealth, his spiritual success. And we sometimes profess to ignore it; but in our hearts we covet it, because we know it means the peace of God.

Spiritual achievement is not only the saint's birthright: it is the birthright of every soul. It puts no veto on material success, if only such success is rooted in its promptings, and turned to its uses. But that is a counsel of perfection, and meanwhile there are some types of success whose very warp and woof is spiritual failure. It is the saint who, in all ages, has recalled to men and women the fact that such success is impermanent, and shown them a wealth that cannot be hidden under the churchyard mould. It is his constant presence in the world, in whatever guise he sojourns here, that haunts us with visions of ideal cities—cities of justice, and love, and freedom—cities that never will be built on earth till saints, who always have been philosophers, are also kings in the hearts of men.

Francis Thompson.

THERE were several to trust their own scholarship in English poetry in announcing a major poet when Francis Thompson published the first of his three slender books—the "Poems," of 1893. Mr. Coventry Patmore and Mr. Traill were among those who had no doubt of him or of their own perception; others are living, and to them it does not appear strange that they knew the page of Francis Thompson, as it were, at a glance. It rather seems unintelligible that any eye should not put away carelessness or any mind incredulity before that page was turned.

It is not the strangeness of words, although he searched the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries very thoroughly for the words that our modern neglect or dislike—neglect and dislike due entirely to our following of the eighteenth century—has made to seem strange; it is not the array, the procession, of the diction, although that majesty of advance had been almost unknown to modern English verse; it is not these that command the reader, or should command him, forthright. It is simply the fact of great poetry, evident from that page of which the opening marks a date in the history of our incomparable national literature—"Before Her Portrait in Youth," with "To a Poet Breaking Silence" as the following page of this first volume.

Imagery is not, it may be held, the last, or inmost, word of poetry. There is a simplicity on the yonder side. The simplicity of the hither side may be natural and pleasing enough, though it may also be "natural" as is the village fool. But the simplicity of the further poetry is a plainness within those splendid outer courts of approach where imagery celebrates ritual and ceremony. A few poems abide in that further place—a further place, did we call it? It is far, indeed, from the access of the suitor, but closest of all things to the warm breast of the very Muse. Francis Thompson dealt almost altogether in imagery; and it is because of this that his less sympathetic readers accuse him of the lack of simplicity. And he himself, in a manuscript note, says: "Imagery is so far from being 'all fancy' (which is what people mean by saying it is 'all imagination') that the deepest truths—even in the natural or physical order—are often adumbrated only by images familiar, and yet conceived to be purely fanciful analogies."

No "lack," however, was amongst his faults. Where he might be charged or questioned was in his commission, not in his omission—his commission of the splendid fault of excess. How many poets might be furnished, not from the abundance, but from the overabundance, of his imagery, and the prunings and chastenings of his fancy! The spoils of such a correction as would have made a few of his odes more "classical" might have been gathered up, a golden armful, by poets who need have stooped for nothing else—twelve basketsful of fragments, after the feeding of a chosen multitude.

Francis Thompson's imagery has the visual as well as the mental quality; it is allegory, and metaphor, and simile at once, and—in the literal sense—image:—

"I fled Him, down the nights and down the days;
I fled Him, down the arches of the years;
I fled Him, down the labyrinthine ways
Of my own mind; and in the mist of tears
I hid from Him, and under running laughter.
Up vistaed hopes I sped
And shot, precipitated,
Adown Titanic glooms of chasméd fears,
From those strong Feet that followed, followed after.
But with unhurrying chase,
And unperturbéd pace,
Deliberate speed, majestic instancy,
They beat—and a Voice beat
More instant than the Feet—
'All things betray thee, who betrayest Me.'"

The poem, "The Hound of Heaven," never lapses or fails from this wonderful imagery, or this no less wonderful urgency and speed. One of the longest of the odes, it is also one of the boldest, the strongest, nay the most violent, for violent ceases to be a word of reproach or rebuke when it presses to this irresistible measure, to this "untempered extremity." The subject of the poem—the flight of the soul from the severe, exacting, and pursuing love of God—demands such violence of speed:—

"I said to dawn: Be sudden—to eve: Be soon;
With thy young skiey blossoms heap me over
From this tremendous Lover!
Float thy vague veil about me lest He see!

Heaven and I wept together,
And its sweet tears were salt with mortal mine.

Against the red throb of its sunset-heart
I laid my own to beat.

But not by that, by that, was eased my human smart!"

Nature gives the soul no harbourage, and when the poet turns to children—

"They at least are for me, surely for me!

But just as their young eyes grew sudden fair
With dawning answers there,
Their Angel plucked them from me by the hair."

The sob of calm at the vanquished ending is the close of a vital and mortal experience.

Of the quieter poems the series "Love in Dian's Lap" has perhaps the most perfect seventeenth-century finish. These poems, addressed to one woman as remote from the very possibility of pursuit or possession as Laura or Beatrice, have, like the spiritual odes, the indispensable note of vital experience. No labour, no curious research of words—and the signs of these are perpetual—could trick even the most superficial reader into the blunder of thinking the emotion or the passion to be artificial, or the verse a mere exercise of imaginative poetry. Nay, the labour, the art, the studious vocabulary are locked together within the strenuous grasp of the man's sincerity. There is no dissociating—no disintegrating—such poems as these; and Francis Thompson's heart beats in the words—"roseal"—he specially loved the discovery of "roseal," and has either sixteenth or seventeenth century authority for it, as he has for every other restoration—"cymars," "frore," "amiced," "lampad," and so forth—words that may well return to the treasury of English, and are likely to remain there.

Why should the sixteenth century so make laws or customs for the twentieth that a poet of to-day inspired by the seventeenth should be so often bidden to turn to that clearer and single spirit of the earlier time? If the sixteenth century was a flower, the seventeenth was a fruit: apple and peach have the fragrance, the colour, and the riches of their kind.

And part of this common rebuke has regard to the use of Latinisms, of which Francis Thompson makes a persistent practice. Obviously there are Latinisms and Latinisms! Those of Gibbon and Johnson, and of their time generally, serve to hold passion well at arm's length; they are the mediate, and not the immediate, utterance of human feeling. But with Francis Thompson the majestic Latin word is forged hot on the anvil of the artificer. No Old-English in the making could be readier or closer. Of the tender mood of ideal love, this may be taken as the example, from "Love in Dian's Lap." "Sweet Summer," he names his lady:—

"Sweet Summer! unto you this swallow drew,
By secret instincts inappeasable,
That did direct him well,
Lured from the gelid North which wrought him wrong,
Wintered of sunning song:—
By happy instincts inappeasable,
Ah, yes! that led him well,
Lured to the untried regions and the new Climes of auspicious you!"

And again, from "Her Portrait," is this exquisite image:—

"Deep in my heart subsides the infrequent word,
And dies there, slowly throbbing like a wounded bird."

The poems to children comprise "Sister Songs," two poems full of rich and intricate imagery, and containing autobiographical allusions—records of the time when, a vagrant, he loitered at theatre doors in the hope that the price of a night's lodging might be thrown to him for calling a cab.

He cries to the little girl:—

"Wild Dryad! all unconscious of thy tree,
With which indissolubly
The tyrannous time shall one day make thee whole,

Thou whose young sex is yet but in thy soul:—

As hoarded in the vine

Hang the gold skins of undelirious wine."

The companion poem is in part a dance of words in honour of a yet younger girl:—

"For homage unto Sylvia, her sweet, feat ways!"

But here, too, are tragic allusions to the childhood he had met drifting in the streets. "The Making of Viola" is a buoyant song to a baby, in which the words seem never to alight, they so bound and rebound, and are so agile with life:—

"Spin, daughter Mary, spin,
Twirl your wheel with silver din;
Spin, daughter Mary, spin,
Spin a tress for Viola."

And so forth, with the whole making of a lovely child.

From another, "To my God-child, Francis M.," may be taken the lines that should be this gentle and unhappy poet's best epitaph. He bids the child who shall one day seek him in another world:

"Turn not your tread along the Uranian sod
Among the bearded counsellors of God:

Pass where beneath the ranged gonfalons
The starry cohorts shake their shielded suns,

Pass the crystalline sea, the Lampads seven:
Look for me in the nurseries of Heaven."

As a thinker, Francis Thompson is profoundly meditative, and, if pessimistic, then pessimistic with submission and fear, not with revolt. His thought must not be called gloomy, even when it is dark as night, for in the darkness there is a sense of open and heavenly air.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

I SEE in the "Times" a paragraph about Francis Thompson, against which I will ask you to let me make appeal. It comes from "A Correspondent," who "writes to us"; and I am just such another, writing to you. But I knew Thompson, and no pen but an alien's could have written this to Printing House Square: "There are occasions on which the conventional expression of regret becomes a mockery, and this is one of them. What the world must regret is not the release of Mr. Thompson, but the fact that the cravings of the body from which he is released should have had power to ruin one of the most remarkable and original of the poetic geniuses of our time." I know what the writer insinuates. I know, too, that he has overshot his mark. But the public will only too greedily infer from his words that Thompson was a degraded man, he who carried dignity amid all vicissitude; and that he was a debauchee, he who lived, as he sang, the votary of Fair Love. Nor need I adopt in his regard the fine passage in which Mr. Birrell defends Charles Lamb's "drinking." For Mr. Francis Thompson did not "drink."

The "genius" of Francis Thompson was not "ruined," or we should not have the evidence of it on every page of three volumes, presenting together a body of best poetry equal in size to that of most of our poets. But it is true that Thompson's health was wretched from first to last. It is true also that he doctored himself disastrously with laudanum from almost the early days of his medical studentship in Manchester. When he came to the streets of London, the drug delivered him in a manner from their horrors, and, besides, was, I think, some palliation of the disease of which he finally died—consumption.

It is true, also, that Thompson was a man apart. Laudanum made of him an alien, not an outcast. He held aloof from society; knew almost nobody; went nearly nowhere. All this notwithstanding, there are few things more certain to his friends than the sanity of Thompson, or more sacred than his untarnished name. Mystic as he was, he felt with those who, as he finely said of Cardinal Manning, "had all the world for cell." And he was very human. It has already been recorded of him that he knew by heart the chief feats of the cricket-field, for the last quarter of a century. And he sometimes went to Lord's, a strange apparition, no doubt—in dress, and mood, and mutterings. The streets of London knew him by heart, though stony-hearted. Even they, I think, will miss him. He tramped miles over them, at his own hour—which was of a night; but that seems no reason why the writer in the "Times" should refrain from regretting that he is dead. He wore an ulster in summer, certainly, and you laughed. You knew cold weather had come when Thompson discarded his top-coat, and you sighed.

Again, Thompson was an uncertain worker; but his friendly editors did not hustle him. And they could always count on him to keep time with even a "commissioned" poem. The Odes on the Nineteenth Century and on the Victorian Jubilee did not get late to the editor of the "Daily Chronicle"; and even if they had been late, nobody else could have sent them so quickly, for nobody else could have sent them at all. Every week, in the "Academy," under Mr. Lewis Hind, Thompson's articles made fine reading—his essay on Emerson marking the high-water mark of that manner of criticism; and I am certain that the editor of the "Athenæum," for whom he was in harness almost until the last week of his life, and who treated him with a consideration never to be forgotten by his friends, is in sorrow that Thompson is dead.

Such, in brief, was my friend:—a moth of a man, who has taken his unreturning flitting! No pen—least of all, mine—can do justice to him: to his rectitude, to his gentleness, to the genius which made his "pot boilers" better than the best script of his contemporaries. If he had great misfortunes, he bore them greatly; they were great because everything about him was great. It is my consolation now, amid tears for Thompson from eyes that never thought to shed so many again, to know that he knew and accepted his fate and mission, and that he willingly "learned in suffering what he taught in song." But I have spoken too much. I did not mean to do more than make the writer in the "Times" aware that somebody loves his life less because Thompson is dead.

W. M.

Poetry.

A MAIDEN AND HER HAIR.

HER cruel hands go in and out,
Like two pale woodmen working there,
To make a nut-brown thicket clear—
The full, wild foliage of her hair.

Her hands now work far up the North,
Then, fearing for the South's extreme,
They into her dark waves of hair
Dive down so quick—it seems a dream.

They're in the light, again with speed,
Tossing the loose hair to and fro;
Until, like tamed snakes, the coils
Lie on her bosom in a row.

For wise inspection, up and down
One coil her busy hands now run;
To screw and twist, to turn and shape,
And here and there to work like one.

And now those white hands, still like one,
Are working at the perilous end;
Where they must knot those nut-brown coils,
Which will hold fast, though still they'll bend.

Sometimes one hand must fetch strange tools,
The other then must work alone;
But when more instruments are brought,
See both make up the time that's gone!

Now that her hair is bound secure,
Coil top of coil, in smaller space,
'Tis now I see how smoothe her brow,
And her simplicity of face.

WILLIAM H. DAVIES.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

INQUIRIES made among publishers and booksellers lead to the belief that up to the present the season has been a most prosperous one for both branches of the profession. A few publishers, it is true, complain that the trade is still unsettled, but this is not the general verdict, and we learn that with some houses the figures for the month of October have been the highest on record. In view of the fact that few books of outstanding merit have appeared during the season this result is highly satisfactory, since it shows that the number of those who buy books is rapidly increasing. Biographies and books of travel have had a large sale, while the tide of colour books shows some signs of beginning to ebb. Publishers of fiction also are satisfied with their season, though the autumn has not brought forth the great English novelist for whom both critics and publishers are eagerly looking.

* * *

In the current numbers of two of the leading French reviews there are interesting articles upon contemporary English fiction. M. de Wyzewa contributes to the "Revue des Deux Mondes" the first of a series of studies of "The English Novel in 1907," which is chiefly concerned with the work of Mr. William de Morgan, whom he describes as carrying on the Dickens tradition in a worthy manner. "Mr. de Morgan," he says, "although he has a great number of faults, has also the mysterious art of giving life to his inventions. . . . Undoubtedly the man who has imagined Lossie Thorpe and Janey Vance, and Alice-for-Short, and Margaret Heath, the man who has known how to create beings of flesh and blood like Joseph Vance's father, old Doctor Thorpe, Charles Heath, and his friend Jeff, such a man brings a magnificent treasure of promise and hope to the English novel." M. de Wyzewa's general view is that the average English novelist "knows his trade better and loves it better than his rival in other countries," but that his great weakness is his slipshod style. M. Charles Simond, in "La Revue," gives high praise to our contributor, Mr. John Galsworthy. Just as Mr. de Morgan has formed himself on Dickens, so Mr. Galsworthy, he says, has formed himself on Tourguénief, Guy de Maupassant, and Anatole France. "From the author of 'Smoke' and 'Virgin Soil' he has his care for finished form; from the author of 'Bel Ami' he has sobriety and transparency; and from M. France precision of expression and humour."

* * *

Few readers will agree with the absurd view of Wordsworth expressed by the Duke of Argyll in his recent volume of reminiscences which we review in another column. The news that Professor Knight's coming collection of "Letters of the Wordsworth Family" will include a large number of letters hitherto unpublished has aroused great interest. These letters, which are to be published next month by Messrs. Ginn & Co., contain not only Wordsworth's own correspondence, but also letters from his sister, his brother, his wife, his daughter, and even some from his sister-in-law, Sarah Hutchinson, and his son-in-law, Edward Quillinan. We give the following passages on Wordsworth as a letter writer from Professor Knight's preface:—

"Although Wordsworth disliked the task of penmanship, and was not a great letter-writer, few of his contemporaries, and none of his fellow-poets, revealed themselves more fully than he did through this medium. Not Coleridge, or Southey, or Scott, or Byron, or Landor, or De Quincey, or Shelley—I may add also Tennyson and Browning—have done so to the same extent. Besides, a collection of Wordsworth family letters is unique not only from what it tells us of the writers, but also from the side-lights it casts on the characters of those who are mentioned throughout. . . . It is somewhat curious that Wordsworth had no great interest in the letters written by distinguished men who preceded him, and that he took little trouble in the writing of his own. It is the more remarkable, because his were often so very good when inspiration came to him (as it did in his best poetic work), although he was frequently prolix and repetitive in style. I believe he scarcely ever took adequate time for the composition of his letters. He never tarried over them, and seldom revised them, while he gave days, and weeks, and months to the elaboration of some of his shorter poems. He often dashed off his letters without punctuation, and with important words left out."

Mr. J. A. HOBSON has composed, out of materials collected by the late Mr. Henry Lloyd, of Chicago, a volume called "The Swiss Democracy: A Study of a Sovereign People," which will be shortly issued by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Mr. Hobson is a believer in the Referendum and the principle of initiation, by which the will of the people is directly expressed in the control of its representative assemblies, so that his study of a country where the principles of direct popular government are fully carried out is sure to be of special interest. Readers of THE NATION know what unusual powers of clear thought and cogent reasoning Mr. Hobson brings to the discussion of the modern problems of social reform.

* * *

THE Italian Renaissance is a subject of perennial interest, and a volume called "Artists of the Italian Renaissance," by Miss E. L. Seeley, which Messrs. Chatto & Windus are about to publish, should prove useful to a large number of readers. The work is largely made up of extracts from writers such as Vasari, Ridolfi, Lanzi, and others, freely translated and abridged, while a continuous narrative is formed by interweaving the accounts of contemporary history from Sanuto, Villani, Machiavelli, Varchi, &c. In this way the author gives a picture of the Italian artists as they were affected by the political history of their country, and traces the connection between the rise of art in Italy and the growth of the cities in riches and prosperity. The eager impetuosity which displayed itself in the fierce rivalries between the cities was, she holds, as manifest in the contests of art as in war. The book will be illustrated by a large number of colour plates.

* * *

THE first number of "The New Quarterly," just published, contains a number of articles of literary interest. Mr. G. L. Strachey writes on Beddoes, whom he calls "the last of the Elizabethans." Beddoes' highest claim to distinction rests, he thinks, upon "his extraordinary eminence as a master of dramatic blank verse." Mr. Arthur Symons, in an article called "A Triptych of Poets," deals with Mrs. Hemans, George Darley, and Thomas Hood. Of Hood Mr. Symons says, with justice, that he is "one of the great artists in English verse, especially in his serious play with double and treble endings." "Eugene Aram" is a masterpiece of horror. Since "The Ancient Mariner" there has been no such spiritual fear in our poetry, and the nightmare comes to us as if out of our own bed, the sensations translate themselves into our own nerves." There are articles on scientific subjects by Lord Rayleigh, Mr. Bertrand Russell, and Mr. R. J. Strutt, and a notable feature is the first of a series of extracts from the note-books of Samuel Butler, the author of "Erewhon," from which we give the following characteristic quotation: "An honest god's the noblest work of man." We congratulate Mr. Desmond MacCarthy on his first number.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Life and Work of Vittorio Capaccio." By Pompeo Molmenti and the late Gustav Ludwig. Translated by R. H. Hobart Cust. (Murray, 52s. 6d. net.)

"Thomas Hood: His Life and Times." By Walter Jerrold. (Alston Rivers, 16s. net.)

"Colonel Nathaniel Whetham: A Forgotten Soldier of the Civil Wars." By W. D. Whetham. (Longmans, 8s. 6d. net.)

"From the Niger to the Nile." By Lieutenant Boyd Alexander. (Arnold, 2 vols., 36s. net.)

"In the Footsteps of Marco Polo." By Major C. Dalrymple Bruce. (Blackwood, 21s. net.)

"The Life and Voyages of Joseph Wiggins." By Henry Johnson. (Murray, 15s. net.)

"George Alfred Henty." By Manville Fenn. (Blackie, 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Oxford Book of French Verse." Chosen by St. John Lucas. (Clarendon Press, 6s. net.)

"The New Theology and the Old Religion." By Charles Gore, D.D., Bishop of Birmingham. (Murray, 5s. net.)

"Adam Smith and Modern Sociology." By Professor A. W. Small. (Unwin, 5s. 6d. net.)

"Prose Idylls of the West Riding." By Lady C. Milnes Gaskell. (Smith Elder, 6s.)

"Les Maitres du Roman Espagnol Contemporain." Par F. Vezinet. (Paris: Hachette, 3fr. 50.)

"Giosue Carducci: Etude Littéraire et Biographique." Par Pierre de Bouchand. (Paris: Sansot, 1fr.)

"En Marge des Vieux Livres." Deuxième Série. Par Jules Lemaitre. (Paris: Société d'Imprimerie et de Librairie, 3fr. 50.)

"Les Belles Histoires." Par Pierre Veber. (Paris: Stock, 3fr. 50.)

Letters to the Editor.

"WHO ARE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I observe that the expression, "National Church," is under discussion in your columns. May I give an explanation of it from the time of the Reformation?

At the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign, she, with her advisers, before proceeding to frame the Act of Uniformity, proposed that a conference of the most eminent divines, both Roman and Anglican, should be held. It was held in Westminster Abbey in the end of March, 1559. The Romanists gave up the struggle after the first discussion, but we have the paper prepared by the Anglicans upon the second subject, which was this, as given in Cardwell's "History of Conferences" (pages 72 and 25):—

"Every particular church hath authority to institute, change, and abrogate ceremonies and rites in the church, so that it be to edify."

Their "discourse" begins thus: "For avoiding ambiguity in terms," it is not amiss to declare what is meant by the words of the proposition.

"By these words, 'every particular church,' we understand every particular kingdom, province, or region, which, by order, make one Christian society or body, according to the distinction of countries and orders of the same."

By the "order" of a country is evidently meant its constitution. The divines who conducted the discussion on the reformed side were Scory, Whitehead, Jewel, Alner, Cox, Grindal, Horne, and Guest, most of them, before or afterwards, bishops, and all men who had great influence in the establishment of the Church of England and its reformed services.

This definition of a "particular church" was made at a time different in many of its circumstances from ours. But I for one am prepared to support it as equally applicable to the England of our own time as to that of the sixteenth century.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. FREMANTLE.

The Deanery, Ripon,
November 19th, 1907.

"THE CENSORSHIP OF PLAYS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I would ask that the censorship of plays should be reformed, not abolished; the able gentleman who conducts it no longer an officer of the King's household, but the paid agent of the theatrical managers who cling to him so fondly, as well they may, for he is as useful to them as the safety-curtain which now descends in front of a pacified audience towards the middle of the evening, and convinces it that it has no physical dangers to fear. The harmless necessary "taster" who has passed the play they are even now witnessing has done the same for their sense of decency and fitness. Optimistic theatre-goers can be more or less sure, thanks to his careful choosing, of an happy complacent evening. They know they will not have to shiver under sudden draughts of doubt, or be assailed by wafts—from the pit of grotesque under-worlds not realised—or worried by the mere suggestion of uncompromising scourges held in reserve for their pleasant sins. They are sure not to be taken rashly into dens of ungilded vice, to dying bedsides, into churches—except medieval ones—into police courts or doctors' consulting rooms. The censor, retained by the thoughtful management, will have seen to all that. His hall-mark will have been affixed to all such plays as will never drag down a manager's grey hairs with sorrow to a premature end of the run, or affect his hard-won license. On the other hand, parents may look in the columns of the daily paper for a selection of plays "with no offence in them," suitable for their daughters to witness. Such impeccable moralities would show, Under the Clock, like starred hotels in Baedeker.

Meanwhile, enterprising and public-spirited managers will be free to give their attention to developing the art of a country that grew Shakespeare and "the terrible graces of the forgotten Webster"—no mealy-mouthed ones, those!—and take their chance of police interference or hopelessly bored and disgusted audiences. Mr. Granville Barker may produce his own play and fill his theatre if he can. He will. The un-starred need not necessarily prove the ill starred.—Yours, &c.,

VIOLET HUNT.

South Lodge, Campden Hill, W.
November 20th, 1907.

THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I be allowed to support the conclusions of Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, M.P., against the criticisms put forward by two of your correspondents this week, to the effect that he had exaggerated the preponderance of the Bulgarian element in Macedonia? What is becoming more and more clearly recognised in England is that, while there are clearly defined Greek districts and Servian districts, the vast mass of the population is Bulgarian—or, more correctly, Macedonian. The insurrection of 1903 represented the struggle, against overwhelming odds, of a single and coherent nationality.

I began the study of this question some years ago with a distinct prepossession in favour of the Greeks, and a deplorable ignorance of the Slav peoples. The first evidence that strongly impressed me was that of Dr. Arthur Evans, a scholar without any political bias, who has travelled throughout the length and breadth of the country. He says:—

"It is an unpleasant duty to have to tell one's friends home truths, but the Greek claim to Macedonia, at least as regards the greater part of the interior of the country, is a dream . . . These artificial annexations do not go far. The language of the villagers remains Bulgar, and the deep underlying instincts of race are only held in temporary suspense. The friends of Greece can only regret that she should be misled by such artificial pretensions. . . . The late M. Tricoupi, to my personal knowledge, saw things much more clearly. He was well aware that, except a narrow fringe to the south, and some sporadic centres of no great magnitude in the interior of the province, the Greek element had no real hold on Macedonia." ("The Policy of Extermination in Macedonia," p. 2.)

The second was that of "Odysseus," now known to be the distinguished diplomatist, Sir Charles Eliot, who writes:—

"In European Turkey the only large masses of Greek peasantry are found in the three-pronged peninsula north of the Gulf of Salonica, and in the region behind Constantinople, which, is, however, sparsely populated." ("Turkey in Europe," p. 300.)

The impression thus acquired was strengthened on a recent visit to Macedonia by the aspect of the peasants—"the original Bulgarian type," to quote "Odysseus" again, "heavy frames with broad, flat, stolid faces, small eyes, and straight black hair"—testifying to the enormous preponderance of one race. But I should not have trusted such an impression if it had not been confirmed by the practically universal judgment of impartial foreign observers in Macedonia. This fact, which I had not fully realised before, seems to me conclusive. I talked with men of many nationalities, men high up in the consular service, foreign military officers, and other persons engaged in the execution of the reforms. It is obvious that I cannot quote the names of official informants; but I append some extracts from a note-book written up immediately after each conversation. They are selected simply as bearing on the question at issue, not as supporting a particular view.

"The population is mainly Bulgarian. The Bulgarian bands are defending their own homes. The Greek bands are, for the most part, aggressors coming in from outside. Both have shown brutality, but the Greeks have been the worse in respect of indiscriminate killing. The statements in the recent Bulgarian publications about Macedonia are accurate. I can verify most of the cases mentioned from my own knowledge." . . . "Both sides are equally brutal, and equally to blame, but the Greek bands are the larger. Practically all the villages in Central Macedonia are Bulgarian both by race and language. A good number of these villages are 'Grecising'—i.e., profess allegiance to the Greek cause; but the great majority have done so through force, or the fear of force. A very few, partly from the fear of spiritual evil resulting from schism, genuinely want to be Patriarchists, and take a pride in belonging to the Greek party." . . . "In North-eastern Macedonia the vast majority of the population is Bulgarian, though there are Greek villages along the coast." . . . "My district is entirely Bulgarian, though the town is, in the main, Greek. There are bands of both sides in it, but the Greek are by far the larger." . . . "The Bulgarian bands, as a rule, kill people whom they regard as guilty of some particular offence, but not others. There have been one or two bad cases of 'general killing' lately, though." . . . "I came here a Phil-Hellene; indeed, I was selected because I knew Greek and sympathised with the Greeks. I was converted to the Bulgarian view of things because I have seen that practically all the people are Bulgarian. In my district [Note.—This is a district specially claimed by the Greeks] there are no Greek villages, and out of a total of eighty, only six are 'Grecising.' In my former district there are one hundred and twenty villages; eight are Greek, and from fifteen to twenty are 'Grecising.' The Greek bands do not attack the Turks, while the Bulgarian attack mainly Turks, though also Greeks. Hence the Turkish Government has every reason for letting off the Greeks. If they attack their bands, it is generally done only for show, and the attack is not pressed home."

What is even more striking is the weakness of the Greek case as presented even by its most intelligent advocates. It is difficult to believe that the theory of the "Bulgarophone Greeks" can be seriously held by educated men. The change in English feeling as to the Greek claims in Macedonia has to be explained by these apologists as the result of supernatural diplomatic skill on the part of Bulgaria. In reality, Greece is distinctly superior both in diplomacy and in propagandist work. The change is due to the permeation of the actual facts through channels of unbiassed observation.

Who began the quarrel? I refuse to apportion blame between Greek and Bulgarian. The blame is primarily on the Turkish Government, which has fomented the conflict by every means in its power; ultimately, and most heavily of all, it lies on the European Powers, who tolerate an age-long misery for the sake of momentary ease, or extremely problematical advantages. But I do not think there is much dispute as to the actual course of events. Until their national church, the Exarchate, was established nearly forty years ago, the Macedonians called themselves Greeks; speaking ecclesiastically, as it is the custom to do in those parts, they could not have called themselves anything else. The new church was the symbol and the nucleus of their nationality; an educational movement began, and more and more villages declared themselves for the national, as opposed to the foreign church. The Greeks, who, naturally enough, can never forget that their people ruled the whole peninsula for centuries, either politically or ecclesiastically, or both, were indignant at this process, just as many Englishmen are indignant at what they are pleased to call the "de-Anglicisation" of Ireland by a linguistic and political revival. They earned the furious hostility of the Macedonians by their support of the Government during the desperate insurrection of 1903. The Macedonians retaliated on every Greek, or "Greciser," that they could find. Since then the feud has continued, and produced a gradual demoralisation. Both sides are brutal, as men will always be under a Government which renders life a thing so worthless that it is readily taken and readily thrown away.

But all this does not alter the racial facts. If we want to judge what the nation is which is struggling against the Asiatic ascendancy, if we want to know what the sympathies are which would come into play as soon as violence was suppressed and any government worthy of the name established, we should surely look, not to the ecclesiastical label, which both parties admit to be changeable from year to year by means of force or bribery, but to the fundamental identities of custom, language, and race.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

THE PLIGHT OF THE ASSISTANT MASTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Those who have had the good fortune to see Mr. Penley as "the Reverend Robert Spalding" in "The Private Secretary," may perhaps imagine him as the head of a household calling up his servants and saying "D'you know, I've taken quite a sudden dislike to you all. Proceed to pack up your goods and chattels and go." How such a situation would be treated under the mysterious code of "Stage Law" the writer would not venture to guess, the only certainty being that in two minutes Mr. Penley would either be under the table, or behind the curtains, or in an ottoman. In real life, however, the matter would be comparatively simple. A householder has an absolute right to dismiss his servants; but if he chooses to do so in a capricious, unreasonable, or arbitrary manner, the law steps in and ordains that the servants are not to suffer on that account. Therefore, by the domestic Magna Charta to which duchesses and landladies alike have to submit, the rule is a month's notice, or a month's board wages. Serious misconduct alone justifies instant dismissal without compensation; and the householder who attempted to ignore the custom would find that the between-maid and the scullery-girl had rights which he would disregard at his peril.

In another way the mistress of a house where the servants are constantly being dismissed, even with due notice, or wages in lieu of notice, will find inconvenience. The fact becomes known amongst the registry offices and their clients, and she will discover that, if there are any candidates at all for the vacant positions, they will be of an inferior class to the servants of her neighbours.

In the case of a manufacturer, or employer of organised labour, any unreasonable treatment of his employés may have the most disastrous effects on his business. Here, again, the custom of due notice, usually a week's, is almost universal; and the master who summarily dismissed men without cause might find his name on a black-list circulating amongst trade unions throughout England. And he would assuredly find that to deprive a man of his living in an arbitrary way without giving him a chance to earn another was a very serious matter.

But one vocation is left where caprice may have entire legal recognition and encouragement. In the illustration above, if "the Reverend Robert Spalding" was appointed headmaster of an endowed school, and delivered such a speech to his assistants, they would have to go immediately, and their salary would cease with the expression of his dislike. It would be his pleasure that they should go, and if he was not foolish enough to give some corrupt, or false reason for it, they would have to go. A page-boy is entitled to due notice; a master of arts, who may have spent twenty or thirty of the best years of his life at such a school, is not entitled to due notice. This in effect is the result of the unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of "Wright v. Zetland," affirming that of Mr. Justice Lawrence.

Judges have to administer the law as they find it, even sometimes to their outspoken regret; and it is no disrespect either to Court of Appeal or of first instance to say that, unless the decision is taken to the House of Lords and there reversed, it is a matter worthy of the serious consideration of the Legislature. In the above case no fault was found, or even alleged, against the dismissed masters; the new headmaster wished for a "clean sweep," and dismissed them on the eve of the school term, when it was almost impossible for them to find appointments elsewhere. It was held that their service could be terminated "at pleasure" by the headmaster; and though Mr. Lough in answering a question on this case in the House of Commons stated that, as he was advised, "at pleasure" did not necessarily mean "without notice," the sense of the judgments seems to have been the other way. It was not necessary, however, to decide the point, for the action failed on a technicality. The headmaster was held not to be the agent for the Governors, and therefore the masters had no contract with them at all; they had no contract with the new headmaster; and the old headmaster had not given them notice. Therefore, although they might have had certain rights—which was exceedingly doubtful—there was no one against whom such rights could be enforced. The only parallel to this in English law is the case of the unfortunate creditor of a married couple who use the goods he supplies, but, if they know the proper jugglery sanctioned by the present state of the law, are not bound to pay him.

Two arguments, neither without a certain weight, can be adduced to support the arbitrary power of dismissal. In the first place it obtains in the Army, the Navy, and the Civil Service; and in the second place slack masters can "let down" a school with most appalling rapidity.

But there are good answers to both. The necessity of discipline in the Army and Navy must be paramount to every other consideration, and if officer or man is making mischief or endangering mutiny, the machinery to deal with him must work at once. Similarly, a diplomat might have it in his power to force us into war with another nation, without this safeguard as a last resort. It is significant that as regards the King's civil servants, the power of summary dismissal was only definitely laid down a few years ago, showing that, though claimed, it is only exercised in the rarest cases. Those in the service of the Crown must, for the above reasons, risk unjust dismissal, and experience shows that the risk is so small that it is negligible. Moreover, it may be pointed out that the machinery does not lend itself to caprice; for example, a newly-appointed colonel cannot at once dismiss all his officers and start with any others he may choose for himself.

The high reasons for the Crown's prerogative do not apply to schoolmasters; if they grossly misbehave, they can be summarily dismissed, and this power would, of course, be retained. But the reasons which apply in other employments for requisite notices, apply here even more forcibly. The assistant-master is, as a rule, a graduate of some University and a man of good position, and if he loses his post he requires at least a term's notice before he can get another. The alternative to notice seems to be that hundreds or thousands of educated men must depend on their principal's temper to keep them from perhaps months of starvation.

It may be urged that there should be power to get rid of a slack man, even if he does not definitely misconduct himself; the answer is that the power of dismissal with notice is amply sufficient, or, as a last resort, the payment of a term's salary in lieu of notice. But, if a servant or a workman can be trusted in a house or a factory when under notice, a schoolmaster might be trusted also. In each case there is ample safeguard against definite misconduct.

A very short Act of Parliament could effect this reform; and it is safe to say that its supporters would be in a large majority, and come from every quarter of the House of Commons.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED FELLOWS.

A SUNDAY POST FOR LONDON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Francis Jones opposes my desire for a Sunday post in London but gives no substantial reason for so doing. He "feels sure" that he is backed by "the common sense of London," but I suppose I have equal justification for declaring that it is nothing but uncommon nonsense that maintains this postal silence on Sunday when it is non-existent in every other town at home or abroad, and even where the facilities are much less abundant. Let me assure him that he is in a minority in his desire that this anomaly should continue, and he is inconsistent, too. He admits to doing "far too much work on Sunday, some of it my own fault, and some of it my misfortune," but he would give no such option to equally hardworked people, and would make it compulsory that they should have "a whole day's rest." Mr. Jones says that it will introduce into London "a new, very large, and very unnecessary amount of Sunday labour," but he only speaks half the truth. It will be "a new" and a "very large" service undoubtedly, but that it is "unnecessary" he has entirely failed to prove. As I have already said, it may mean additions to the postal staff, but as it meets a public need, and will be paid for by that portion of the public requiring it, here will be a legitimate way for rendering assistance to our present unemployed. It is ridiculous for Mr. Jones to point to the telegraph as a means of relief. He cannot possibly speak from any personal experience of the Sunday facilities in this respect. Should we ever obtain the one delivery on Sunday—which is all I ask for—Mr. Jones can leave his Sunday letters unopened, and be the "idiot" which he, by implication, designates me.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES E. NOVERRE.

19, Serjeant's Inn, Temple, E.C.
Sunday, November 17th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a letter in your number for November 9th it is said that there is a Sunday morning post in all other towns of the civilised world except London. This is by no means the case in Edinburgh—nor anywhere else I know of in Scotland. You may, indeed, get your letters by applying at the post office—during a short period of the day—in Edinburgh before 9 a.m., which is practically useless. In the same way, there are no trains on Sunday, except the English mails. And if our "dear ones" are so inconsiderate as to be dying on that day, they must die without our presence or assistance. I have made inquiries of the postmen themselves, and they say they would rather have a delivery on Sunday, as it would obviate the great extra stress of work on Monday. But we are too good here to let the postmen settle their own business in their own way. Even the tramcars have only run on Sunday a few years, before which you could hardly get across the town in comfort, or in any reasonable time.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP J. DEAR.

58, Findhorn Place, Edinburgh,
November 16th, 1907.

"COKE OF NORFOLK."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With reference to a review which appeared in the columns of THE NATION of the 9th inst. of Mr. Stirling's book, "Coke of Norfolk and his Friends," perhaps I may be allowed to mention an incident which is confirmatory of his widely-spread fame as an agriculturalist. At a dinner which succeeded an agricultural show in Cornwall some forty or more years ago, a farmer made the following speech, or something very like it: "I rise to propose the health of the honorable Chairman. The honorable Chairman has a-told you how much he has a-benefited the farmer, but he never told you how much the farmer had a-benefited he. In my opinion the man who has a-benefited the farmer most is Mr. Coke, the late Earl of Leicester that was, and if the honorable Chairman did do, as the late Mr. Coke did do, he would do a good deal better than he do do."—Yours, &c.,

J. F. COLLIER.

25, Croxteth Grove, Liverpool,
November 17th, 1907.

A CORRECTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I correct a slip in the paragraph about my forthcoming book on Ancient Britain, which appeared in last Saturday's NATION? The writer, whom I thank for his kind notice, remarks that "the greater part of the book is occupied with the story of Cæsar's life on our island." He doubtless meant to say that I had attempted to tell the story of man's life in our island from the earliest times. That story might interest some people who would not care to read what I have written about Cæsar's invasions.—Yours, &c.,

T. RICE HOLMES.

11, Douro Place, Kensington, W.
November 20th, 1907.

RETRENCHMENT AND SOCIAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—This month is all important for Mr. Asquith's Budget. If the military and naval estimates now being prepared are not heavily cut down our financial position next spring will be deplorable. It would be suicidal to heap on taxes in a period of financial crisis, and equally suicidal to reduce the Sinking Fund when public credit is perilously low. Liberal members of Parliament will have to choose between social reform and the Navy League, between old age pensions and Mr. Haldane's ridiculously costly army scheme, between financing the lord lieutenants and financing small holdings. Lord Tweedmouth and Mr. Haldane have wasted prodigious sums for two years. Surely now the time has come to consider the interests of the people and to carry out the programme of the Liberal Party.—Yours, &c.,

SALUS POPULI.

London, November 20th, 1907.

Reviews.

SIR HENRY WOTTON.*

WE doubt whether any contribution has recently been made to the scholarship of English literature more entirely satisfactory than Mr. Pearsall Smith's "Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton." The task involved peculiar difficulties, and demanded a high degree of historical and literary equipment. The editor of the correspondence must hunt his thousand letters through Italian archives and college libraries and the muniments of English country houses, knowing that every letter, detected and transcribed, might involve puzzles which patient research alone could solve. The writer of the life must have a large outlook on history as well as an appreciation for trifles if he is to do justice to the diplomatist and the gossip; a knowledge of the arts if he is to appreciate the earliest English connoisseur of Italian painting and the first English writer on architecture; a light and delicate pen if he is to draw the portrait of the shrewd and gentle servant of James I., whose name has been kept fragrant by a malicious epigram, a few exquisite lyrics, and one of the most charming short biographies in the English language. Mr. Pearsall Smith has spared no labour, shirked no difficulties, and possesses all the gifts requisite to the successful accomplishment of his task. Of the five hundred letters which he has selected for publication more than half see the light for the first time.

Diplomatic correspondence, and the greater part of the correspondence printed in these two volumes may be so described, is seldom of high literary quality, though some diplomatists, Talleyrand, for instance, have written with exquisite point and clearness. Sir Henry Wotton, however, was, as his editor remarks, an admirable letter writer, just by reason of the qualities or faults which stood in his way as a statesman and an author. He had the large, easy, desultory temperament, the quick, spontaneous frankness, the taste for human conversation, and the curiosity about trifles which make the good letter writer; and passing, as he did, most of his official career in Venice, that "gowned State" where the clock of public business moved with elaborate slowness, he had time to observe, to reflect, and to divagate. "Among the somewhat formal and colourless epistles of that age," remarks the editor, "his letters are remarkable for their wit, their beauty of phrase, and the impress of his kindly and meditative nature." This is very true. Wotton was first a scholar and a wit, and only in a secondary sense a man of affairs. He had far too great a wealth of sympathy, too keen a zest in life, to be satisfied with any form of pedantic routine. His official reports are dashed with passages of such rich and charming irrelevance that we feel that "the honest man sent to lie abroad for the good of his country" has played truant, and is chasing his own pleasant whim at the expense of his unsuspecting employer. Now he paints a stately portrait of a Doge; now he waxes garrulous over a fire at his palazzo, or describes some small event in the current life of the town, not because it affects the large orb of politics, but because it is human, and the King may be amused to read what is certainly diverting to record. But amidst all this licensed trifling there is a strain of high and serious polemic, spiced here and there with touches of pleasant malice, which show that Wotton was not of the tribe of sombre haters. To every English Protestant of Wotton's generation, and it is worth recalling that Wotton took his degree in the year of the Armada, Rome seemed to be the chief political danger of the time. Here lived the Pope, who moved the armies of Spain and Austria, whose behests were obeyed by thousands of Jesuits and enforced by the cruel power of the Inquisition, who was stealing souls from England and making plans for the reconquest of Germany. Wotton's political ideal was the formation of an anti-Papal League, which should include Venice and Savoy, as well as the Protestant Powers. At one time, with the sanguine temperament which helps to make him so delightful a man, though it somewhat detracted from his efficiency as a politician, he expected to convert Venice to Protestantism, and with this end in view took some pains to distribute copies of the Italian New Testament and other works of an edifying character, such as "Mr. Perkins his Problem." It is true that Venice quarrelled sharply with the Papacy in 1606, and was encouraged in her mutiny by Paolo Sarpi, the famous historian of the Council of Trent. But it needed something more than the suasion of "Mr. Perkins his Problem" to convert the city of San Marco from its Madonna and its saints, its immemorial festivals and joyous processions. The contest with the Papacy, which never extended to dogmatic questions, was composed in a manner most disconcerting to the zealous diplomatist, and the scheme of a Protestant mission to Italy melted into thin air.

Mr. Pearsall Smith justly remarks that Wotton's hostility to Rome was rather political than dogmatic. Religion, "the mistress of all the sciences," had been converted into "the handmaid of ambition," and the machinations of Rome had become a serious menace to the peace and security of the Protestant States. But though it was war to the knife with the Jesuits, Wotton was no professor of Puritan doctrine. It was fortunate indeed that he should have died in 1639, just on the brink of the great probing of the national conscience, and before his chivalrous and pious loyalty had been wounded by the spectacle of an English rebellion. Upon the wanton Scots and their solemn League and Covenant, that "sacred cover of the deepest impiety," the old servant of the Crown pronounced his damnnatory verdict; but he lived to praise Milton's Comus for "a certain Dorique delicacy in its songs and odes," and to give to the great Puritan poet a valedictory blessing expressed with all the golden richness of the Elizabethan age.

Saintliness was no attribute of diplomacy as the art was practised in the seventeenth century, and our Ambassador to Venice, employed spies and bravi, parleyed with cut-throats, secretly robbed the post, and openly defended the execution of Mary Queen of Scots. To few has it been given to taste a richer or more varied experience. He had voyaged with Essex to Cadiz, had desecrated the decaying power of Spain in the Azores, had campaigned among the bogs of Ireland and the "hovering humours" of its mysterious inhabitants. Success had come to him without any of the conventionality which makes success so dull and so encouraging. His first great opportunity rose neither out of an examination nor out of a job, but from an adventure flavoured like an Elizabethan romance; and even when from a central station he was watching the great wheel of European policy, the spice of peril and adventure was never quite absent from his life.

It was fitting that such a man should have a quiet end, and the letters of the last fifteen years, written from the Provost's house at Eton, are the most charming in the collection. Here it is pleasant to imagine the polished old Kentish gentleman as he stands on the river bank, with his friend Izaak Walton, watching till—

"The jealous trout that low did lie,
Rose at the well-dissembled flie,"

And it is not perhaps presumptuous to suspect that after a successful evening in May and a full basket, the ripe old Provost would be communicative to his dear companion; would talk of duck-shooting on the lagoons under a winter sky; or of how he would tend his ripening grapes at the pleasant villa at Noventa; and perhaps also of weightier subjects, too, "of unknown dooms and sudden executions," of his secret conferences with the incomparable Sarpi, of talks with the learned Casaubon, or of solemn audiences in the Collegio, when the Ambassador of England sat covered on the right hand of the Doge, and a secretary took down his every word, and noted every ripple of feeling which passed over his face as a fact of concern for the future of Europe.

A PUMP-ROOM HERO.*

To consecrate a large octavo exclusively to a Biography of Beau Nash would at the present, for anyone under the rank of a genius of the writing order, be little short of a literary misdemeanour. The "King of Bath" might, indeed, have been a remunerative subject for one of Browning's crepuscular "parleyings." But in no modern sense of the term

*"The Life and Letters of Sir Henry Wotton." By Logan Pearsall Smith. 2 vols. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press. 25s. net.

*"Bath Under Beau Nash." By Lewis Melville. Illustrated. Nash. 15s. net.

can Richard Nash, Esquire, be deemed "Life"-worthy. Goldsmith's divertingly written Life was added by Dr. Johnson to his select library, and remains to this day one of the great unread; but the amount of information contained in it is, like Nash's own gold, "spread out as thinly and as far as it would go." To write another full-dress biography after this all-but-failure in the art of literary distension (Goldy only got £14 for his manœuvre) would be to court a deserved and ignominious failure. One might just as well attempt a monograph of similar length upon Joe Miller. The bulk of the material in either case is a book of jests; and such poor, dilapidated old jests many of them are in Nash's case—the mere rag and bone ash of superannuated scrapheaps.

Nor is there anything particularly interesting in the few things we do know personally of Nash. The stories of his youth are, in part, at least, certainly apocryphal. There is little to know of any significance until, in 1705, an adventurer of this name came down to Bath from London with the intention, doubtless, of retrieving his losses among the finished gamblers of the metropolis by playing with the less expert idlers of a small provincial town, marked out by destiny though it proved (and some were already predicting) to become the foremost ville de plaisir, as it already was, in a sense, the most ancient, in the whole realm. Nash's preferment to the post of master of the ceremonies at Bath was in the nature of a pure accident. He acted for a short while as aide-de-camp to his predecessor in that office, which was held, one might well suppose, in very little account. This man, Captain Webster, was killed in a duel within a few weeks of Nash's arrival, and Nash, who had a few Templars to back him, owing to the fact that he had once (in 1695) designed a pageant for the Middle Temple, was offered the post. Good fortune seems to have had the rare effect of benefiting Nash's character. Henceforth, the fortunate adventurer wore a mask of benevolent neutrality, of humorous bonhomie, but, above all, of official detachment. The opportunity was one exactly suited to his faculties. He set himself to provide amusements for the visitors and then to correct the provincial tone of a place, hitherto far too insignificant to have developed a bon ton of its own. A mirror himself, as far as might be, of the fashionable rake, Nash could not but regard with the pity of a great mind the rustic amusements of Bath. The place must reflect, as closely as might be, though with a certain Nash-directed difference, the airs and graces of the great metropolis. In this respect, and in the influence which he exerted as an arbiter in questions of dress and manners, and as an active discountenancer of sword-belts and duels, Nash may be regarded, as he has in fact been regarded by such historians as Lecky and Wyon, in the light of a social pioneer and a humble follower in the train of Locke and Addison, the master-architects of the mind and habit of the eighteenth century. Beyond this there is nothing to adorn the personal tale of Nash and his idiosyncrasy, with the exception of a few ben trovato stories of which this, as well narrated by Mr. Melville, is the best:

"When, one evening, at Willshire's Rooms, Nash was collecting funds for the Hospital, the Duchess of Marlborough entered the room, and, after an abortive endeavour to pass unobserved, tapped him on the shoulder with her fan, and said: 'You must put down a trifle for me, Nash, for I have no money in my pockets.' 'Yes, Madam,' he replied, 'that I will do with pleasure if your Grace will tell me when to stop'; and he took a handful of guineas from his pocket and began to throw them quickly into his white hat—'One, two, three, four, five. . . . 'Hold, hold,' the Duchess exclaimed, 'consider what you are about.' 'Madam,' said Nash, 'consider your rank and fortune. . . . Six, seven, eight, nine, ten.' The Duchess looked very angry, and attempted to interrupt, but Nash would not give her time to speak. 'Pray, compose yourself, Madam, and don't interfere with the work of charity. . . . Eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, fifteen.' The Duchess grew alarmed, and tried to seize his hand. 'Peace, Madam,' said the Beau, with affected dignity, 'you shall have your name written in letters of gold, and upon the front of the building, too. . . . Sixteen, seventeen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty.' 'I won't pay a farthing more,' said the great lady, in a rage. 'Charity covers a multitude of sins,' remarked Nash, calmly; 'Twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five.' 'Nash,' she cried, really alarmed, 'I protest, you frighten me out of my wits. Lord! I shall die.' 'Madam, you will never die with doing good,' he retorted; and then, with a twinkle, added: 'And if you do, it will be the better for you.' He was about to plunge his hand again into his pocket, when, seeing the Duchess had lost all patience, he, after much altercation, compounded with her for a donation of thirty guineas. The Duchess was, or pretended to be, very angry, and when he subsequently came to the card-table, at which she was playing, she addressed him gracefully: 'Stand farther away, you ugly devil, for I hate the sight of you!' But, having a run of good luck, she went up to him later in the evening; 'Come,' she said, 'I will be friends with you, though you are a devil, and, to let you see I am not angry, there are ten more guineas for your charity.'"

Mr. Melville in the present work has adroitly avoided any possible charge of malbiography, for he has used Nash merely as a peg upon which to hang a description of the rise of Bath, and the external aspect of the city and its visitors during the first half of the eighteenth century. The transformation of a nasty little provincial town into a magnificent city, as completed by a series of speculative architects of a rather later date, is an achievement in which Nash undoubtedly had a preliminary share. This process will be found documented after a fashion by means of illustrative extracts in "Bath Under Beau Nash," which ranks accordingly rather as a work of descriptive topography than as a memoir proper. The difficulty of the theme has been enhanced enormously by the lightly-borne care and hard-won thoroughness with which M. Barbeau has gone over a considerable portion of it. But Mr. Melville has also shown a commendable energy in going over the ground, and he has gleaned a large amount of amusingly illustrative matter. There is, of course, a good deal of Anstey and a good deal of "Humphrey Clinker," there is also something too much of "the jests of Beau Nash"; but there is also a great deal of characteristic and out-of-the-way eighteenth century verse satire, while such little known works as Fleming's "Life and Adventures of Timothy Ginnadrake," Lucas's "Lives of the Gamblers," and John Burton's "Iter Bathoniense," are quoted with a certain cumulative effect. The chapters on Bath before Nash, on Nash's civil code, on the Bath Road, on Costumes and Scandals, on Visitors' Impressions, and on the Bath Tables, will thus be of considerable interest to Bath collectors; the select bibliography at the end will likewise be of service, nor must we omit mention of thirteen portraits and views, or of a complete index. The aptitude shown at Bath for the profitable organisation and exploiting of a popular city has hardly been surpassed, one might imagine, either by Brighton or by newer rivals, such as Eastbourne, Bournemouth, or Cromer. Few watering-places, if any, have had so many antiquaries, authors, and poets. Everyone who is interested in Bath during the transitional period of its existence, which corresponds pretty exactly with the so-called "reign" of Beau Nash, will find in the present work an appreciable fraction either of instruction or entertainment.

In going through the book we have noted a few slips, and against the publication of a second edition, which will certainly be called for if all good Bathonians do their duty, we will place them at Mr. Melville's disposal. The early battle which, with considerable hardihood, he locates in the vicinity of Bath was not Mons Bodonicus, but Mons Badon, Badonis, or Badonicus, and the supposed victor was certainly not Alfred but Arthur, some say Ambrosius. The particulars of the subsequent battle of Deorham also need correction. More exact details in regard to the visits of Mary of Modena and of Queen Anne (whose second visit in September, 1702, is the starting point of Bath's modern prosperity) could be obtained in the monograph of Martin Haile and in Boyer's "Annals." An early writer on Bath, whose work should perhaps have been mentioned, is Tobias Venner, a worthy rival in quaintness of his contemporary, Gervase Markham. The place is surely mentioned, too, by Drunken Barnabee. The last couplet on page 3 does not scan, owing, we think, to the word "all" being omitted. Mrs. Delany was formerly Mrs. Pendarves (p. 163). On page 223 "atat senescit" is surely wrong. It was in 1770, not 1700, that Dr. Harington erected the mural tablet in the Abbey (p. 251). On page 285 for Recardi read Ricardi, and 319 for T. B. Smollett read T. G. Smollett, though the second name is as much a dead letter in Smollett's case as in that of Dickens or Borrow. Brambe, on page 151, should of course be Bramble, of immortal memory, and the Princess Amelia, of whom we have a charming portrait (p. 65), was daughter not of George III. but of George II. She was the intended wife of Frederick the Great. The later Amelia, we need hardly remind Mr. Melville, was born in 1783, and

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.SIX NEW 6/- NOVELS.*THE FURNACE. By Miss R. MACAULAY.

"'The Furnace' is a clever and an original story. . . . As we began by saying, it is clever, with a cleverness not too common in English fiction."—The Times.

THE MYOPES. By MARMADUKE PICKTHALL.

"The book is certainly one to read and to think about; it is full of ideas, and the cleverness of it is both consistent and unusual."—The Morning Leader.

TOWARD THE DAWN. By HALLIWELL SUTCLIFFE.

"Mr. Sutcliffe writes with the boldness of one who has looked life in the face, and profited in knowledge. 'Toward the Dawn' is certainly a book not to be missed."—The Yorkshire Daily Post.

ANCESTORS. By GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

"The story surpasses 'Rezanov,' and no one who has read the latter—and who has not?—should miss the new member of Mrs. Atherton's novels."—The Aberdeen Journal.

A NURSE'S BEQUEST. By Dr. LILLIAS HAMILTON.DOWLAND CASTLE. By the EARL OF IDDESLEIGH.J. S. Fletcher's New Work.*THE IVORY GOD, AND OTHER STORIES. By the Author of "Daniel Quayne," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.A New Work by Oliver Onions.*ADMIRAL EDDY. By the Author of "The Compleat Bachelor," "The Odd Job Man," &c. Square Demy 8vo, 6s.ANNALS OF AN ETON HOUSE—With Some Notes on the Evans' Family.

By Major GAMBIER PARRY, Author of "The Life of Reynell Taylor," "Day Dreams," &c. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

THE LIFE AND VOYAGES OF JOSEPH WIGGINS, F.R.G.S.

Modern Discoverer of the Kara Sea Route to Siberia.

By HENRY JOHNSON. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

FOURTEEN YEARS IN PARLIAMENT, 1892-1906.

By A. S. T. GRIFFITH BOSCAWEN, formerly M.P. for the Tonbridge Division of Kent. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"QUAKER AND COURTIER."

Life and Work of William Penn, the Founder of Pennsylvania. By Mrs. COLQUHOUN GRANT, Author of "Queen and Cardinal." With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WITH THE BORDER RUFFIANS.

Memories of the Far West, 1852-1868. By R. H. WILLIAMS, sometime Lieutenant in the Kansas Rangers and afterwards Captain in the Texan Rangers. Edited by E. W. WILLIAMS. With Portrait and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

No. 1.

READY, NOV. 27.

1s. NET.

THE INTERNATIONALA Review of the World's Progress.

THE INTERNATIONAL marks an entirely new departure in Magazine organisation.

THE INTERNATIONAL has a permanent staff of about 250 foreign correspondents, including many of the most famous people in the political, scientific, literary, and religious worlds.

THE INTERNATIONAL will give full particulars of all progressive movements throughout the world, with special articles on the more important questions by the most authoritative writers.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS OF No. 1.

Sweating and Minimum Wage.

By Sir Charles Dilke.

The Spirit of Modern Germany.

By Professor Lamprecht.

The Situation in South Africa.

By H. L. Outhwaite.

Imperial Federation.

By Sir John Cockburn.

The Awakening of Danish Small Holders.

By J. Munch.

Correspondents' Reports from France, Germany, Australia, India, Japan, China, S. America, &c., &c.

Annual Subscription 15s. post free to any part of the World.

T. FISHER UNWIN 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

BEST NEW BOOKS.

IN THE PALACES OF CRETE AND THEIR BUILDERS, DR. ANGELO MOSSO REVIEWS IN SUCCESSION THE BUILDINGS, SCULPTURE, FRESCO AND VASE PAINTINGS OF THE MINOAN AND MYCENÆAN PERIODS. WITH 187 ILLUSTRATIONS AND 2 PLANS. 21s.

READ THE LETTERS OF EDWARD LEAR (AUTHOR OF "THE BOOKS OF NONSENSE") TO CHICHESTER FORTESCUE (LORD CARLINGFORD) AND FRANCES, COUNTESS WALDEGRAVE (1848 TO 1864). EDITED BY LADY STRACHEY (OF SUTTON COURT). WITH A PHOTOGRAPHURE FRONTISPIECE, 3 COLOURED PLATES, AND MANY OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS. 15s. NET.

READ VERNON LEE'S STUDIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ITALY. NEW EDITION WITH A NEW PREFACE, A PHOTOGRAPHURE FRONTISPIECE, AND 40 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS, SELECTED BY DR. GUIDO BIAGI. 21s. NET.

A BOOK ATTRACTING A GREAT DEAL OF ATTENTION IS EDWARD STANLEY'S BEFORE AND AFTER WATERLOO. WITH 5 PHOTOGRAPHURES, 5 COLOURED PLATES, AND 27 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS. 14s. NET.

Book-buyers wishing to see any of these publications before purchasing them may, on sending to Mr. Unwin the name of his local bookseller, have the opportunity of so doing.

N.B.—Please write for a copy of Mr. Unwin's New Illustrated List, also for a specimen copy of "M.A.B." Sent post-free to any address on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, LONDON.

could not possibly have elicited from Nash the reply that "he reigned at Bath, and that there his laws must be kept." The fine and rare portrait of the "Beau" which serves as frontispiece Mr. Melville owes to the kindness of Mr. J. F. Meehan, the well-known Bath bookseller and antiquary.

A LAIRD'S MEMORIES.*

THIS is a bad book which ought to have been a good one. The Duke of Argyll has seen a great deal of the imposing world in which he has lived—its "manners, climates, councils, governments"—has borne some part in action, and is not entirely stripped of intelligence. But he has failed to produce any pleasurable effect of reminiscence. His book is not charming, it is not informing; it has no merit of arrangement; and it does not produce the impression of character which the Duke's father, for example, conveyed in his least attractive mood. Its distinguishing note is a kind of weak censoriousness; it is full of anecdotes, indifferently told, of criticism without weight, of description which rarely hits the mark. The Duke saw many interesting figures at short range—Queen Victoria, Gladstone, Garibaldi, the three German Emperors, Tennyson, Disraeli, his own father. With the exception of a passable picture of Tennyson not one of them lives in these pages. Few of the personal judgments strike one as fine or accurate. Wordsworth's poetry is impertinently described as "placid, philosophic stuff, fit for mental invalids." William Morris is said to have been "not unlike Browning in general appearance." There could not have been a sharper physical contrast than Browning's good and strong, but inexpressive and even heavy face and bearing, and Morris's sparkling eyes and noble forehead, and lightly and beautifully poised head. His father the Duke describes as an orator "better than Gladstone and equal to Bright." This is farcical. The late Duke of Argyll had style, a fine though thin voice, and his face, which slightly resembled Bright's, possessed a delicate, if rather querulous, beauty of expression. But he was not in the rank of either of his two great contemporaries. The Duke relates, quite seriously, his personal efforts to induce Garibaldi to abandon his attempt on Rome. Fawcett, who never spoke foolishly in his life, though sometimes perversely, is said to have talked "his usual amount of nonsense about this [i.e., the public payment of election expenses] enabling poor men to get into Parliament." Of Bright again we gather the sparkling observation that he was "ready to lick the dust off the foreigners' shoes."

A critic of this assurance should be commonly literate. This the Duke is not. He writes of "amocellement" when he means "morcellement"; he spells Stevenson's name Stephenson; speaks of the "Compte de Paris, bête noir"; the "Piazza d'Espagna" and "Monte Citorio"; spells Merivale correctly on one page, incorrectly on the next; talks of "Radzivills" and "Radziwills"; and on two occasions tells the same story twice. Here is a reference to Ireland, equally remarkable for sense and taste: "Her whole financial idea seems so topsy-turvy that one may call it for Ireland the 'murder and turf' theory, a favourite expression among very imaginative friends, who say they hate us when we feed them, and imagine that when separated and we don't feed them they will love us dearly." Leo XIII. was one of the most picturesque figures in Europe; no one who ever saw him in his pontifical robes was likely to forget him. This is how he appeared to the Duke of Argyll: "An old man, having a slight stoop, clad all in white as if he meant to challenge us to a game of tennis. He wore a white skull-cap on the back of his grey head, white flannel over his shoulders, and a white nightgown (sic) over his embroidered slippers." And that the reader may discover the full range of the Duke's accomplishments, this artist in prose presents us with an example of his aptness in verse in the shape of a musical comedy called "The Coach and Six," of which this is the opening stanza:—

BATSMAN: I'm the champion village bat,
What do you say, my girls, to that?
Don't we know the cricket chat?
I'm the champion village bat,

Ranji-singi—right you are,
Slip, and cut, and bowl, Houp-la!
Ne'er a stroke will your bowling bar!
Score as you toe the crease! Houp-la!

The Duke of Argyll was on the skirts of the Italian movement in 1867. He was actually in Rome when Garibaldi's expedition threatened it, saw the French march in, and Garibaldi and his staff headed off by Victor Emmanuel's troops. A little feeling, a sense of the movement of life in those stirring days, would have given colour, if not distinction, to his narrative. It lacks both: but the Duke has his lyrical moment. It occurs whenever he contemplates the Death Duties. They move him to a kind of Scotch passion, in which he appears as a quite vocal, and even half-poetical, Dumbiedikes.

PRIVATE PROPERTY IN WAR.*

THIS little volume is a carefully edited amplification of the essay which won the Yorke Prize at Cambridge last year. Mr. Bentwich takes for his motto the excellent saying of Montesquieu—that peoples should do one another as much good in peace and as little harm in war as possible. We are sorry to observe, however, on reading through his book, that timidity, or caution, or perhaps veneration for his teacher, Professor Westlake, prevents our author from applying this maxim freely to questions at issue. Thus in his chapter on "Proposed Changes in the Laws of War at Sea," he seems to speak with two voices. In one sentence he calls the immunity of private property an "imagined principle," in another he admits that the future may see it adopted, in a third he hopes that the destruction and capture of private property may be eliminated by future international conferences and by the growth of public opinion, while in a fourth he fears that if naval belligerents are restrained from attacking commerce, war will be prolonged and its sufferings increased. Next time Mr. Bentwich writes he should make up his own mind.

Still, we cannot withhold our commendation from a book which provides a brief, accurate, and comprehensive account of laws and practices upon whose ameliorative progress the advance of civilisation and humanity so largely depends. Land warfare has been revolutionised since the age of Grotius. In regular wars between civilised Powers the taint of fighting for private gain has now been quite removed. The first step was the creation of a military code in every civilised State, enforced by every civilised general, by which any soldier who looted the property of non-combatants was severely punished. The last step was the adoption at the first Hague Conference by the assembled Powers of a code which prohibits soldiers from taking the property even of combatants. Until then such booty, snatched by soldiers from soldiers, was divided equally among the victorious army. Now, however, by the Hague Laws (7, 23, and 25) booty is entirely prohibited, and all the personal belongings of prisoners of war, except horses and military papers, are inviolable, and remain the property of such prisoners. Pillage is formally prohibited even when a town is taken by storm, and the only relics of barbarism are in cases of guerilla warfare, where, under plea or pretext of "military necessity," the laws of war "permit an invading army to devastate whole tracts of country, burn dwellings, and clear a whole district of supplies." This was the course taken by Lord Roberts in South Africa, and called a "process of attrition"; but the general outcry of indignation at home, as well as abroad, was so loud, and the military results so inconsiderable, that it may be doubted whether similar methods will be practised in similar cases in the future.

The history of warfare by sea, as Mr. Bentwich correctly observes, does not show the same progress in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as the history of war on land, nor a corresponding reform in the nineteenth. But the Declaration of Paris was a very important step, and it is to be hoped that a future Hague Conference may result in a Naval Convention that will put the laws and procedure of capture at sea on a much more satisfactory basis. Prize money must follow booty into the historical museum.

* "Passages from the Past." By His Grace the Duke of Argyll. Hutchinson & Co. 24s. net.

* "The Law of Private Property in War." By Norman Bentwich. London. Sweet and Maxwell. 6s.

Price per Volume—2s. net in cloth; 3s. net in leather.

(Except Newman's Apologia.)

LONGMANS' POCKET LIBRARY.

"More charming gift-books of the kind could hardly be conceived."

Bookseller.

"There is no more charming 'Pocket Library' now on the market."

Publisher and Bookseller.

"A very acceptable series is Longmans' 'Pocket Library,' bound either in cloth, or leather, as you wish, or as your pocket may dictate."

Daily Chronicle.

TWO NEW VOLUMES.

Ballads and Lyrics of Old France.

With Other Poems.

By ANDREW LANG.

Mr. Lang's "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France" was first published in 1871, and has been out of print for many years.

THE WRONG BOX.

By R. L. STEVENSON & LLOYD OSBOURNE.

The following Volumes are also now ready:—

F. ANSTEY.

Voces Populi. First Series. With 20 Illustrations by J. BERNARD PARTRIDGE.

J. A. FROUDE.

Short Studies on Great Subjects. Five Volumes.

RICHARD JEFFERIES.

The Story of my Heart: My Autobiography. With Portrait.

ANDREW LANG.

New and Old Letters to Dead Authors.

J. W. MACKAIL (Edited by).

Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology (Greek Text only).

WILLIAM MORRIS.

The Life and Death of Jason: a Poem.

R. L. STEVENSON.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, with other Fables.

A Child's Garden of Verses.

More New Arabian Nights—The Dynamiter.

STANLEY WEYMAN.

The House of the Wolf.

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

JOHN HENRY,

CARDINAL NEWMAN.

Apologia pro vita sua.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

We are announcing here only three books out of our entire catalogue, and if these appeal to you, please drop us a postcard, and we will send you our 4-pp. Selection List. The first book to which we draw your attention here is one entitled:—

FARMER GEORGE

By LEWIS MELVILLE.

With 53 Illustrations, including 2 coloured plates.

In 2 vols. 24s. net.

"Mr. Lewis Melville's two portly volumes, abundantly illustrated, are so agreeably written that they can be cordially recommended . . . of its kind nothing could be better done than his 'Farmer George.'"—Daily Mail.

The next book is a fascinating and sensational story of the Twenty-first Century, called:—

Lord of the World.

By Robert Hugh Benson.

6s.

"Clever and significant sensationalism, which makes this book more interesting than anything that Father Benson has yet given us."—Daily News.

The last book to call your attention to is a really indispensable vade mecum for everyone, viz.:—

PITMAN'S

WHERE TO LOOK

AN EASY GUIDE TO BOOKS OF REFERENCE

1s. net.

"To business men and to all who have an interest or share in public work it will save many a fruitless search and much annoying waste of time."—Tribune.

The above books will give you some idea of the variety which characterises our catalogue. We think it will interest you to see this, and hope you will send us a post card asking for a copy. If you are interested in any particular class of book, such as books for business men, ask also for Catalogue B or G, which will give you some ideas as to a suitable gift book for a man.

SIR ISAAC PITMAN AND SONS LTD.,

No. 1, Amen Corner, London, E.C.

The Duma and the Revolution.

THE BEST BOOK ON RUSSIA

issued in recent years is unquestionably

PRINCE KROPOTKIN'S

Autobiography—with a new Introductory Chapter by the Author, and a Preface by George Brandes—

MEMOIRS OF A REVOLUTIONIST

"In this volume," says Dr. Brandes, "will be found a combination of all the elements out of which an eventful life is composed—

Idyll and Tragedy, Drama and Romance.

Parts of his narrative, from the very nature of the events he has to tell, are more intensely exciting than anything in those novels which aim only at being sensational."

"This delightful book," says the Athenæum, "will never be out of date."

New, Cheaper, and Enlarged Edition,
Crown 8vo, 6/-

LONDON: SWAN SONNENSCHN.

No. 1. NOW READY. No. 1.

THE NEW QUARTERLY

A Review of Science and Literature.

Edited by DESMOND MACCARTHY.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:

LORD RAYLEIGH (President of the Royal Society).

How do we perceive the Direction of Sound?

The Note Books of SAMUEL BUTLER (the author of "Erewhon").

MAX BEERBOHM. On Fires.

HON. R. J. STRUTT, F.R.S. Can we Detect our Drift through Space?

HON. BERTRAND RUSSELL. The Study of Mathematics.

STURGE MOORE. Baudelaire.

G. L. STRACHEY. The Last Elizabethan.

G. A. PALEY. Biology and Politics.

ARTHUR SYMONS. A Triptych of Poets.

Half-a-Crown Net. Yearly Subscription, 10s. post free.

Prospectus and subscription forms post free from—

J. M. DENT & Co., 29 & 30, Bedford Street, LONDON, W.C.

A NEW ENGLAND TYPE.*

"MASKED BATTERIES" would be a more appropriate title for Mrs. Sedgwick's novel than "Valerie Upton," or the sentimental variation "A Fountain Sealed," which the American edition has been christened. For the first few chapters the author holds her hand very cleverly, and lures the careless reader into the belief that she is going to paint the portrait of a self-indulgent and frivolous, though charming woman, with the severe touch and high rectitude of a New England moralist. And then suddenly the batteries open fire, the ethical forces are enfiladed, taken in flank, and such a withering storm of shell is poured on the position held by the young puritan girl, Imogen Upton, that the New England moralists are driven from the field, leaving their bag, baggage, and reputation in the saute qui peut. The subject of the novel—the secret hostility and spiritual conflict between a mother and daughter—is worth reading more for the entertaining analysis of feminine motive than for the delicacy of the artistic treatment. That being said, we can cordially recommend the novel to all our readers.

The portrait of Valerie Upton, the heroine, is an extremely subtle piece of drawing. Indeed, could the author have forced herself to elaborate with as much skill and fairness the picture of Valerie's daughter, Imogen, the novel might have ranked as a high achievement of psychological insight. But Mrs. Sedgwick has not been able to bring herself to execute but a cruel exposure of this self-righteous young person. She hates Imogen with the cordial hatred of a woman to whom self-centredness and cold-heartedness are the least pardonable of feminine sins, and positively detestable when masked by a spirituality which seeks to "improve" people for its own glorification. The figure of Imogen has the satiric force of a caricature, but she is a type of the egoism which cloaks in moral formulas its unreal spiritual conceptions. The hardness, coldness, and shallowness of American transcendentalism is transfixed by the author's feminine shafts.

Valerie, who, as a young girl, has had a European education, has married the mediocre Mr. Upton, a Boston social reformer, who has exceedingly bored his wife and everybody else with his unending platitudes. Valerie has not been able to stand her husband's futility beyond a certain point, and has left him in New York with his daughter Imogen, and has come to England, where she lives "a semi-detached life" with English friends. Her oldest friend is her landlord and neighbour, Sir Basil Thremdon, with whom she is on platonic terms of affectionate sympathy. But a letter from Imogen announcing Mr. Upton's death recalls her to America, and reawakens her uneasy conscience that she has not done her duty by her daughter, although the latter from girlhood has always sided with her father and been very determined to "form her own character." Valerie accordingly quits her Surrey cottage to rejoin Imogen, leaving Sir Basil asserting that it is his intention to pay a visit to America before long; and she finds that her daughter is prepared to make her "one of her objects" and is ready to "help her to grow with all the strength and love there is in me." But these are only lip phrases. Imogen is odious in her spiritual patronage of her mother, odious in her self-righteousness, odious in her pose of universal benefactress. Indeed, so incurably false is this girl that we ask ourselves could her adoring fiancé Jack Pennington, who is "the ripe fruit of an ancestry of high endeavour and high responsibility," have possibly been taken in by her, as he is taken in till Valerie's arrival? Imogen, with her large calm eyes, always filled with the radiance of mild pity and magnanimity, accepts Jack's perpetual homage to her spiritual perfection, while she remains unmoved by the appeal of his emotion or passion. In fact she sees herself, in her half-deliberate pose, as superior to the lower and selfish instincts of personal passion. "The depth, but not the tumult of the soul," is her favourite line, and she expects Jack to live on admiration of her beneficence, her spiritual radiance, her loving power, till the day comes when she will stoop to sacrifice herself to him and become his wife. This portrait of a priggish young girl will seem exaggerated to the English reader, but we suppose the author has had models from which to construct her typical figure. Valerie's cunning, however, opens Jack's eyes. First of all he sees her with the critical hostility of her daughter's glance, but insensibly her charm and exquisite graciousness win him over to her side, and he begins to penetrate into Imogen's mind, with her mother's smiling knowledge. Certainly Mrs. Sedgwick has a gift for indicating the magical secrets of personality, as the following passage will show:

"Valerie showed them thus more fully, the grace, the freshness, the look of latent buoyancy that made her so young, that made her, even now, in her black dress and with her gravity, remind one of a flower submerged, momentarily, in deep water, its colour hardly blurred, its petals delicately crisp, its fragrance only needing air and sunlight to diffuse itself. For all the youthfulness, the quality of indolent magic was about her, a soft haze, as it were, woven of matured experience, of detachment from youth's self-absorption, of the observer's kindly, yet ironic insight. Her figure was supple; her nut-brown hair, splendidly folded at the back of her head, was hardly touched with white; her quickly glancing, deliberately pausing eyes were as clear, as pensive, as a child's, with almost a child's candour of surprise in the upturning of their lashes. A brunette duskiest in the rose of lips and cheeks, in the black brows, in the fruitlike softness of outline, was like a veil drawn across and dimming the fairness that paled to a pearly white at throat and temples. Her upper lip was ever so faintly shadowed with a brunette pencilling of down, and three grains de beauté, like tiny patches of velvet, seemed applied with a pretty coquetry, one on her lip and two high on her cheek, where they emphasised and lent a touch of the Japanese to her smile. Even her physical aspect carried out the analogy of something vivid and veiled. She was clear as day, yet melting, merged, elusive like the night; and in her glance, in her voice, was that mingled brightness and shadow."

It is only poetic justice that Imogen's pose of spiritual superiority should be in the end her own undoing, for when Jack, in his clumsy masculine way, begins to defend Valerie from her daughter's persistent disparagement, the latter descends to all the ruses of a mortified feminine vanity from which she has claimed to be exempt. What is cleverly done in the novel is the analysis of the swift process of disenchantment in Jack's mind. And even better done is the descent of the "frosty, white-souled, high-principled Imogen," into the dark, fierce region of personal jealousy. She begins to hate her mother with fervent intensity because the latter, all unwittingly, has come between her and Jack, and she deliberately retaliates by luring away the simple-hearted and rather stupid Sir Basil when he turns up in America in fulfilment of his pledge. Imogen stoops to the baseness of using every weapon in the feminine armoury to make Sir Basil marry her instead of her mother, and in spite of Jack's frantic endeavours, her youth and beauty prevail, and she snatches at her prey and carries him off triumphantly.

The two main defects in "Valerie Upton" are, first, the over-emphatic strokes in the picture of Imogen's spiritual self-complacency, and her almost incredible tone of "self-centred rightness" in her conversations with Jack; and secondly, the author's tendency to use her male characters as mere instruments of feminine purpose. Both Jack and Sir Basil are really too simple, and we are left only half-convinced that the Englishman could have been fatuous enough to let Imogen's beauty and wiles blot out for him Valerie's charm. This being said, we have no fault to find with the author's merciless dissection of Imogen's motives. She is the type of feminine pharisaism. Valerie, we think, is made to be a little too kind to her daughter, a little too resigned to letting Sir Basil slip permanently out of her life. Indeed, Mrs. Sedgwick may be charged with having herself an ethical purpose, lying hid in what is ostensibly a pure work of art. But the novel will leave its mark on the reader.

* "Valerie Upton." By Anne Douglas Sedgwick. Constable & Co. 6s.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LADY DOROTHY NEVILL.Edited by Ralph Nevill. 8vo. 15s. net.WILLIAM ALLINGHAM: A Diary.Edited by H. Allingham and D. Radford. 8vo. 12s. net.THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO.By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. Patterson, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMMON SENSE. By Frederic Harrison.

Extra crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.Republished from "THE OBSERVER."By Austin Harrison. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.The Athenæum:—"The book is written with great knowledge of modern German politics."THE LITTLE CITY OF HOPE.A Christmas Story. By F. Marion Crawford. Globe 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN KENT.By Walter Jerrold.Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON. Extra Crown 8vo. 6s. [Tuesday.]CRANFORD SERIES.—New Volume.*SILAS MARNER. By George Eliot.With Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo. Cloth extra, with gilt edges, 6s.THE GLOBE LIBRARY.—New Volume.*THE POETICAL WORKS OF JOHN KEATS.Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by William T. Arnold. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.; also limp leather, 5s. net.MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.*A READABLE WEEKLY."Public Opinion" was very much prized by Thomas Carlyle, and was one of the last journals he read, said Dr. W. R. Nicoll, in "The British Weekly."PUBLIC OPINION*TWOPENCE, WEEKLY.Edited by PERCY L. PARKER."Public Opinion" is eminently a readable paper. There is no padding in it. It is a paper which exists to put on record the ideas which men are thinking, and especially the ideas which make for Religious, Intellectual, Political, and Social Progress as these are recorded in the world's books, papers, and magazines.It is a paper specially suited for those who exert public influence—for "Public Opinion" does not reflect one side of life only—it seeks to cover all sides of thought and opinion.It is the bare truth to say that there is no other paper published in Great Britain which every week contains such stimulus to thought, or such a vast amount of real information presented lucidly and in a readable type."Public Opinion" is published every Friday, and its price is Twopence. It has been in existence 47 years."Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—"PUBLIC OPINION,"*30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.Specimens sent free on application.THE INQUIRER*ONE PENNY WEEKLY.*A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION*Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.*Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.*News of Churches and Societies.*SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:*6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTEROffices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.The Economist.(ESTABLISHED 1843.)*Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.*A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 9d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and at all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Week in the City.

THERE have been several ups and downs during the week, but the downs have predominated, and towards the close quite a sickly feeling prevailed in the City. The truth is that the wonderful manufacturing activity in the North of England has not been fully reflected in London, which has by no means recuperated itself for the frightful losses of capital caused by the Boer War and the subsequent shrinkage of securities. The pressure of high taxation is also felt, and there is no longer much room for doubt that trade is on the verge of a serious decline. The spell of very dear money has only just begun, and one of the highest banking authorities in the City whom I consulted on Thursday expressed a conviction that we should not see any sort of ease until the spring. That the situation in America is no better seems to be proved by the premium on currency. It is, however, possible, I think, that relief may come sooner than is expected if Congress decides upon an issue of greenbacks. Such an issue, I think, would soon send gold streaming back to Europe. But its consequences in the States would not be wholesome.

GERMANY AND THE HAMBURG FAILURES.

There is much nervousness in the City about the position of the German banks, and the feeling has been accentuated by the news of another serious failure in Hamburg, which came on Thursday afternoon. The worst of mercantile failures in Germany is that the banks are nearly always heavily involved, because they invest far more of their capital and deposits in speculative firms and companies than would be considered proper in England. Unluckily, these failures come at a very inopportune moment, because the Reichsbank is in a weaker position than it has ever been in since its foundation. It is pretty clear that the German system of an elastic paper issue subject to a small tax is liable to great abuse, and has contributed to the inflation from which German credit and industry are now suffering. The Imperial Government, however, seems to be quite blind to the seriousness of the situation, and is piling up expenditure and debt in a light-hearted fashion as if no day of reckoning were at hand. Under the circumstances, investors who have subscribed to German loans should clear out at once, and put their money into some other Government security which is less likely to depreciate in value.

AMERICAN BONDS AND SHORT-TERM NOTES.

A New York broker, after stating in a circular dated November, that "a steady improvement in money conditions and general confidence is in progress," proceeded to print the following remarks, which really deserve reproduction if only to show what prophecies may come out of an alliance between conceit and stupidity:—

"In connection with the financial situation which recently developed, it is well to remember:—

"That millions of gold are being shipped from abroad to the United States, and the National Government would have continued to use its enormous resources to aid the New York banks had it been necessary. The Government is still co-operating in a broader way by providing facilities for an increase in circulation.

"That the financial institutions of New York City, and especially the Clearing House, have met the emergency in a manner not only inspiring confidence, but indicating their great resources and their ability to meet severe financial strain by concerted action.

"That the banks throughout the country which still rely largely on the eastern money centres are in better condition to maintain themselves than ever before.

"That our trade balances are still the envy of nations—exports for the month of September reaching $135,353,715 and imports $106,361,552.

"That from agricultural sources alone the country has increased its wealth between six and seven billion dollars during the past year.

"That the railroads are in excellent physical condition and continue to show large earnings."

The broker then points out that "at the present moment all standard railroad issues are selling at the lowest prices witnessed in many years. Recent sensational declines are no measure of intrinsic value, but are caused by the immediate necessities of sellers. Many gilt-edged and hitherto inactive securities have been thrown on the market, with the result of an average decline in bond values for the month of October of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. At the present level of prices it would seem inevitable that there should be an enormous absorption of high grade bonds."

With regard to Government bonds, he points out toward the end of the month a new factor, materially affecting the prices of these, was introduced. As National Bank circulation was $300,000,000 short of the amount permitted by the statutes, and as it was desirable to increase it by reason of the prevailing money situation, the Secretary of the Treasury decided at the close of September to receive other than Government bonds as security for public deposits, provided the released Government bonds were pledged as security for additional circulation.

"This would set free for that purpose $90,000,000 Governments. It may be noted in this connection that the Treasury Department has ready for distribution to National Banks on presentation of the required security $20,000,000 bank notes, and as the privilege accorded by the Secretary is being promptly availed of by the banks, a material increase of circulation will quickly follow from this source.

"The urgent need for bonds for the additional circulation referred to above, resulted in an active demand for 2s. and 3s., which carried the prices of these issues to 107 and 102 $\frac{1}{2}$, respectively, with very few bonds offered. The effect of the Secretary's decision will, without doubt, continue into November and result in a further advance in prices."

With a view to aiding his clients "in their consideration of investments at the present low level of prices," the New York broker gives the following interesting list of short-term notes, with prices and yields, as they stood at the beginning of the month:—

	Present Price with Interest.	Yield About.	Price at time of Issue (with Interest).	Yield About.
American Telephone & Telegraph Co.... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest January and July, Due January, 1910	91	9 $\frac{7}{10}$	97 $\frac{1}{2}$	5 $\frac{9}{10}$
Atlantic Coast Line Railroad ... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest March and September, Due March, 1910 (b)	91 $\frac{1}{2}$	9 $\frac{1}{10}$	97	6 $\frac{1}{10}$
Chesapeake & Ohio Railway ... Collateral Trust Three Year 6 per cent. Notes, Interest January and July, Due July, 1910	96 $\frac{1}{2}$	7 $\frac{5}{10}$	98 $\frac{1}{2}$	6 $\frac{5}{10}$
Chicago & Western Indiana Railroad ... Three Year 5 per cent. Collateral Trust Notes, Interest February and August, Due February, 1910 (d)	95	7 $\frac{5}{10}$	97 $\frac{1}{2}$	5 $\frac{9}{10}$
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railway ... Four Year 5 per cent. Gold Notes, Interest June and December, Due June, 1911 (b)	94	6 $\frac{9}{10}$	96 $\frac{1}{2}$	6 $\frac{1}{10}$
Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Rly.... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest February and August, Due February, 1910 (a)	95 $\frac{1}{2}$	7 $\frac{1}{10}$	100	6 $\frac{1}{10}$
Louisville & Nashville Railroad ... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest March and September, Due March, 1910 (b)	93	8 $\frac{5}{10}$	97	5 $\frac{1}{10}$
Michigan Central Railroad ... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest February and August, Due February, 1910 (b)	93	8 $\frac{5}{10}$	100	5 $\frac{1}{10}$
New York Central & Hudson River Railroad ... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest February and August, Due February, 1910 (a)	96	7 $\frac{1}{10}$	100	5 $\frac{1}{10}$
New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad ... Five Year 5 per cent. Notes, Interest January and July 9th, Due January 9th, 1912 (c) (Denominations of \$5,000 and upwards).	99 $\frac{1}{2}$	5 $\frac{1}{10}$	100	5 $\frac{1}{10}$
Pennsylvania Railroad ... Three Year 5 per cent. Notes, Secured, Interest March and September 15th, Due March 15th, 1910 (Denominations of \$5,000 and upwards) (b)	94	8 $\frac{1}{10}$	99 $\frac{1}{2}$	5 $\frac{2}{10}$

(a) Legal investments for savings banks in Maine and New Hampshire; (b) in New Hampshire; (c) in Maine, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire; (d) in Connecticut.

I notice that on Tuesday there was marked weakness of the bond market in Wall Street, which was credited largely to liquidation of bonds by savings banks, preparatory to possible withdrawals of deposits on the expectation of the thirty-day notices. Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific Fours fell very heavily.

LUCCELLUM.

Restful nights

and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon

Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

BEFORE Purchasing any Bookcase, see the "GUNN," which is sure to Please you in Every Respect. Built up in Sections—one at a time; each Part a Complete Bookcase fitted with Sliding Glass Doors. Additional Sections can be attached either Vertically or Horizontally.

The "Gunn" is the Best

Handsome Appearance, First-Class Cabinet Work, and Excellent Material throughout.

Write for Descriptive Booklet No. 16, giving Illustrations of the Various Styles with Full Particulars and Prices, sent Post Free on Request.

Wm. ANGUS & Co., Ltd.,
63, Paul St., Finsbury, London, E. C.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION

OF YOUR

GAS ENGINE

GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE
& BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

A cocoa of high repute.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire, proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Tel.-phone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 8/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

CATALOGUES
POST FREE.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible,"

CASH DISCOUNT,
3d. in 1s.

"Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE!

A. LIONEL ISAACS, 5, Pall Mall, S.W.
(CARLTON HOTEL BUILDING).

Choice Books.
Rare Autographs and MSS.
Pictures and Prints.

CATALOGUES ISSUED.

TELEPHONE: 1784 CENTRAL.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each). Saint Jude's Depot, Birmingham.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

APPOINTMENT.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON,
Goldsmiths College (Day Training Department).

A MATHEMATICAL LECTURER (WOMAN) will shortly be required in the above Department. Salary £175. Applications must be received not later than Saturday, December 7th, 1907. Particulars may be obtained from the Warden, Goldsmiths College, New Cross, S.E.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

OHINGFORD, ESSEX.

ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the under-mentioned posts:—

TWO ASSISTANT MISTRESSES at the Sydenham Secondary School, to teach Geography, Arithmetic, English, for junior classes, and games.

The salaries attaching to the posts will commence at £120 a year and rise by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than the minimum stated above will be allowed if the candidates appointed have had satisfactory experience.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, L.C.C. Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, December 9th, 1907, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
November 20th, 1907.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of an ASSISTANT MISTRESS for Junior Form work, experienced in teaching general subjects, at the Paddington Technical Institute Secondary School.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £120 a year, and rise by annual increments of £10 to a maximum of £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than the minimum stated above will be allowed if the successful applicant has had satisfactory experience.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, London County Council Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, December 9th, 1907, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
November 19th, 1907.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 800 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rountree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

The next ENTRANCE EXAMINATION will be held at the SCHOOL on DECEMBER 3RD & 4TH.

For particulars of admission on the FOUNDATION apply to the HEADMASTER.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEYOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM. LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD RD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—Entries close December 3rd.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I.
OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

SELECTED
TITLES FROMCHATTO & WINDUS'SLIST OF AUTUMN BOOKS

Please send Postcard for their complete List of New Publications.

Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS have pleasure in inviting all interested in the Art of the Early Italian, Early Flemish, and Early German Painters, to their Exhibition of Reproductions in Coloured Collotype after the Masters of these Schools, at the Bruton Gallery, November 26th to December 24th, 10-6; Saturdays, 10-4. Admission on Presentation of Visiting Card.

Prof. D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., writes

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS,

Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans.

Mr. W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S., "supply" Water-Colour Drawings, 105 Large-Paper copies, bound whole Parchment, 42s. net; large fcap. 8vo, cloth, 20s. net.

LISBON AND CINTRA,

With some Account of other Cities and Historic Sites in Portugal, Contains almost as many English as Portuguese Names. By A. C. INCHBOLD. Water-Colour Drawings by STANLEY INCHBOLD. Large fcap. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, D.Litt., Litt.D., translates, with Introduction and Notes,

THE PARADISE OR GARDEN OF THE HOLY FATHERS,

As compiled by ATHANASIUS, PALLADIUS, ST. JEROME, and others, A.D. 250-400. "A book for all men interested in man." 2 vols. extra crown, 8vo, 15s. net.

TUSCAN FEASTS AND TUSCAN FRIENDS,

By D. N. LEES, is a real book, "written with a fine literary touch, by one who knows modern Tuscany and its people at first hand. Its twelve illustrations, the Outlook says, "are excellent." Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Publishers, sincerely apologising for its late appearance, WILL ISSUE THIS WEEK Plate VI. in

The Medici Series : THE ANNUNCIATION, BY LORENZO DI CREDI.

The Colour Surface, 17½ by 19 inches, represents one-half the original dimensions. 15s. net.

They have just issued Occasional Plate I., THE VIRGIN, BY FILIPPO LIPPI.

Colour Surface, 13¾ by 10 inches. 10s. 6d. net.

[Please apply for detailed prospectus.]

FOUR-COLOUR REPRODUCTIONS.

PERUGINO. THE CRUCIFIXION, after the Triptych in the Convent of Sta. Maria del Pazzi, Florence. Gold Frame (17 by 11 in.) and dark mount, 5s.; oak frame and oak mount, 3s. 6d.; mounted only, 1s. 6d.; unmounted, 1s.

GIORGIONE. THE VIRGIN ENTHRONED BETWEEN SAINTS, after the altar-piece at Castelfranco. Gold frame, dark mount, 3s. 6d.; oak frame, oak mount, 2s. 6d.; mounted only, 9d unmounted, 6d.

Postage extra.

"DAPHNE," says the Athenæum,

"Is a delightful little book—a real fantasy—about Italy.....Miss Sherwood has felt and expressed delightfully the unforgettable beauty of the country about Rome.Altogether it is a charming book."

BY

MARGARET SHERWOOD,

3s. 6d.

THE NEW MÆDÆVAL LIBRARY.

The first three volumes are translated from the middle French by ALICE KEMP-WELCH, who also furnishes Notes and an Introduction. Size 6¼ by 4¾ in., boards 5s. net; whole pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net

- I. THE BOOK OF THE DUKE OF TRUE LOVERS.
- II. OF THE TUMBLER OF OUR LADY AND OTHER MIRACLES
- III. THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI.

Nos. I.-III. this week.—Other volumes in preparation.

Each volume contains photograph reproductions of the illustrations contained in the Works reprinted. Each volume further contains a title page engraved upon wood, after notable contemporary examples."

ALICE IN WONDERLAND

Illustrated by MILLICENT SOWERBY.

Extra Crown 8vo, 12 Coloured Plates, 5s. net.

The only new edition sanctioned by the owners of the copyright and Messrs. Macmillan & Co.

What the Press says about ALICE :

Scotsman.—"There is room for much praise of Miss Sowerby's coloured and line drawings. They are cleverly drawn and brightly coloured, and the book is altogether a pretty gift-book for any child of imagination and humour."

Gloucester Journal.—"It is a charming work. And what of these illustrations by Miss Sowerby? It is a pleasure to say at once that they are delightful.....the artist shows at once a sympathy and power which justify this new set of illustrations."

WOMEN OF FLORENCE.

During and Prior to the Cinquecento.

By PROFESSOR ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. With 26 Illustrations, 2 in Colour, mostly portraits, after the Old Masters. Cinquecento Binding and Title Designs, extra crown 8vo, parchment, 10s. 6d. net; buckram, 7s. 6d. net.

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.

By E. L. SEELEY. Uniform with and continuing "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari," is based upon Vasari, Lanzi, Ridolfi, and the Chronicles. Cinquecento Binding and Title Designs, with 8 Coloured and 24 Half-Tone Illustrations, buckram, 7s. 6d. net. With 4 Additional Coloured Plates and Woodcut Frontispiece in Colours parchment, 15s. net; vellum, 20s. net; morocco, 30s. net.

[Shortly.]

NEW NOVELS.

Copper Under the Gold
The Pagan Woman
The Cable-Man
The Conqueress
Shakespeare's Sweetheart
The City of Pleasure
Lord Cammarleigh's Secret
Vanity
The Windfall
The Inevitable Law
My Lady of Whims

By E. F. ALMAZ
By NORMA LORIMER
By WEATHERBY CHESNEY
By GEORGES OHNET
By SARAH H. STERLING
By ARNOLD BENNETT
By ROY HORNIMAN
By PAUL and VICTOR MARGUERITE
By CHARLES EGBERT CRADDOCK
By F. E. PENNY
By FLORENCE WARDEN

THREE-AND-SIXPENCE.

The Mystery of Mary Anne
Three Speeds Forward

By GEORGE R. SIMS
By LLOYD OSBOURNE

FOR THE YOUNG.

By M. SOWERBY, each with 12 Coloured Plates;
CHILDHOOD, 3s. 6d. net; BUMBLETOES, 1s. 6d. net.
By HELEN H. WHITNEY, THE BEDTIME BOOK, 5s. net. THE STORY OF SCRACCLES, A SPARROW, by G. W. JAMES, 2s. 6d. THE CHILD-LOVERS' CALENDAR, 1908, 1s. net. THE DUMPY BOOKS FOR CHILDREN, 36 Titles to select from, 1s. net each, also shortly, THE LAMB SHAKESPEARE (illustrated), vols. 1 and 3, 1s. 6d. net.

CHATTO and WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 9.]

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage : U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 289	"Who are Members of the Church of England?" By H. J. Bardsley and J. F. W. ... 306
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Wanted, a New Honours List. By R. S. Fraser ... 307
The Advantage of Liberalism ... 292	A Foreign Affairs Committee. By Noel Buxton ... 307
The Cost of Old-Age Pensions ... 293	Sunday Letters in London. By Alfred Marks ... 308
Two German Legends ... 294	Belgians and the "Grand Challenge Cup. By "Fair-play." ... 308
The Decline of the Oxford Movement ... 295	"Ireland and Liberalism." By "A Protestant Elector" ... 308
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	Flogging in India. By Joseph Collinson ... 308
The Dislike of the Intellectual ... 297	Ruskin Hall. By P. J. Dear ... 309
The Heart of the Hebrews ... 298	Supply of Female Labour. By B. Brookesbank ... 309
The Choice of Books ... 299	POETRY:—
Trouble Among the Trout ... 300	Soul and Body. By Lascelles Abercrombie ... 309
THE DRAMA:—	REVIEWS:—
The Censored Play ... 301	Studies in Poetry. By Prof. Dowden ... 310
OPEN QUESTIONS:—	George Meredith ... 310
The Four-fold Path of Socialism. By J. A. H. ... 302	The Translation of Horace ... 311
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 304	Petrarch ... 312
Books to be Read ... 304	Delightful Gossip ... 313
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	A Story of Spain in the Sixties ... 314
Industrial Arbitration. By Joshua Rowntree ... 305	Books in Brief ... 316
Mr. Galsworthy and Woman Suffrage. By G. Calderon ... 305	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 320
"The Ruin of Macedonia." By T. Palmer Newbould ... 305

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Portuguese crisis, since King Carlos told the "Temps" that the Dictator, Senhor Franco, had his ungrudging support and a free hand for two years to come, is now more than ever a dynastic conflict. The Republicans are gaining ground, especially in the two large towns, but it is doubtful whether they have a plan of action. The Royalist parties are all united against the Dictatorship, but divided as to tactics. Some think they can induce the King to throw over Senhor Franco; others would prefer to depose him and put the Crown Prince in his place. Their plan of campaign was to get Parliament together in January, ignoring the refusal of the King and the Dictator to summon it. But unless rumour greatly exaggerates the unrest, the climax can hardly be postponed so long. The rigid censorship is itself an evidence of considerable tension. Senhor Franco has now suppressed practically every independent newspaper. He has also decreed that all political offences shall be tried by the machinery applicable only to anarchist crimes, namely, by a special court, sitting without a jury. Some three hundred of his opponents have been deported without trial.

* * *

ONE of the few surviving newspapers, which, of course, supports the Dictatorship, has called for English intervention to save the dynasty, and a leading article in the same sense, which appeared in the "Daily Express," suggests that wires are being pulled in London. Even if it were clear that the King deserved our sympathy, we have no right to intervene. Senhor Franco, a politician who has served in every party in turn, has no claims to Liberal support or sympathy. It is true that other politicians before him have violated the Constitution, but they acted at least with the support of one of the two governing parties. He stands alone, supported only by the King. His method has been one of colossal bribery. At a moment of exceptional financial stringency, he has sought to buy power, by legalising the secret "advances" made by his predecessors to the King, by largely increasing the Civil List, and by raising the salaries of officers and civil functionaries. Even if he were the sincere and strong reformer, which the "Times" and the Harmsworth press take him to be, it is obvious that he cannot reform without popular support. He can only maintain himself by coercion. As for the King, his part in Portuguese politics has always been to arrange that the party in power should allow him to use the national purse as his own. The sovereign who played for popularity during the Serpa Pinto affair in 1891, by publicly refusing the Garter, is said to be the firm friend of England. The fact that he is a friend of our Court would give us no right to save his throne for him, if his people are really determined to be rid of him. Nobody interfered when Portugal went bankrupt in 1892, and no sufficient interest would require us to interfere to-day, even if the crisis should develop into civil war—an eventuality by no means probable.

* * *

THE German Government addressed itself on Thursday to defending its high naval policy and foreshadowing the heavy load of taxation which it implies. Baron von Stengel had to deal with the double difficulty of German finance, which includes two deficits, the first an extraordinary one of £15,000,000, due to so-called capital expenditure on military and naval works; the other of £6,000,000, reduced to £5,000,000 by the miserable device of laying hands on the sinking fund. Baron von Stengel hardly disguised the peril of the situation. His statement, says the "Telegraph," was "a recital of errors, miscalculations, disappointed hopes, increasing expenditure, enormous deficits, burdensome new taxes, and general pecuniary embarrassments." He admitted a failure in many branches of indirect taxation under the benign rule of a broad-based Protectionist tariff, such as Mr. Balfour proposes to inflict on this hapless land. Thus the tax on railway tickets has broken down, because a large body of passengers now travel fourth class, on which there is no duty, instead of third class, on which the duty lies. The need for economy was "urgent," yet fresh outlay on the army and navy was vital. The Baron hinted at further indirect taxes on spirits, sugar, and tobacco. The attitude of parties to this programme is menacing and confused. The Centre Party declare against spirit monopolies, and say that the new burdens must not be borne by the poor; the Conservatives will not have direct taxation at any price; the Radicals and Socialists oppose an extension of the crushing indirect imposts. A reduction of the swollen Navy Estimates is almost certain.

* * *

THE Prussian Diet met on Wednesday, and Prince Bülow, in a speech of extraordinary cynicism, introduced a Bill to authorise the compulsory expropriation of the Polish landowners in Polish Prussia, in order to facilitate the settlement of German colonists on their land. He declared that Prussian policy in this matter is still that of Frederick the Great, and intimated that there can be no thought of leniency until German racial ascendancy is firmly established. From 17 to 20 millions are to be spent in this scheme of "plantation." Despite this cruel and reactionary policy, Prince Bülow is still able to rely on the support of the so-called Radicals. The Socialists, meanwhile, are renewing their agitation for the reform of the Prussian franchise, which Bismarck himself described as the worst in the world. The Radicals, though theoretically in favour of reform, will not co-operate with the Socialists, preferring a Conservative alliance. The Prussian, like the Imperial Budget, shows a heavy deficit; fresh taxation and fresh borrowing will be necessary in both cases. Imperialism, alike in its naval, colonial, and anti-Polish aspects, is proving to be a ruinously costly adventure.

* * *

Mr. ASQUITH replied on Tuesday, with great judgment and spirit, to four deputations—from the Free Church Council, and from the representatives of workmen's clubs, of public-house trusts, and of the holders of debenture shares in breweries. His general line was to indicate that the Government contemplated a practical measure, which both abstainers and temperance reformers who were not abstainers could accept. The Bill, he suggested, would restore to the community the control over the liquor trade of which the Bill of 1904 deprived them, though that control had been "immemorial" and was a "popular prerogative." This clearly points to an ultimate surrender to the nation of the monopoly value of licenses, by way of a time-limit. The legislation was not to be "unreasonable" or "confiscatory." As to clubs, no distinction would be made between rich men and poor men's institutions, but the law would aim at clubs that were mere drinking places under a thin disguise, competing with the public-houses without the restrictions and public levies to which the publican was liable.

* * *

On Thursday Mr. Herbert Gladstone saw a deputation of barmaids, representing the Barmaids' Political Defence League. Their protest was practically against either the limitation or the abolition of the employment of women in bars. Mr. Gladstone spoke, on the whole, in a sense, favourable to this demand. There was no intention to interfere with the free employment of women, under proper conditions. There were, he hinted, bars where undesirable conditions did prevail; and, for our part, we cannot see why barmaids should not be protected, as other women workers are protected, against long hours and exhausting toil. But, on the whole, the Home Secretary disclaimed any "drastic" attempt to check the employment of women in licensed premises.

* * *

THERE is a certain disposition in Nationalist Ireland to co-operate with Mr. Birrell in checking cattle-driving by moral suasion. Mr. O'Dowd, a Nationalist Member, has denounced it, and Mr. William O'Brien has declared it to be due to the "folly and foolery" of half-a-dozen men in the party who should have been repudiated. Mr. Redmond has not, as yet, directly rebuked the practice, and has declared at Cardiff that it could not be put down by coercion; but neither he nor the other leaders encourage it, and it is in the main due to the rather eccentric initiative of Mr. Ginnell. Mr. Birrell declines to gratify Mr. Ginnell's "passion" for prison. How, indeed, is it possible by any conceivable measure of coercion, regular or irregular, to stop the opening of gates by farmers' boys on cattle ranches in lonely districts?

* * *

THE Duma concluded the debate on the address on Wednesday by adopting a fulsome vote of thanks to the Czar. The Octobrists and Cadets Party alone voted for it, the Right and the Left abstaining. The interest of the debate lay in the attempt made by the reactionaries to induce the Octobrists to address the Czar as "autocrat," while the Liberals wished to introduce the word "constitution." Neither succeeded, though the Cadets are congratulating themselves on persuading the Octobrists to refer to "the reformed order of the State," established by the concessions of October, 1905. The Octobrists would, indeed, be stultifying their own position if they took their stand on the idea of a Constitution. They hold their position in the Duma only because the Czar violated the so-called Constitution, by altering the electoral law. If he can do that, he is an autocrat; if he cannot, the Octobrists ought not to be sitting as the controlling party in the Duma. The Labour Party introduced an amendment regretting the arbitrary alteration of the franchise, but the Cadets declined to support them. The position of the Cadets almost defies definition. They claim to be a party of Opposition, but they will not oppose even on a matter so fundamental as the altered franchise. Yet they suffer all the pains and penalties of opposition, for M. Stolypin continues to treat them as a proscribed and illegal party.

* * *

THE Constantinople correspondent of the "Frankfurter Zeitung," who is usually well informed, reports the renewal of Armenian massacres round Diarbekir, and says that as many as 141 villages have been destroyed. The veteran correspondent of the "Daily News" hesitates to confirm these figures, but fears that massacres may have taken place on a considerable scale. Ibrahim Pasha, commander of the Kurdish "Hamidieh" militia, is levying blackmail all over the country, plundering, devastating, and doubtless also indulging in massacre. The hopeful feature of the situation is that the local Turkish population, which at Diarbekir, as at Erzeroum, has become profoundly disaffected during the past two years, is as much opposed to the predatory Kurds as are the Armenians themselves. The Porte is said to be alarmed, as, indeed, it might well be, for while it may like to use the Kurds as the hammer of the Armenians, it cannot afford to strain the loyalty of the Anatolian Turks, who are the backbone of its military system. It is quite conceivable that the Eastern Turks, who are by race and language almost identical with the North-Western inhabitants of Persia—the people who made the reform movement there—may take the lead in a formidable agitation for a change of régime. Meanwhile it is all important to do something to save the Armenians. Even the German Ambassador has moved. We should not now find Russia an opponent, as was the case in 1895.

* * *

MR. BONAR LAW is a clever man, but he slightly overdoes cleverness when he states the case for Protection so inaccurately and so tactlessly as in his speech on Tuesday to the Middlesex Conservatives. In this speech he declared that it was beyond doubt that in Germany during the last twenty years wages had risen, and the cost of living had fallen. It happens that on the day on which this speech was delivered the "Times," which reports it, also summarises Herr Scheidemann's statement in the Reichstag, uncontradicted by the Government, that the average increase in the cost of living of the German people during the last ten years was 33½ per cent., and that the cost of many articles of general consumption had advanced over 60 per cent. If Mr. Bonar Law's statement of fact was inaccurate, his outline of Protectionist policy strikes us as singularly tactless. Mr. Law looked forward with barely concealed delight to a period of bad trade. Every one, he said, engaged in industries threatened by foreign imports, believed that we were on the eve of a new period of dumping. "When that happens," said Mr. Law, "then would be the opportunity of Tariff Reformers. . . . And what the Irish famine had done for Cobden's cause, two bad winters would do for the cause of fiscal reform." Protectionists can hardly expect the British workman to be drawn to a policy whose friends thus gloat over his prospective misery.

* * *

WE gather from Lord Tweedmouth's and Mr. Robertson's speeches that the Government have not the smallest intention of granting an inquiry into the state of the Navy, a conclusion in which the great body of public opinion will warmly support them. The demand for an inquiry into naval administration and preparedness for war is made, with two or three exceptions, by civilians who, while they freely accuse Sir John Fisher of want of ability in war organisation, themselves know nothing of naval administration, or organisation, or war-making. We are sorry to see the "Spectator" suggesting that a spirit of indiscipline resides among the officers of the Navy. If this is the case, no one has contributed more to the promotion of this spirit than the editor of the "Spectator," who has published communications obviously inspired by officers in the service having a personal and professional animus against the present controllers of the Navy. Few of these statements are definite, and some are incoherent, and the public will not, we believe, regard them as furnishing material for a case for inquiry.

* * *

THE Board of Education issued on Monday last a Memorandum in explanation of the clauses in the Education Act of 1907, which provide for the medical inspection of children in public elementary schools. These clauses, which, as the Memorandum points out, are "the outcome of a steady movement of public opinion throughout the entire community," come into force on January 1st next. They impose upon every local education authority the duty of providing for the regular medical inspection of children, and also empower the authority to make such arrangements as the Board may sanction for attending to the health and physical condition of the children. The Memorandum lays down the principle that since the subject of school hygiene is not "a specialty or a group of specialties existing by and for themselves, but an integral factor in the health of the nation," the work of medical inspection should be carried on in intimate conjunction with the Public Health authorities, and under the direct supervision of the medical officer of health. With this view, the Memorandum provides that each county or borough medical officer of health should be provided with a number of qualified assistants for the purposes of the Act, and it rightly points out that "there are many cases in which women are especially suitable." The policy obviously intended is to bring the work of school inspection under the domain of the sanitary authority.

* * *

THE Memorandum decides that, for the present, three inspections of each child will be sufficient. The first inspection is to take place at the time of the child's admission to the school, the second at about the third year of school life, or the seventh year of age, and the third at about the sixth year of school life, when the child is about ten years old. If the measure is rightly administered, the gain to the community will be enormous. "Its justification," to quote again from the Memorandum, "is not to be measured in terms of money, but in the decrease of sickness and incapacity among children, and in the ultimate decrease of inefficiency and poverty in after life, arising from physical disabilities."

* * *

THE week has seen a sudden revival of the Moroccan anarchy. The Beni Snassen, a powerful tribe of the Riff country, near the Algerian frontier, has surrounded the small French force which is holding Ujda as a pledge for the punishment of the murder, far away at Mazagan, of Dr. Mauchamp. The fighting was serious, though the French succeeded in holding their own. A raiding party has also crossed the frontier into Algeria. The Algerian authorities and the "Temps" are pressing now for a wider field of operations, for an offensive-defensive strategy round Ujda, and for a punitive expedition against the Beni-Snassen. Yet Ujda had committed no crime; it was a hostage for a distant town, and the Beni-Snassen are resisting an unprovoked invasion. But once begun, such movements can with difficulty be circumscribed. In the West, meanwhile, the troops of the Sultan have at last come into touch with those of the Pretender. General Drude reports that the Pretender's army was victorious.

* * *

MR. JUSTICE KEKEWICH, the senior Judge of the Chancery Division, died somewhat suddenly on Friday night week in his seventy-sixth year. With great application and industry, he lacked the qualities of a thoroughly reliable judge, and the great mass of his decisions which were reversed on appeal amounted to something of a scandal. His appointment, indeed, was part of the unhappy leaning to mere partisanship which disfigured Lord Halsbury's nominations to the Bench. This is a fault from which Lord Loreburn is conspicuously free, and though the two lawyers best fitted to succeed Sir Arthur Kekewich—Mr. Warmington and Mr. Eve—chance to be Liberals, no one who has regard for the power and dignity of the Bench would criticise a competent appointment from the other side.—A rather unfortunate figure in Army life has disappeared tragically in the person of Major-General Sir Henry Colville. He was killed when riding a motor-cycle, which came into violent collision, at right angles, with a motor-car driven by his friend, Sir Henry Rawlinson. Sir Henry Colville was a type of the literary soldier, who had always succeeded very well in service in Northern and Eastern Africa. He failed in the South African War. Lord Roberts chose to hold him responsible for the surprise at Sanna's Post and the disaster at Lindley.

* * *

THE English eleven in Australia beat a strong eleven of New South Wales on Monday, which included Trumper, perhaps the best living batsman, and five players of the highest Australian standard, by 408 runs. The victory was in the main achieved by the bowling of Barnes and Fielder, and the brilliant fielding of the Englishmen, for the match exhibited no especially brilliant feat in batting. The M.C.C. eleven has now drawn one match with some difficulty, and won the rest, and though two of its most accomplished players, Hobbs and Hayes, the famous Surrey professionals, are out of form, its six first-class bowlers, backed by exceptionally fine fielding, and fresh and high-spirited batting, ought to ensure success against a Commonwealth eleven. Australian cricket is not now at its top point; and ours is.

* * *

MR. BERNARD SHAW'S "Cæsar and Cleopatra," now running at the Savoy Theatre, was written some ten years ago, and, in some respects, is so dated; but its charm, its frequent breadth and power of historic realisation, and its nearly always playful humour remain, and it should be as successful in London as it has been in the provinces and in America. The part of Cæsar gives Mr. J. Forbes Robertson a splendid opportunity for the display of his individual gifts. It makes demands on his powers of comedy; it has moments of rhetorical magnificence to which the actor's beautiful voice and finished elocution give full value, and it enables him to surround the author's conception with an atmosphere of romance. It might be said that the Cæsar of Mr. Shaw's play, as presented at the Savoy, is the joint creation of the actor and the author, even did the programme not contain a note to that effect. The Cleopatra of Miss Elliot is not so alluring. For half the play she is one of Mr. Shaw's rather waspish young girls, and for the rest she is something like the Cleopatra of history.

[The next number of THE NATION will be devoted to Christmas and Children's Books. It will also contain a fascinating account of explorations among the giants of the Soudan by Sir Alfred Pease.]

Politics and Affairs.

THE ADVANTAGE OF LIBERALISM.

WE write in ignorance of the result of the West Hull election, but whatever this may be, the political issues which it has raised have fallen into a tangle of unreal controversies. It is unnecessary to say that we owe the largest measure of confusion to the representative of "Tariff Reform." Here, after nearly five years of discussion, we have Sir George Bartley, an advocate of preferential dealing with the Colonies, met with a simple variant of Mr. Asquith's poser to Mr. Balfour, whether he would be prepared to tax "imported corn, beef, and butter," and compelled to answer, "No." Probably no other reply would have been possible in a town whose industrial life depends on free imports. But the fact remains that hardly one practical step has yet been taken towards the construction of a Protectionist majority in the House of Commons, or, indeed, of a party, which, by mere reference to the electoral pledges of its members, would not go to pieces at the first attempt to construct either a Protectionist or a Preferential tariff. Sir George Bartley, however, is not the only one of the three West Hull candidates whose bearings are difficult to ascertain. There can be no doubt that, so far as the spirit and temper of the campaign are concerned, Mr. Wilson and Mr. Holmes are in opposition to each other. Yet, so far as, let us say, the politics of the next ten years is concerned, they represent little more than differing shades of the same profession. Both are Free Traders, both favour Old Age Pensions. If both could be sent to Parliament together, they would register nineteen out of twenty votes in the same lobby. Yet it is impossible to deny a real clash of feeling and opinion between these representatives of Labour and Capital. Mr. Holmes has denounced the famous firm of Wilson, without foundation as it appears, for allying themselves with free as against Union labour, and for assisting the importation of "blacklegs" during the strike at Antwerp. In return, Mr. Wilson's friends denounce and repudiate the more extreme economic doctrine of Mr. Holmes, who, in his turn, does not assume the title of a Socialist. Finally, all three candidates style themselves "Social Reformers," and the contest suggests the practical disappearance of the old Toryism, and an upward movement of so-called Conservative candidates towards the Liberal platform of, say, twenty years ago. The electors of West Hull have, indeed, been invited to choose among three comparatively new types of political faith, Radical Democracy, Tory Democracy, and Social, or Labour, Democracy. Of these professions, the Tory variety appears to make the faintest impression on the popular mind, and, while Whiggism and Free Trade Conservatism are practically effaced, the Protectionist creed cannot be framed in terms at which an English town population will look. The vital competition seems to lie between Free-trade Radicalism, non-Socialist in theory but tending to accept collectivist ideas, and a Labour Party which preaches Socialism but will not take the label or accept the full and resounding conclusions of the Socialist creed.

At first sight a situation of this character would seem to be disadvantageous to the Liberal-Radical Party. There is the danger that Liberalism may be crushed between idealist Labourism or Socialism and Protectionist Toryism, quite willing to adopt, and incidentally debase, any Socialist idea which serves its purpose. The Government may lose touch with the popular imagination, and may come to be regarded as a pure instrument of "tactics," finally perishing, as Mr. Balfour's Government perished, in the attempt to pursue a medium course between two attractive political propositions. This, no doubt, is the calculation of the Tories, and perhaps also of the extreme spirits in the Labour Party. But we think it is a mistaken calculation, and for one very good reason. Neither of the rivals of Liberalism—if, indeed, the Labour Party is to be considered a rival—is in the least degree competent to take its place. The country and the Empire cannot be governed either by Protectionists or by Socialists. Protection would hopelessly embroil and confuse both; theoretical Socialism, as it stands to-day, could find neither the men nor the means for carrying them on for twenty-four hours. We have always thought and spoken well of the Labour Party, in and out of Parliament. It is a real asset in the business of government, and its influence in the House of Commons is towards purity and simplicity. It includes individuals of repute and force, and though, from its failure to attract the middle-class and professional element, it can present no candidates for constructive statesmanship comparable in knowledge and attainments to politicians of the type of MM. Millerand, Jaurès, or Briand, three or four of its members, such as Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Shackleton, and Mr. Barnes, would quite properly be included in a Cabinet of advanced politicians. But that is the limit of its governing ability. It could not sustain the foreign or the domestic policy of the country. It has hardly thought about foreign relations. It could not appoint ambassadors, negotiate treaties, or even construct or pass Bills. It is in the very first lap of its progress to power, and we are bound to add that it wants both a consistent policy and a definite intellectual ideal. It has not made up its mind to adopt Socialism, it prefers on the whole to remain a trade unionist and manual labourers' party, and it maintains one tone and attitude towards the Government in the House of Commons and quite a different line in the country. The quarrels in the constituencies are not entirely its fault, and we do not profess to understand why Mr. Gladstone's wise policy of a general, though quite loose, understanding with Labour candidates has been dropped at the Liberal headquarters, or even reversed. But the fact remains that while the Socialist-Labour Party attacks the Ministry's candidates in the country, it is unable, when it comes to close range with Ministerial measures and methods, to find and establish any serious ground of quarrel with it.

Therefore, we think that the Liberal Party is still practically without a rival in the effective conduct of affairs. But the condition of that effectiveness is that it should remain a party of ideas, and of ideas thoroughly conceived and pursued with faithfulness and courage. Here, indeed, it has fallen from its old ground of vantage. Not only is it without a great orator, who can make politics glow, but very unwisely, as it seems to us, it is stripping itself of the powerful emotional appeal to instincts of liberty and justice which Gladstone's foreign policy assured to it. It has avoided a similar error in home politics. An honourable provision for old age is an idea; the taxation of wealth in proportion to its ability to pay, and the extent to which it owes its accumulations to social rather than to individual effort, is an idea; the return of the people to the land is an idea; the freedom of the Church is an idea. Within these limits lies an immense field of fruitful and inspiring action, within which neither of the rivals of Liberalism can move with equal freedom and power.

THE COST OF OLD AGE PENSIONS.

THE stoppage placed on Liberal legislation by the House of Lords has had this effect among others, that it has concentrated the attention of Liberals on those measures of social reform which fall within the undoubted sphere of the House of Commons alone. It is only in the region of finance that the Government is in the full sense master in its own house, and to financial reform accordingly the party is now looking for those constructive, organic measures by which alone so great a democratic majority can justify its existence. Two such measures are fully "ripe" for the political harvest of next Session. One is such a reform of rating as will transfer the burden of local expenditure from buildings to the land, relieve the poorer classes of ratepayers, and place at the disposal of every town a fraction of the wealth which its own growth creates. The other is a measure designed to place the relief of the aged poor on a new basis.

This method of attacking the problem of poverty is not, it may be, the ideally best. Scientific reformers expect more in the end from such changes of the economic system and such improvements in popular education as tend to equalise opportunities and improve the conditions of the working class. But, until the constitutional issue is decided, there can be no fair field for the discussion of such changes. It is a part of the necessities of the present situation, which the House of Lords, and the propertied classes who support them, have created, that the Government must concentrate its forces on the reforms which it can carry, and if the propertied classes do not like the increased burden of taxation, which must result, they have themselves and their special champions to thank for the particular line which reform is taking. The great question of the age is the question of the persistence of poverty in the midst of wealth, and a Parliament like the present must deal with that question or stand condemned. Above all, it must not peddle with the question. The problem is a great one, and its solution requires thoroughness and courage. The proposal of pensions for the aged poor approaches it at that particular point at which the solution, though by no means free from difficulties, is still relatively simple.

The assumption of all non-contributory pension schemes—and no others need be discussed here—is that the bulk of the poverty of the aged is a necessary consequence of the system of modern industry. That system has its merits. It is favourable to the production of wealth on an enormous scale. Improved as it has been by our Free-trade finance on the one hand, and the many-sided regulation of industrial conditions on the other, it is by no means so unfavourable to an equitable distribution of wealth as it was a couple of generations ago. But when the best is said for modern industry and "free enterprise," it remains that the average wage of the industrial classes, that is the average income of some 70 per cent. of the population, is fixed by the forces of competition at a point which affords them a very modest share in the advantages of civilisation. If, again, we consider the lower half of this 70 per cent., we find them still but little above the "subsistence minimum." They live to bring up children, and that is as much as can be said. Doubtless, faults of character and defects of ability enter as factors into the question, but these faults and defects are in turn engendered by low wages, bad housing, and insufficient food. As political economists told us long ago, "economic injuries tend to perpetuate themselves." The governing condition of the situation is that as long as large classes remain economically helpless, so long they will be driven by the stronger to accept bad conditions of work and wages. Where, then, is redress to be found? No reforms at present suggested with any hope of practical success are likely to alter the fundamental conditions. It is impossible to "endow" the adult labourer without returning to the conditions of the old poor law. But it is possible to do something for the young and for the old, for those who have not reached, and those who have passed, the age for labour. So far as the old are concerned, the principle underlying the demand for pensions is simple enough. It is that, apart from personal faults and failings of his own, the conditions of industry do not enable the average person born in the poorer classes to earn such an income in his ordinary working life as will enable him to lay by provision for his old age. As a member of a rich and civilised community he is, it is held, entitled to the decencies of life, and in particular to independence. Such a guarantee against the worst miseries of old age should surely be the right of every decent citizen, and our own country is rich enough to afford it. Far from discouraging thrift, it is believed that the certainty of a small pension would stimulate hope by making independent comfort something more than a dream. Far from loosening the ties of family responsibility, it would tend to avert the disruption of the family by making the old people welcome house-mates for their grown-up children. Far from sapping independence, it would raise the poorer classes out of that slough of pauperism which, in old age, is the lot of probably one-half of its number.

If these hopes are to be realised, it must be kept steadily in mind that the pension is of the nature of a right. It is not to be won by special desert, nor to depend on the good graces of the authorities. These considerations rule out the various tests of thrift and industry which have been proposed. Substantially, the only condition with which they are compatible is an income limit. This means that no one with an independent income of, say, 10s. a week or more, would be entitled to a pension. The pension would, of course, not cease abruptly at 10s., but would be graduated so that the total income would not exceed some sum that would be fixed between 10s. and 15s. a week. We do not say that such a limit is desirable, and we think it possible that the middle classes, who, as income-tax payers, are at present anxious to keep down the cost of the scheme, will, when it is once instituted for the poor, desire, even at some increase of cost, to come into it themselves. But that is as hereafter may be. A "universal" scheme giving 5s. a week at the age of 65, would cost $27\frac{1}{2}$ millions, and we may assume that no Chancellor of the Exchequer would be prepared to add the whole of that sum at a stroke to the national expenditure. Let us, then, consider what reduction an income limit would effect. We base our calculations mainly on numerous figures given in a useful work on "Old Age Pensions,"* by Mr. William Sutherland.

The number of people aged 65 and upwards in the United Kingdom is estimated for 1907 as 2,116,267. From this we should deduct 778,283 for those whose incomes exceed ten shillings a week, and 33,661 for aliens, criminals, and lunatics. Further, a deduction must be made for those who would remain in work-houses, infirmaries, &c., either for the sake of medical attendance or because unable to support themselves on their pension (we assume that the pension would be forfeited by any subsequent application for relief). We have no means of fixing this figure with precision, but it is likely that, at any rate in the first years of the present scheme, the bulk of the present indoor aged paupers would stay where they are. In any case, errors on this head are the less important because indoor paupers now cost the public more than 5s. per head, so that if a larger number take their pension, there should be a full per contra account. We deduct 75,000, then, on this account, a number which nearly corresponds to the actual aged-pauper population of England and Wales alone, and assumes that a balance proportionate to the remaining pauper population of the United Kingdom would quit the workhouse and come on the pensions list. These deductions amount to 886,944, and they leave us with a pension list of 1,229,323. At 5s. a week the cost would be £15,981,199. From this would have to be deducted a saving on outdoor relief, which Mr. Sutherland places at £2,000,000, leaving the net cost, exclusive of administration, at £13,981,199, or, with administration, of something over £14,000,000. Some minor possibilities of saving having been omitted, we may take this figure as quite an outside estimate.

Is some such sum out of the reach of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Given reasonable military economy, we think not. He started with $2\frac{1}{4}$ millions laid by last year. If we are not greatly deceived, the new system of income-tax returns has revealed unexpected accessions of wealth among those whose incomes fall short of £2,000 a year, and we shall not be surprised if the year's surplus swells the $2\frac{1}{4}$ millions to five. The success of the new system will of itself create an imperious demand for extending the requirement of full returns to the richest classes, and a very large accession to the revenue may be anticipated under this head. On these points it is, from the nature of the case, impossible to give figures, but so far we have been speaking of probable increments of revenue without increased taxation. We may point out that a graduated increase of taxation on large incomes so arranged as to bring in the equivalent of 6d. in the £ on incomes over £5,000 a year would, on a moderate estimate of the amount of those incomes, bring five millions to the Exchequer. Putting all the automatic increases together at five millions, this gives us ten towards our total. Leaving out of account the promised tax on motor-cars, we may anticipate £2,000,000 from a graduated license duty, and if we cannot save £2,000,000 of the present military expenditure, we shall know where to put the blame.

It is, of course, impossible to specify accurately the sources from which such a sum can be raised without the help of figures which are not at present available. But what has been said is at least sufficient to indicate that the provision of £14,000,000 for the discharge of a great civilising duty is no intolerable burden on a nation whose gross income is estimated at £1,800,000,000, a very large proportion of which is concentrated in the hands of a small portion of the people. Should Mr. Asquith shrink from the provision of the full sum, we would for our part rather see the cost cut down by raising the age or lowering the income limit than by complicating the conditions under which the pension is obtainable. We want to clear the bulk of the aged poor out of the domain of the poor law. The scheme demanded of this Government must be wide enough and simple enough to establish this change in principle, and so remove from the normal life of poverty that shadow of pauperism which deepens with advancing age.

TWO GERMAN LEGENDS.

Two German legends have been much used for political purposes in England. The one is the legend of German prosperity; the second is the legend of a great German Navy. The first was introduced by the Tariff Reformers when Mr. Chamberlain hit upon German Protection as furnishing the model of a scientific tariff. It has also been used by Mr. Haldane, Lord Roberts, and the National Service League, to illustrate the value of military discipline and training for the working classes. The second was introduced by the Admiralty and Navy League, to take the place of Russia, which was our Naval Bogey until the Russo-Japanese War. Both these legends are just now on their trial, and they are brought into close juxtaposition by the appearance of the German Budget, with a huge deficit, to which an increase in the Naval Estimates largely contributes.

When we speak of the legend of German prosperity, we are very far from meaning that Germany is not a great industrial country. Ever since the Middle Ages the German towns have stood in the front rank. The industry and skill of the artificers and merchants of Nuremberg, Cologne, Hamburg, or Bremen have been famed for ages. The comparative peace of the last eighty years, the development of coal-fields, the great discoveries and inventions, the removal of a hundred tariffs, and the establishment of internal Free Trade throughout the new Empire of Germany, have given a tremendous impulse to manufactures and production. Englishmen may well recognise all this, and rejoice. It has made Germany our best customer in all Europe. The trade between the two countries is so vast, and their commercial intercourse so close, that interruption of it would spell ruin to thousands of merchants and manufacturers on both sides of the North Sea.

But we may rejoice without being envious. The industrial world is now apparently at the end of a great industrial boom. Here in England a recession in trade is just beginning to be felt. We could not hope to escape entirely the effects of the American panic. But our trade is still very good and there is not the slightest doubt about the soundness of our commercial fabric, however much individual merchants and financial houses may be injured by the collapse in the States. Employment is already a little worse than last year; but as yet there are no signs of wholesale dismissals, though in America factories are being everywhere closed. But Germany, which has far less concern with the United States, is already in an evil plight. For several weeks past a series of important failures have occurred, beginning in the bureaucratic towns, with great merchant homes, and spreading inland to textile and other factories. The correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" in Berlin speaks of "the economic crisis on which Germany seems to be entering," and of "grave uneasiness in all sections of the German population." He illustrates the state of affairs by two local symptoms. In November, as a rule, domestic servants are difficult to obtain in Berlin, but "at this moment the registries in Berlin have more cooks and housemaids on their books than for very many months past. The fact is that people who formerly had two servants are now managing to get along with one, while families who kept only a single maid are frequently under the necessity of doing the house-work themselves." So much for the middle classes. The rich are also in difficulties. "Another ominous sign is the number of almost new motor-cars which are now offered for sale. Automobiles of the best makes that have been only a few months, or even weeks, on the road can be picked up by those rare people who have the necessary ready cash for the price of an old song."

* Methuen & Co. Price 3s. 6d. net.

It is evident from this that the famous tariff of Germany, that monument of modern statesmanship on which Mr. Hewins casts the envious eye of a humble copyist, is not doing much for the well-to-do. Their fortunes are not broadening with the broadening of the basis of taxation. The last tariff ought to have done wonders for them. It was most scientifically devised. All the experts were called in—Professor Schmoller and Professor Wagner, and the rest. Taxes were carefully increased on every food grown in Germany, as well as on every article manufactured in Germany; and, after months of preparation, a series of commercial treaties were constructed. What have all these instruments of prosperity done for the working man? Let us see. On Monday, Herr Scheidemann, a Social Democrat, who represents the Solingen division of Düsseldorf, interpellated the Government on the subject of food taxes. He quoted statistics (which were not controverted) to show that food and the necessities of life are, on an average, at least one-third higher than ten years ago. What then cost a mark now costs a mark and 33 pfennigs. But rye, the staple food of the labouring classes throughout Germany, has risen in the same period by no less than 62 per cent. The black 3 lb. loaf made of rye now costs sixpence in Berlin, as a correspondent of the "Economist" in that city pointed out only the other day, whereas the white 4 lb. loaf in London costs only 5½d. Since 1901 the price of wheat in Germany has risen 45 per cent., and potatoes are 12 per cent. higher this year than last. In ten years beef, veal, mutton, and pork have risen from 36 to 50 per cent. There is no pretence that wages have risen in anything like this proportion. Trade has been unusually active in the last two or three years; but the lot of the German labourer has been growing harder. And now the new tariff is beginning to bite. According to the "Times" correspondent's summary of Herr Scheidemann's speech, "the working classes view the approach of winter with alarm."

However, the outlook may be bad; but Tariff Reform and Militarism combined will see the poor people of Germany through the cold weather. It is usual in the extreme winter months for the Berlin police to collect crowds of half-frozen people together, and to drive them into warm underground retorts, where they are thawed for half an hour, and then driven out to make room for a fresh relay. But in addition to social provision such as this for the emergency of very cold weather, the German Government now has in hand another remedy. The Kaiser's Generals and Admirals have met together, and have decided that last year's deficit was not large enough; so they will add to their expenditure, buy more guns, lay down more battleships, try to deepen the Kiel Canal, and enlarge the docks. Strangely enough, this prospect does not seem to please the Government's supporters. The "Bloc," which might have accepted the new expenditure, is coy about the new taxation. The brandy monopoly may be all very well, but the proposed taxation of cigars will be stoutly resisted, and as for an addition to the income tax, or the succession duties, the mere thought of it has sent a cold shudder through the representatives of the middle-classes. A correspondent of the "Frankfurter Zeitung" tells us that the talk of political circles of Berlin is the financial fiasco of "the so-called Tariff Reform" introduced by Freiherr von Stengel, the present Secretary of the Treasury, in 1905. The high expectations entertained of the taxes then imposed have been woefully disappointed. To a Free Trader this is not at all surprising. We know by old experience that as indirect taxes multiply or mount beyond a certain point, their produce decreases. But in Germany it was thought that the Broadening of the Basis and the Flowing Revenue would go together. The professors and officials are now undeceived, and great is the confusion. Already there is talk of a Government defeat and a dissolution. But what could be gained? To dissolve in the midst of a financial and economic crisis, amid the apprehension of the rich and the anger of the poor, would only play into the hands of the Social Democrats, who might, under such conditions, obtain a commanding position in the Reichstag. It is far more likely that (as has so often happened before) the Estimates will be curtailed and a further increase of debt sanctioned. The difficulties of the Empire are aggravated by the difficulties of Prussia. There, again, the Government cannot make both ends meet, yet it is introducing a costly scheme for buying out Polish landowners in order to plant German colonists. A real crisis is almost certainly at hand, which, though it must be accompanied by much suffering, may produce a welcome revolution in German politics.

THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

ONE of the most conspicuous facts in the religious life of the last two or three decades is the decline of the Oxford movement as an intellectual force. In its origin a product of the Romantic movement, which exercised such a fascination over Europe in the first half of the nineteenth century, its strength, like Romanticism, consisted in its appeal to the emotions, the imagination, and the picturesque traditions of the past. It was a legitimate revolt from the frigid intellectualism of the eighteenth century; it offered a welcome outlet to the mystic, imaginative, and emotional elements in the breasts of men. The supreme ideal of the eighteenth century was the deification of reason. It was a magnificent conception; and it attained its end by giving a position to the powers of reason which they had never attained before. But the great luminaries in the eighteenth century did not sufficiently realise that man is more than a merely rational animal; that his nature finds some of its deepest satisfactions in frames of mind with which reason has little to do. It was the mission of Romanticism to correct this error; to give life a richer and deeper content; to revive the sense of awe and mystery imbedded in the inscrutable scheme of things. Until this task was accomplished, Romanticism produced a succession of admirable intellectual champions in literary, philosophic, and religious thought. But as soon as the truths of its teaching were absorbed in the general culture of the age, its weaknesses immediately manifested themselves, and it sank beneath the horizon like a light which has spent its force. It was inevitable that the decay of the Romantic movement should be accompanied by the decay of the Oxford Revival, which formed in this country so prominent a part of it. It is true Tractarianism drags out a degenerate existence in the form of ritualism. But the intellectual vitality has gone out of it; it has been superseded by a higher and deeper religious synthesis; it exists, like other superannuated things, as a survival from the past.

The causes which have led to the supersession of the Oxford movement are intricate and multifarious, but one of the most powerful of them has been the rise and triumphant development of historical criticism applied to Biblical and ecclesiastical literature. A purely historical study of the sources of the Christian faith and of the growth of the Church has irrevocably overthrown the Romantic conceptions of the rise and development of Christian institutions imagined by Pusey and his friends. Every serious student of Christian origins is aware of this, even if his mind is biassed in favour of traditional solutions. In these circumstances it is pathetic to see a man like Dr. Gore, the Bishop of Birmingham, picking up the débris of the old Romanticist theology, and offering its poor, mangled remains as a spiritual ideal for the modern mind. This is the manifest object of his new book on "The New Theology and the Old Religion." He has undertaken an impossible task. We cannot rest upon a past which history tells us never was present. But Dr. Gore, as Mr. Percy Gardner truly says, is not a historian. He has the dogmatic, not the historical, attitude of mind; and in all his discussions he mixes up history and dogma in a manner which is fatal to the truth of both. He does not look at the facts of sacred and ecclesiastical history with the legitimate presuppositions of the historian, but with the illegitimate assumptions of the ecclesiastical dogmatist. He reads the teachings of the Nicene Creed into the vital texture of primitive Christianity, just as the Pope reads the dogma of his own infallibility into an irrelevant Biblical text. Methods of this kind, it need hardly be said, are an outrage on the elementary laws of historical enquiry. If Dr. Gore were a private individual, we should be prepared to regard his peculiar method of interpreting history as a harmless eccentricity. But he is a Bishop of the National Church. In this capacity he informs us that he forces young men who wish to enter the service of that Church to read the substance of Biblical Christianity into the creeds; in other words, to read history in the same arbitrary manner as himself. Little wonder that a ministry recruited after this fashion is steadily losing its hold on public confidence, and a Church so administered is becoming, as the Bishop of Carlisle asserts, more and more denationalised.

As far as the interpretation of history is concerned, the Bishop of Birmingham is half a century behind the times, and the same may be said of his interpretation of the substance of the Christian faith. According to him, the substance of Christianity is a scheme of dogmatic theology, expressed in the Creeds, and he demands a "real assent of heart and will and intellect to the teaching of the Creeds." He would admit no one into his diocese or into holy orders who does not ex animo believe the creeds. Here, again, we have the old, worn-out Tractarian theology, with its impossible demands on the Christian conscience; its repellent hardness and narrowness. It does not seem to occur to Dr. Gore that English bishops of more commanding powers than himself, and with a much deeper knowledge of Christian origins, take an entirely different view as to the essential nature of Christianity. The late Bishop Lightfoot—a name of world-wide reputation—has expressly and emphatically repudiated the idea that the Gospel is a dogmatic system, embodied in a creed or creeds. It is capable, he says, "of doctrinal exposition, and it is fertile in ethical results, yet its substance is neither a dogmatic system nor an ethical code, but a Person and a Life." According to Dr. Gore, the fundamentals of belief consist in a literal adhesion to the creeds; according to Dr. Lightfoot, these fundamentals are not a creed at all, but a Personality, whose spirit and character are set before us in the primitive canonical documents. All the best elements in modern religious life are rallying round the position that the supreme source and standard of Christianity is a Person and not a Creed. Dr. Gore's teaching on this vital point is obscurantist and reactionary.

It is illogical as well, for he refuses to accept the teaching of the creeds. He says that he recites the Minatory Clauses of the Athanasian creed "with a large qualification." What becomes of the claim for an ex animo assent to the creeds from others, when he confesses that he cannot give this assent himself? He feels this difficulty, but he maintains that in reciting parts of the creed in which he does not believe he is "only doing what the church which commissions him bids him to do." It would be interesting to have chapter and verse for this statement. In what authoritative document does the Church of England empower any of its ministers to recite certain clauses of the creed with "a large qualification which is not expressed"? Is it in the Declaration of Assent which every clergyman must make before he is ordained? It can be nowhere else. This declaration undoubtedly allows a large amount of intellectual liberty in the interpretation of the doctrines of the Church. But this liberty is not confined to a liberal interpretation of the damnatory clauses of the Athanasian creed. It is mere arbitrariness to confine clerical liberty to these clauses alone. The Declaration of Assent makes no such distinctions. It makes no mention of the creeds at all. The Church of England in its official formularies attaches no more importance to the creeds than it does to the Prayer Book or the Articles of Religion. It permits us to exercise exactly the same liberty in interpreting the creeds as in the interpretation of the Articles. It is of this liberty that Dr. Gore is striving with all his might to deprive the clergy of the Church of England. In these efforts he will no doubt meet with the applause of ecclesiastical partisans. But the permanent forces and the historic movement in Christendom are against him. Creeds at their best are but symbols, and never definitions of supreme religious realities. The meaning of them is always imperceptibly changing, even when the words remain the same. Their real value consists in their capacity to take on new and higher meanings, so that from age to age they may remain as ancient vehicles for expressing the living experiences of faith.

Life and Letters.

THE DISLIKE OF THE INTELLECTUAL.

THE public enquiry into the case of Lieutenant Woods may or may not do a personal service to that officer, a point which we do not desire to prejudge; but it does afford some interesting material for a study of social life in a crack regiment. Mr. Woods is evidently an officer of much zeal. He passes out of Sandhurst, seventeenth among 120 candidates. For six years he earns good reports, both on service in South Africa and at home. He learns languages; he spends his leave in making investigations abroad at his own expense, for which he is specially thanked by the Intelligence Department. His chief desire is to gain experience, and he applies (unsuccessfully) for Egypt, for the Macedonian gendarmerie, and for the Staff College. But he neglects sports, does not frequent the Guards' Club, or join in the regimental drag, refuses invitations to ride and play golf, and, to crown all, absents himself while at Aldershot from mess, in order to take linguistic lessons in London. He is universally unpopular, "rubs people up the wrong way," and fills his comrades with a desire to be rid of him. One of them tells him in 1904 that "the best thing he can do is to go out altogether," remarks that he would not be seen in the same street with his corpse, and winds up with a hint that unless he goes there may be a ragging scandal. He shows, however, considerable independence and courage, and declines to go. In the spring of 1907 his superior officers warn him that, for the first time in his career, the report on his progress will be damning, and advise him to send in his papers within five days. He claims an enquiry, on the ground that these last reports were simply the expression of the regiment's desire to get rid of him. His superior officers reply that he really had a bad manner with his men, and had made mistakes in handling them at manoeuvres. It is possible that these charges are true, though they would not affect his competence for "paper" work. A good student is not necessarily a good leader of men. But it is quite certain that, even if superior officers had been compelled to report in this sense, for the first time in seven years, against a popular comrade, they would not have used pressure to drive him out of the service.

The moral of the case is quite clearly that an officer, however studious and zealous, cannot hope to have a smooth and prosperous career unless he joins in what is called "the life of the regiment." The life of the regiment, be it well understood, means its amusements. Its serious business, the duties which the nation pays it to perform, do not fall within the meaning of that significant term. Given the system by which officers live in common as men engaged in the civil service or in business do not, it is perhaps inevitable that this feeling should grow up. It may be all important to the country that an officer should study fortification or Japanese, but it looks as if his manners in the mess-room, his handicap at golf, or his form in the hunting-field were the things that made him an acceptable comrade. The "regiment," like every other social organisation, will defend itself against the "bore" and the "prig." By rudeness or by ragging, it makes existence intolerable for any sensitive man, and in the last resort it can apply to his professional work a carping and rigorous criticism which will close the door to promotion. The poor man, the "ranker," the studious and ambitious soldier, who is no sportsman, can be made unwelcome in a thousand ways, which afford no material to a court of enquiry. The authorities can, if they please, put down "ragging," but that only drives the regiment to other expedients. The interesting part of it all is that in all these measures which it takes to preserve the traditions of its social life, "the regiment" may be acting in perfect good faith. There is no conscious antithesis in its mind between its own interests as a club, and its duty to the nation. Mr. Rufus Isaacs's skilful cross-examination revealed something of the mentality of these Grenadiers. They ran into his traps headlong just as they would have run into a Boer ambushade. One declares naively that it is only by playing golf and riding and mixing with his comrades in the mess-room, that an officer can hope to become a leader of men. Another opines that an unpopular officer will never be of any use to his country. There is a whole theory of life under these sayings. It is the typical theory of the English upper classes. They quite sincerely believe that a man with no tastes for games, a man who does not "get on" in a rather idle and frivolous society, is a "rotter" who must be "kicked," and told (as one titled witness put it) to "buck up." In their world intelligence counts for little, and science for less. It is quite incapable of understanding that there are activities in which other qualities do happen to count. Waterloo, says the spurious epigram, was won on the playgrounds of Eton. It is fairly certain that the battle of the Tugela was lost there.

Such a case as this is calculated to fill the sanguine military reformer with despair. He knows that the Army will never offer a tempting career to the type of man who may succeed in the more scientific professions, while this social atmosphere prevails in the "best" regiments. The type of mind and character which would really make a brilliant officer is to be found in a rather lower social stratum, among the young men who go out at present to build bridges in Canada, or dams in Egypt, or railways in India—eager, scientific, intelligent, and yet capable of great physical endurance and used to the management of men. That type of man, without any advantage of birth or social prestige, can govern, and govern without the aid of an iron discipline based on fear, by the sheer power of his ability and character. But he will not enter the Army. The existence would bore him; the sports would ruin him, the knowledge that keenness and ability are no certain passports to promotion would unman him. Against the massive caste prejudice which still rules the Army, even the Hegelianism of a philosophic Minister will break in vain. A man who has not trained himself to hunt otters and tame deer would not know "how to begin to kill an Afghan or a hairy Boer,"—the disgusting sentence occurred the other week in an article by a cavalry expert in the "Saturday Review." It shows how deep the conviction still is, even among the relatively literate men in the Army, that fighting is a kind of sport. The conception that war is in the main a matter of scientific organisation and a highly technical mechanical art has hardly begun to penetrate the brain of the fighting caste.

The education of the Army, if it ever comes at all, will be a slow and tedious process. For it involves something much more fundamental than the improvement of professional training. It involves the transformation of all the habits of thought, in which the men of the English upper middle class are reared from boyhood upwards. The first lesson which a small boy learns when he contemplates the time-table of his preparatory school is that sport is the substantial half of life. The second lesson which he learns, when he grasps the social structure of the school, is that a venerable and powerful hierarchy is watching over him to impose upon him a minute and rigid conformity to a set of unwritten canons of behaviour, which really rest on a deeply rooted, if unconscious, theory of life. Only the vigorous rebel, the untameable eccentric, succeeds in maintaining any elasticity of mind. The average product is a youth who will continue to believe that sport is the larger half of life, and correctitude, good form, and conformity to caste rules the only ideal of conduct. From such material a keen and zealous corps of officers could be formed only by a miracle. The reform of the Army means at bottom the reform of the school.

For the rest the moral of this case is, we think, that a Minister bent on reconciling efficiency with economy might very well begin by carrying out a drastic reduction in the establishment of the Guards. Lieutenant Woods was told by his Grenadier comrades that if he did not choose to expatriate himself to Uganda he had better go into a Line regiment, where he would probably do very well. If the theory of the Guardsmen is that these privileged corps are no place for an officer who is too keen a student to spare time for polo and golf, the rest of us are driven to the conclusion that we might very well dispense with the Guards. If the Line is the haven to which all keen and zealous officers are ultimately driven, then the Line is quite sufficient for the purposes which the taxpayer has in view in maintaining an army.

THE HEART OF THE HEBREWS.

THE study of the Bible as literature has been deprecated by those who interpret "literature" as a criticism of style and decoration, unconcerned with the ultimate realities of existence. Against such a condemnation Mr. Courtney appeals in the preface to "The Literary Man's Bible" (Chapman & Hall). In a series of extracts from the Old Testament, its history, its prophetic and wisdom books, its poetry, he endeavours to provide the reader with some new material, of a new interest. He would exhibit the sacred books of the Hebrews as the expression through many changing centuries of the life of a nation; in the tragedy of overthrow, in the exultation of victory; passing from the beauty and simplicity of the early legends to the perplexity concerning the meaning and end of life, which always broods over an age of wealth and comfort, and security. And in this method there is found an escape from that even acceptance of chapter and verse which, as drilled into the mind in childhood, finds all the work equally profitable, all equally inspired, and (it must be confessed), in many cases all equally tedious. The splendour of that literature remains, the great conceptions of the life of God and the life of man, which were elaborated by this tiny, harassed people, crushed between the desert and the sea. There remains, also, the final and perfect expression, in an extraordinarily vivid imagery of the unchanging facts of human experience. Whatever large secular change may come in the future to the human family, we can scarcely conceive of any in which the Hebrew imagery will not be naturally accepted as the vehicle of man's expression. The transitory and hazardous quality of human life is in it, in unforgettable comparison; like a dream when one awaketh; like a tale that is told; like a watch in the night; like the grass that withers; like the leaf that falls; like the flower that fades. The unchanging life of man is there also, enduring the sunlight and the winter rain; flinging the seed into the ground, hopeful always of another harvest; storing little yearly dues of wheat, and wine, and oil. The olives, and the vineyards, and the cornfields, indeed, ring like a note of music through the varying episodes of this troubled history; theirs is the promise of the first incursion from the desert wilderness; theirs is the destruction so frequently consummated in rebellion and wild warfare—the land mourneth, for the corn is wasted, the new wine is dried up, the oil languisheth, because joy is withered away from the sons of men. And with the sharp sense of the open air and sunshine, theirs is the abiding promise of all fruitful seasons, when the menace of the desert and the old throb of the sea shall alike be stilled, and each man shall eat the fruit of his own labour, none making him afraid. But perhaps its highest distinction is that confidence of a future redemption, which lightens the darkest hour with assurance of some purpose and meaning in it all; whose affirmations have expressed the desperate hopes of man through so many ages in which the blind brutal gods of Chance and Fortune have seemed altogether triumphant; which with a splendid audacity was content not only with the transfiguration of humanity in an ultimate accession of intelligence and kindness, but also with a whole transformed nature; when the lion shall eat straw like the ox, and the serpent and the insect, man's deadliest foes, shall become the playmates of his children, and the wilderness and solitary places shall be glad for them, and the desert rejoices and blossoms as the rose.

It is a fierce, almost blinding patriotism that beats from first to last through its passionate pages. We lose the wonder of this emotion in our later mythical interpretations of "Zion," and in the light of the miracle of its subsequent fame. But Jerusalem, in this literature, is a tiny mountain village, smaller than most of England's county capitals, the centre of a pigmy kingdom of the dimension of England's lesser counties. It can be seen to-day in the more remote regions of an unchanging East, a huddle of narrow white streets, and tumbled white houses, set out upon a barren hillside, amid wild and desolate hills, with no sanitation or comfort, heavy with an Eastern squalor, peopled by wild men with bright eyes and temper never far from the surface. On either side of it stretched vast civilisations, complex and elaborate in life and ornament. To this little town these were less than nothing and vanity; it fought them through the ages as Montenegro fought the Turk; it defied them when they assailed it; it mourned in laments whose tragedy still sounds poignant across all the dead centuries; it longed for its home in the land of exile; it broke into fierce rejoicing when they were destroyed. "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget her cunning," was the expression of those, whose prayer was also "May they prosper who love thee." "Mount Zion," was their pathetic boast of their sacred hill, is the "joy of the whole earth." "O be favourable and gracious unto Zion," is the petition of those who have sunk the sense of the individual in the desire of the race. "Build thou the walls of Jerusalem." And there still abides the sense of tears and happiness in the cry of deliverance which trembles across the vast spaces of time from a people so long dead and vanished: "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion; then were we like unto those that dream."

Jahveh is the God of His people, and goes forth with them to victory. There is much at the beginning of the mere blind worship of a tribal god, who is leading their armies into the battle. Something of the Permanent Fear of the Unknown and Omnipotent is here also, with a god like Setebos in Caliban's soliloquy, who is jealous of any sign of human happiness, and must be placated with torments and bloody sacrifice. But by some magic this conception became transformed into a Deity to be loved as well as worshipped. From the heart of this fierce and passionate people there arose a vision of tenderness and compassion, until their God came to be symbolised in all terms of human endearment—"like as a father pitieth his children," "As one whom his mother comforteth," "He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are but dust." They had no faith in any restoration in a future existence, in which all the world's wrongs should be righted, and the human heart find rest. "The dead praise not Thee, O Lord," is their continual burden, "They that go down into the pit cannot hope for Thy truth." They turned with shuddering from that after-world of thin and spectral shadows. They had not appreciated—or not until the end, in the pessimism of the wisdom books—the fundamental irony of a humanity praising God Who would bring all men to naught. These never joined in that defiance of the Creation before a Creator Who—on the assumption of this universal mortality—has tricked and played with the unfortunate race of men; the defiance of the gods in the later Greek tragedy, the defiance of the gods in much of nineteenth-century literature. Because "Thou hast fed one rose with dust of men"; because the sweet springs for all the pleasant streams, in the end become as bitter as the sea; therefore (is the modern proclamation), "All we are against Thee, against Thee, O God most high." This feeling is absent from the Hebrew literature. They were content with what life could give them: this short life of frost and sun. They praised their God—as in that marvellous "Song of Hezekiah"—when he delivered them from the sickness of death; not thinking that this was but a convalescence and reprieve. They thanked Him for the kindly harvest, for the air and pleasant sunshine, for deliverance from their enemies. They were content to accept—as children—life's greater bewilderingments, in an acquiescence, not without its pathos, that "the Judge of all the earth" is doing right.

It was only when increased prosperity had produced a class of wealth and leisure, and social diseases produced social discontent, that this simple creed of life broke down. Then came the questionings which could not be answered: Why the wicked obtain such prosperity and so fearlessly flourish; why the ungodly triumph for so long and have riches in possession; why the human heart wanders restlessly as a ghost through all the splendours of its material possessions, and refuses to be satisfied. The appeal is at first to Reason: that the wicked are set in slippery places; that evil shall slay the wicked; that, if not in some sudden lightening, yet in the slow process of time, the moral law will be vindicated. And then this collapses, the appeal is to Unreason: to the impossible, grotesque, wild, and irrational character of the world, in which uncouth sea beasts flounder in the ocean depths, and the number of the months and the propagation of the animals is equally inexplicable, and the sun falls on the desert where no man is. When they had attained to this affirmation, they had run through the gamut of ultimate experience; no further progress in national religion was possible. They had passed from such deliberate and swinging confidence as that of the Christian beginnings, with their cloudless vision of a world whose origin and goal is plain, into the Agnosticism, tempered by hope or embittered by a cosmic despair, which expresses the Europe of the twentieth century.

It is because in the main they went forward undismayed, with something of the simplicity of children, that their written works have formed the treasury of the humble in the subsequent time. They believed that human life could be made desirable and significant; they believed in the possibility of a social redemption; they looked forward to a better time coming. They faced life "without opium," in its bedrock realities, through plagues and famine, foreign invasion and domestic malice, and all the terrors of a time when a kind of furious madness seemed to have mingled with the seed of men. From all of it they derived lessons of consolation, of endurance, of indomitable patience; refusing always to give up and acknowledge the supremacy of the Powers of Darkness, content to face the unknown with a stout heart, unafraid.

THE CHOICE OF BOOKS.

THE attitude of the ordinary reader towards such an exhibition of books as the "Tribune" Office presents this week, is one of bewildered impotence. The cheapening of books, as, indeed, of all forms of printed matter, which the last few years have brought, staggers him with the magnitude of his intellectual fortune. Amid such a multitude of vociferous claimants, how should he know what to read and what to buy? It is therefore, well that in this perplexity such a man as Mr. Frederic Harrison, who has made as full and as profitable a use of books as any living Englishman, should tender his advice. Mr. Harrison's advice may be summarised in two simple maxims, "Buy good books," "Read, or at any rate taste, your books before you buy."

It is matter of frequent comment that we who have in the course of the last few centuries produced a greater and more varied volume of fine literature than any other people, are not a nation of book buyers, or of readers. No one who compares the paucity of number and the paltry character of the bookshops in any ordinary English town with those of a town of corresponding size and character in Germany, France, Switzerland, or Holland, can doubt the accuracy of this judgment. That there is a considerable sale even of solid literature in this country is doubtless true. But it forms a trifling portion of the national expenditure, and is virtually confined to a minute fraction of the educated public. We doubt whether the proportion of the nation which buys as many as twenty volumes a year (excepting railway literature) would amount to more than one tenth of one per cent. of the total population, and a far smaller proportion could satisfy Mark Pattison's test of an educated man, that he should spend at least five per cent. of his income upon books.

As a people, we have never taken books seriously, as we have taken horses. Hence, as Ruskin has pointed out, we speak of men who are interested in collecting books as "bibliomaniacs," but have never even thought of coining the word "hippo-maniac" to designate those who squander far larger sums on horses and on racing.

Much, indeed, is said of the sudden loosening of cheap reprints of our great national literature, which new trade methods and the lapse of mid-Victorian copyrights are causing. That it should be possible, as it is, to purchase in attractive binding and serviceable print, the poetry of Keats for sixpence, and Macaulay's History for eighteen-pence, is a great opportunity of national gain. The enormous output of "great books" in this new shape is certainly substantial evidence of a national demand. These books are widely bought, and we fain would hope are widely read. But of this last fact we feel less certain. There are large, rising grades of English society where a bookcase filled with volumes of standard authors belongs to the equipment of domestic respectability. This was once true only of the upper-middle class. Now it applies also to a larger lower-middle and even an artisan class in Lancashire and other districts where this sale of cheap reprints is known to be particularly large. The present education of large classes has just reached the point where the names of great books and of their authors are known and command a certain half-superstitious veneration. There is just enough desire and curiosity to tempt to the possession of books which are clearly "bargains"; is there enough to last for intelligent perusal? But to this matter, it may be contended, faith is applicable, for proof is clearly impossible. We are, therefore, entitled to hope, perhaps to believe, that the works of the immortal masters of our tongue are for the first time beginning to find the hearts and intellects of our democracy, and to win a growing recognition that the volumes which contain "the best that has been said and thought" in the world are as valued a part of our national life as our commerce, our politics, our sport, and other serious pursuits in which we live and move and have our being.

But there are difficulties even for those who desire to get from books what they have to give. There is the need of a choice of books, a theme upon which Mr. Harrison himself has written with so much wisdom and erudition in times past. Before choosing, we must have the conditions of a choice. No general prescriptions for reading avail much: the same "hundred best books" does not rightly fit any two readers. Each man's own nature, education, and personal needs must count for much. "If you want a house, or a motor-car, or a wife," says Mr. Harrison, "you take a very good look at them before you invest." What Mr. Harrison preaches he likewise practises. But for most of us, it is not an easy saying. In most Continental cities, a bookshop of any pretensions is a place of free entry to book lovers, where they can find and handle not merely the novels of a season, too often, as Ruskin puts it, "the latest froth from the fountain of folly," but all the recent fruits of literature and learning in the principal languages of the civilised world. Even in America this is the case. Not merely in "Brentano's," but in the retail stores which most of the great publishing houses of New York or Boston support, the visitor can examine and taste not only the current output of the press, but a large stock of older masterpieces: he is free to come and go, can receive some part of skilled advice from a bookseller, who is not merely a pushing tradesman, and has the opportunity of choice which Mr. Harrison calls for. In the eighteenth century and later this was the common practice in London; and, for the few, such shops as Sotheran's, Quaritch's, and Bumpus's, still furnish these facilities to customers, while there survives a little knot of second-hand booksellers, who are popular educators of a very real and worthy sort. But these are rare exceptions in our modern trade.

Whether the publisher, the retailer, or the buying public is to blame for the lapse of this necessary condition of wholesome buying, we know not; but the fact remains that the vast majority of book-shops make no appreciable pretence of stocking serious literature, still less of tendering skilled disinterested advice and of helping customers to clear-eyed acts of purchase. True, the widespread growth of public and private lending libraries furnishes some sort of substitute. Book-buyers of discretion can, and doubtless do, utilise this means of inspection and of trial with a view to choosing permanent additions to their personal library. This is indeed the most proper use of any lending library. But its right exercise implies a more serious intellectual habit than most members of our "educated classes" appear to command. For the lavish continuous flow of new books leads many to substitute the hurried tasting of many dishes for a solid meal: they taste instead of buying. To this is attributed the pitiful decay of many a library, the orderly upkeep of which once was a duty and a pride to families of inherited traditions of culture over the length and breadth of our country. The well-filled shelves are still rich with the representative works of our eighteenth and early nineteenth century writers, but no serious attempt has been made in the last decades to maintain the intellectual fabric by any well-considered choice of later standard works. Indeed, we are not sure whether the very conception of new "standard" works is not perishing.

This thought perhaps lurks in one passage of Mr. Harrison's address, where, half-humorously, half-pathetically, he alludes to the hardship of the living author who is brought into such keen competition with the dead, whose very deadness seems to clothe them with an authority not wholly warranted by intrinsic qualities of worth. It is not, indeed, unlikely that one immediate effect of the liberation of great Victorian masterpieces from the thralldom of copyright within the last few years has been to depress the purchase and the reading of the good books which have to carry in their price the maintenance of living writers. Indeed, a policy of subsidies to meet this "unfair competition" accompanied if needed, by a positive restriction upon the proportion of dead literature, which any "consumer" should be permitted to purchase in a year, would, we fancy, commend itself to some of our struggling bookmen, and would command a case at least as specious as can be made for any other sort of protection. But, the economics of bookselling apart, there are some higher grounds for cultivating moderation in our converse with the dead. For, though books play in the restoration of the past a part far more important than that which they can claim in rendering the present, there is even in the world of books some place for the saying that "A living dog is better than a dead lion." Only of the highest properties of the greatest masterpieces can it be said that their true worth and force outlast the ages. Both human nature and the world suffer deeper and more organic changes than the exclusive dwellers in the past are willing to admit. New dominant forces and issues crowd upon the stage of life, and the literature which shall help us to envisage and resolve them must be the literature, not of Greece, nor of Elizabethan England, but of to-day. So in our choice of books, as in other matters, we must clear our minds of superstition, as far as we are able, and do justice between the claims of the present and the past.

TROUBLE AMONG THE TROUT.

MR. W. M. ARMISTEAD, a professional student of fish-culture, has made an important discovery. The trout-fishing in a certain lake had been steadily falling off from year to year. There was no obvious explanation. The lake was not polluted; it was not overfished by legitimate anglers; poachers did not harry it in any exceptional measure. What was the cause of the decline? Was it that, while plentiful as ever, the fish were gradually ceasing to rise at flies? It would be well, Mr. Armistead thought, to know what stock the water held. To gain this information, he built a trap at the mouth of a stream which feeds the lake. "Every fish leaving the lake to spawn was caught, and the amazing fact revealed that the proportion of males to females was only one in seventeen." This, of course, meant that the stock had been declining, and that it must for a time continue to decline. It is not known that trout are ever polygamous; if any of them are, it is certain that the departures from the rule are inconsiderable. Thus, Mr. Armistead was justified in inferring from the result of his experiment that out of every seventeen spawn-beds noted by the water-bailiffs soon after the trout had been set free only one bed was of any value whatever. The other sixteen beds were sterile. The lake was losing stock at the rate of many thousands of trout a year. There are other waters, rivers as well as lakes, in which the same waste has been mysteriously going on.

Why is it that in many a water the female fish tend to be much more plentiful than the males? There are two known causes of the disproportion. One is that large and well-nourished female trout produce more female than male offspring. This is stated by Mr. Armistead; and, as he has been engaged in responsible experiments for many years, we must take it, strange as it seems, to be incontrovertible. The other main cause is the destruction of young males by large old ones. Male trout, Mr. Armistead says, "fight so fiercely that any one who has had opportunity of handling wild spawning fish will frequently find males so badly wounded that they cannot live." Watching a stream carefully, you may see some of this hostility for yourself. It is to be noticed even in spring and summer, when it is a matter of pure selfishness. Wherever there is a particularly good hover, as just below the place where a ditch runs in, bringing a special supply of food, you shall see a particularly large trout. He is, in fact, the largest in the neighbourhood. Any male seeking to trespass in the choice corner will be immediately and fiercely attacked; indeed, if the intruder be small enough to be merely impudent, and not a serious rival, he will be actually seized and chewed. Should the large trout be caught by an angler, his place will soon be taken by the next-largest among those close by, and the state of siege and defence will go on exactly as before. This warfare is greatly aggravated when the time for spawning comes. The female trout seems to be invariably good-tempered, accepting the attentions of any male that offers himself; but the males are not indifferent. They have predilections. As far as you can make out, the large ones always desire to mate with the largest of the females; but, unfortunately, the small ones have the same ambition. Consequently, a trout-stream in autumn is the theatre of a great many unseemly battles. On almost any shallow you will see a fish furrowing the gravel with its fins. That is the female, making a nest. Very close to her, perhaps alongside, perhaps just behind, is another fish, perhaps approximately of the same size, but probably larger. That is a male, intending to be the father of the prospective family. Now and then, from one side or the other, a trout comes over, anxious to take his place; and either, as is usually the case, the intruder, being comparatively small, is attacked and defeated, or the intruder is heavier and more vigorous, and the mating pair are violently divorced. As a rule, alike in spring and summer and at the spawning time, it is the old trout that conquer.

That is to the disadvantage of the tribe. The old trout, though good fighters, are not good fathers. Their progeny, besides being female in excessive proportion, tend to be weaklings. Then, the old male trout are cannibals. Their consumption of the young is enormous. It is with good reason believed that an old male trout is as destructive to the young of his own kind as is a pike of the same size. How is the evil state of affairs to be redressed? How is the proper balance of the sexes to be restored? In order to arrive at an answer, we must first endeavour to understand how the balance came to be deranged. A decided opinion on that subject is not easily to be reached; but there are certain well-known facts which suggest what seems a reasonable conjecture. Lake trout rise freely to the fly only when they are young or adolescent. There are exceptions, of which Lochleven and Blagdon afford the most notable examples; but the general rule is as we have stated. Consider the Highlands, in which there are more lakes than are to be found in all the rest of the Kingdom. On favourable days throughout the season the trout there rise to the fly very freely; but the average basket is not better than three-to-the-pound. How is that? It is not to be taken as indicating the average weight of the fish in the water. As you perceive when you troll a minnow with success, the lake has trout very much heavier than a third-of-a-pound, and it is reasonable to believe that the larger fish are plentiful.

The explanation is simply that when they grow beyond three-quarters-of-a-pound the lake trout as a rule cease to feed on flies habitually. That they feed largely on young fish is a fair deduction from the avidity with which they seize the trolled minnows or small trout. It is difficult for conjecture to go beyond this as to what happens when the fish are in the lake. We can hardly imagine that the large female trout devour their male companions, as female congers are said to do. Thus we are driven to the assumption that if what we have seen to happen in the streams at spawning-time is not sufficient to account for the scarcity of males, the fish must be fratricidal in the lake as well. As regards streams, however, an explanation is readily given. Wherever anglers are at liberty to use worm and minnow as well as fly, the stock of trout is well maintained. Witness the many free waters in Scotland, in which the fish, though declining in size, are not perceptibly diminished in number. On the other hand, wherever all lures save fly are forbidden, the stock constantly tends towards decline. Witness the highly-preserved chalk-streams in the South of England, in which the trout, while of much better average size, in consequence of a rule that fish under a certain weight must not be retained, are kept up in numbers only by artificial stocking every year. In streams of the one class the trout past taking fly and becoming cannibal are thinned out by anglers using worm and minnow; in streams of the other class the elderly trout, which only sunken baits would lure successfully, are preserved to become scourges of their species.

Clearly, then, wherever the balance of the sexes is seriously deranged, the old trout should be captured. That is the obvious remedy. At first sight it does seem paradoxical to say that in order that there may be more males we must put an end to the more elderly among the few that are to be found; but this is indeed the case. Destruction of the patriarchs is the condition precedent to a restored state of nature. This has been made manifest by the natural history of the problem. It points to an ideal system of management which will to begin with offend the understanding of those who are interested in "strictly-preserved" streams. "What?" they will exclaim. "Allow worm and minnow? Never!" It cannot be denied that there will be a certain reasonableness in their reluctance. Anglers using worm or minnow would catch not the cannibals only. They would catch young trout also. Still, it is demonstrable that the remedy suggested would do no harm even to the streams of Hampshire. Whilst it is certain that worm and minnow, deftly plied, would bring to bank many a trout that had escaped the fly, the rule as to what is a takeable trout would remain in force. All fish under the limit would be returned to the water. Only those above the limit would be kept, and of these not a few would be old fish of no use to the fly-fisher and of much worse than no use to the stock. Trout above two pounds would become fewer; but trout of that weight, and trout between it and the limit, would become so much more plentiful that artificial stocking would be no longer necessary. In other parts of the Kingdom, most notably in Scotland, the problem, as we have seen, is slightly different. On lakes generally fly-fishing is so attractive that worm and minnow, though not forbidden, are not much in use. They should be more in use. Unless the coarse utility of the net is to be resorted to, it is by means of them alone that the pirates can be kept down. As to the rivers and streams, even those which are open to all-comers will attain their original excellence two or three years after general acceptance of the principle that it is unsportsmanlike and unwise to take a trout which is less than three-quarters-of-a-pound. If all fish under that standard were returned to the water, trout fulfilling the condition of capture, and trout still better, would ere long, in all clean streams, be as abundant as the most exacting angler could wish. Mr. Armistead says that "great care and judgment are necessary to maintain the stock of fish in lake or river at anything like its best." That is true. Until recently care has been the exception, not the rule, and such judgment as has been employed has been partly wrong. Owners of trout-streams and anglers generally are only beginning to realise that the science of their subject is still in an elementary state. Hitherto they have been inclined to assume that the fish take sufficient care of themselves. The truth is that trout need as studious attention as grouse or pheasants.

The Drama.

THE CENSORED PLAY.

Two problems suggest themselves with regard to Mr. Granville Barker's play, "Waste," the character of the work and the action of the Censor in refusing the right of public performance. On the latter point a suggestive light is thrown by the action of the dramatic critics. They all analyse it—mostly at great length, and with every appearance of intellectual interest in their subject, and then, with one or two exceptions, conclude, with no reason or with little reason, that they approve the Censor's decision. I take Mr. Walkley of the "Times" as an example of these critics. Mr. Walkley tells us that Mr. Barker's play is a work of "extraordinary power." He says that it deals with some of the "most fundamental facts of human life with an unflinching truthfulness." He adds that it is "the most vivid and probably the most authentic presentation" we have yet had on the English stage of great questions, "social and political," and that these questions "come home to all Englishmen's business and bosoms." And yet he finds that this play, as to which he alleges no indelicacy of treatment, is, for reason of "public policy and expediency" unfit for public performance. In other words, a drama which (a) deals with the facts that most deeply underlie human existence, (b) is unflinchingly truthful in its presentation of these facts, (c) treats of important social and political problems, i.e., of things which, let us say, concern statesmen, ministers, journalists, and which deeply modify the aspect of the State in which we live, (d) also handles questions entering into the inner and outer life of the "man in the street," should not be openly played. Really, if it be true that Mr. Barker's drama exhibits all the moral and intellectual qualities which Mr. Walkley assigns to it, its performance would seem to be a matter not for State prohibition, but for State patronage and endowment. Personally, I do not put its value on quite so exalted a level as Mr. Walkley. But, when I recall the mass of light-minded or salacious nonsense on which the dramatic critic of the "Times" has for years been driven to exercise his wit and intelligence, this care for "public policy" strikes me as a trifle belated.

To quit all verbal play, let me ask at once, who is properly debarred from seeing this tragedy of Mr. Barker's? The answer is clear. Young people are debarred, just as they would be debarred from reading much great literature. They would not understand its intellectual power and meaning; none of the problems of politics and conduct with which it deals arise in their experience or could be fitly interpreted by them. Who else is debarred? Magistrates? Ministers of the State and the Gospel? Politicians? Social Reformers? Fathers and mothers? Excepting one doubtful point of stage management, which Mr. Archer properly questions, the play contains no suggestion of indelicate or over-crude presentment. It certainly contains no indelicate speech or phrase. It exhibits no insincerity, and no light-mindedness—two qualities conspicuously present in a great body of contemporary English drama, with which Mr. Walkley and his colleagues have had to deal. It gives one minute to passion, and for the rest has entirely to do with retribution. The material of the play—the two problems which it raises—the character and the method of the average politician in contact with moral and religious questions, and the specially modern fear and hatred of motherhood, are, as I have said, admittedly important. Do not these concern the average citizen? I am driven to suppose that they are unsuited to the ears of editors. But then I remember that in a notorious case they presented to their readers, in only too gross and abundant detail, the circumstances of the crime with which Mr. Barker deals by recording its consequences to the man and woman whom it destroys.

So much for the attitude of the conventional critic to one of the half-dozen dramas, which during the last dozen years, it has been worth the while of serious men and women to go and see. When I come to the work itself, I speak, with all my admiration for it, and my sense that this forbidden play wipes out the trivial record of nineteen-twentieths of its predecessors, with some qualification. Mr. Barker has certainly an intellect of a most surprising quality. It is less introspective than Mr. Shaw's, but more receptive to the play of life, more sympathetic to the workings of average human nature. The conception of "Waste" is singularly broad and daring. It is an ambitious thing not only to try and describe the British politician at his mechanical business of Cabinet-making, but to present the British public with some verisimilitude of the types which govern it, and of the ideas and methods that underlie their statesmanship. All these tasks Mr. Barker achieves. It is all quite plausible and very suggestive. No great moral distance separates the calculations which make his Lord Horsham—a kind of Palmerston-Balfour—first decide to take Trebell into his Cabinet, and then to exclude him from it, from the intrigues which threw Lord Salisbury and Lord Randolph Churchill together, and finally drove them apart. It is possible—though not probable—to conceive an Opportunist-Imperialist-Radical of the semi-materialist, semi-idealist type of Trebell, endeavouring to "square" the Tory and High Church Parties with some such plan of "concurrent endowment" in secondary education as Mr. Barker has sketched out. I smiled as I watched its development, for here at least, if the voice was Mr. Barker's, the hand was the ever-ready hand of Mr. Sidney Webb. Much more interesting and "verifiable," however, is Mr. Barker's view of the governing man. It coincides very closely with Ibsen's and Tolstoy's, and Mr. Barker may have been influenced by the fact that the two most powerful analytical minds in modern Europe agree in believing that the political world is largely in the hands of men who, by the nature of their business are faithless, cowardly, weakly designing, absorbed in "tactics," only able to understand the argument that appeals to party or personal advantage. The depressed observer of politics often comes to the same conclusion; and Mr. Barker achieves a real triumph of political satire when he exhibits the "Hof-Comite" of the Tory Party—not as some critics absurdly suppose, the Cabinet Council itself—debating whether it is safe to have Trebell and his wonderful Disestablishment Bill, whether the major scandal of his connection with a disgraceful case can be avoided, and the wronged husband tricked or argued into silence, and, if so, whether the minor scandal of private gossip or spiteful journalism is not still too dangerous to face. All this is very subtly done, and is rich and suggestive material for a dramatist to handle.

It is when I come to the problem of Trebell's character and fate, that I feel some doubt as to Mr. Barker's entire success. What is Trebell? Certainly, a very bold adventurer in politics if he thinks that he can at the same time persuade the Ritualistic statesman of the type of Lord Hugh Cecil that he—an Agnostic, who would build the public school "on the site of the Church"—means to endow Anglicanism for ever and ever, and induce the Nonconformists to acquiesce in a universality of State-endowed sectarian training colleges. This would mean, not a deal, but a betrayal all round, and it is in harmony with the hard, purely egotistic side of this clever barrister, turned Disraelian statesman. Such a man might well crush a pretty butterfly like Mrs. O'Connell, when she catches him in an idle hour in a country house, and never trouble even to understand the sister who loves and understands him. But is he the person to kill himself not merely because his Bill is rejected, and his place in the Coalition Cabinet lost to him, but because he feels that some strain of mystic fatherhood has broken in him with the death of his victim? Would he have acknowledged his child if it had been born? Would he feel such a tie, formed under such circumstances? If he did, he would surely feel more. He would not feel merely like an animal trapped by unlucky circumstance, as Mr. Barker makes him sometimes feel. He would feel more for the woman; less for himself. He might even like to tell the whole truth, and face the world afresh, as Karsten Bernick in "The Pillars of Society" faces it. In a word, a moral arrest and revolution would have occurred, and there would have been a capital point, a decisive crown, to Mr. Barker's play. And if, on the other hand, Trebell was a mere egotist, he would have gone on and tried to rebuild his career, which, indeed, is not seriously compromised. It is here that Mr. Barker might have let himself go. As it is, his play suffers from a certain moral coldness and diffidence.

It is only fair to note the extreme delicacy of the verbal workmanship, and on this ground alone the public has a serious quarrel with the Censor. The play is over-long, and would bear free cutting, and the politics are too closely discussed for an audience of all sorts. But many of the sayings are most subtle and pertinent. "Who knows a Radical Bill when he sees it?" is very good. Here are two others: "One cannot work with men who make up their minds prematurely," "The country will accept anything, if there's money enough in it to bribe everybody fairly." It is astonishing that a young student of the drama should have gone so far, and shot such an arrow of strength and swiftness, as the author of "Waste." It is still more astonishing that the body of English dramatic critics should think such work fitted for the destroying hand of Mr. Redford.

M.

Open Questions.

THE FOUR-FOLD PATH OF SOCIALISM.

It is natural and proper for Liberals to disclaim and even to denounce that Socialism which desires to secure for the State "the ownership and control of all the instruments of production, distribution, and exchange," and to force all citizens to earn their livelihood as public employees. On the other hand, there is a Socialism to which, by past history and present intentions, they are committed, and it is right that they should realise its meaning. It is genuine Socialism, inasmuch as it involves the adoption of new functions by the State, increased interference with private enterprise and private property, and an expansion of the area of public employment. Every student of the development of modern Government knows that this movement is operative in various directions, and at different paces in every civilised country, and that it is a part of the very process of civilisation. In one sense it is "opportunistic" in that each step is apt to be considered and determined, by the practical politicians responsible for taking it, upon "its own merits," and not as part of a larger movement. But though the conscious and intentional connection between the several steps is slight, they none the less form the related parts of an organic policy forced upon modern States by the material and moral needs of the situation. The fact that these needs must operate through the political mind of the people means that the movement is not inevitable in a "fatalist" sense, but that it is guided and moulded by the wisdom or folly of politicians.

What, then, is the nature of the "Socialism" which is going on, and to the furtherance of which most Liberals are committed? Mr. Sidney Webb recently spoke of it as "a four-fold path," and we may most conveniently lay it out in terms of this metaphor.

1.—The modern State (including the municipality and other areas of governmental action) undertakes to furnish to its citizens an increasing variety of goods or services which cannot safely or advantageously be left to private enterprise. This point I need not labour here: the reference is to the so-called "Gas and Water" Socialism of our cities, and to the assumption of the postal service and other carrying trades, public education, the monetary system, &c., by the central government. Wherever the use of land or other natural resources, the magnitude of the financial or business operations involved, the "routine" or mechanical nature of the goods or services supplied, or other natural or legal conditions preclude the feasibility of genuine, effective competition, or render it too inconvenient, the State or municipality steps in and undertakes the work, or exercises, by means of regulation and taxation, a control which involves semi-Socialism, and is commonly a half-way house to the fuller public undertaking. Most public monopolies in recent times are undertaken as the only alternative to private monopoly. Others are primarily due to motives of hygiene or police, as where public abattoirs, public drink houses, or milk depôts are substituted for private ones, the injurious results of whose competition cannot efficiently be otherwise controlled. There is probably no case where this "Socialism" is based primarily on the view that the State or city can do the work more cheaply: even the banking business of the Post Office came into being as a policy of public convenience and of public morals. As the conditions of modern industry develop monopoly or restricted competition, or dangerous excesses in competing trades, such as adulteration or irregularity of supply owing to conflicts with labour, more and more industries pass under the direct administration of public bodies.

2.—Industrial regulations designed to protect the wage-earners against injurious conditions of labour which, from ignorance or weakness of bargaining power, they cannot resist, or to protect the consuming public from the bad qualities of the goods or services they buy, or to secure the public health and safety against noxious or unpleasant results of private industry, such as the reckless carriage of explosives, smoke, or the pollution of rivers, forms a large part of modern practical Socialism. Everywhere it involves public interference with liberty of contract and with the right of private individuals to conduct their own business and to use their own property as they choose. The most important of recent movements in State Regulation is the insistence that the public has a right to intervene directly in the settlement of conditions of wages and hours of labour between private employers and employees.

3.—A third path of actual Socialism, not always distinguishable from the second, consists of the humanitarian measures adopted by the State to assist the weaker members of society to meet sickness, unemployment, old-age destitution, and other emergencies against which they either cannot or do not make adequate provision. The young, the old, the defective, the sick, the ignorant, the out-of-work, are everywhere the objects of governmental care. Although growing pity and sensitiveness for individual suffering have been powerful motives in impelling the adoption of these measures, they must none the less be interpreted as part of a rational self-protective policy in modern societies. They are based upon two generally valid assumptions. The first is that the public health, morale, and industrial efficiency are seriously impaired by the mal-nutrition, bad education, compulsory idleness, sickness, and destitution of large numbers of our citizens. The second assumption is that the main economic springs of poverty lie so far beyond the control of the poorer members of the community as to render it impossible to expect them to possess or exercise the industry, intelligent foresight, thrift, and other elements of individual character requisite to cope with the modern emergencies of working-class life. In a word, the contention is that destitution and its related miseries are a poison in the body politic, and that individual effort is incompetent to eliminate it. Hence comes the application of remedies or palliatives by the modern State. This public policy is, of course, no novel one: in England it may be regarded in logic and in history as the development of the principles and practices of our Poor Law. It is in substance, as a writer to THE NATION has described it, "anti-destitutionism," driving piles into the quagmire of poverty so as to furnish a solid foundation for a sound individual and social life. The particular measures which express it, such proposals as universal non-contributory old-age pensions, free feeding of school children, municipal workshops for the unemployed, may be sound or unsound methods of assisting in this task, but the necessity of finding adequate supports to the defective self-help of social weaklings by the social self-help of the State is a generally accepted principle of public policy.

4.—Taxation, as a method or instrument of public action, implies in itself that Socialism is limited. Under "complete" Socialism no taxation would, of course, be requisite, for the entire income of the community would pass through the hands of the State, which would keep what it wanted in the process. But for the sorts of Socialism which are actually proceeding taxation is essential, and States are taking for public expenditure a larger and larger proportion of the incomes of private citizens by direct or indirect imposts. In more enlightened States the tendency is more and more to raise public income by placing taxes directly upon rents of land and other unearned elements of income, and to exempt from taxation incomes necessary to sustain the efficiency and industry of the productive members of society. The underlying principle of this taxation, now struggling into conscious policy, is the intention to take as much of this "unearned" income as can be got and to apply it to the furtherance of the fuller public activities along the three paths already described. This public income is needed, in part to subsidise public goods or services which the State or municipality holds desirable to supply to the public gratuitously or below "cost" price; in part to support the regulative control over industries which remain in private hands; in part to wage war against poverty and destitution.

To all these general modes of Socialism most English Liberals are now committed in sympathy and practice, if not in conscious theory, though upon particular measures, upon pace and order of march, many divergencies exist. What is needed is a firm realisation that such Socialism is involved in the constructive Liberalism of the present and the future, and that what Liberals must do who repudiate the extremities of "social democracy" is to convert their social reforms from a piece-meal opportunism into an organic policy consistent with the fundamental concept of Liberalism.

Believing as they do that the true welfare of the State and of society rests upon the maintenance of individual liberty, they are in possession of a test or gauge of reasonable Socialism which is applicable at each step which they are invited to take along the four-fold path. Let them require that each new enlargement of State functions, each fresh interference with private property or enterprise shall justify itself by showing that it creates more liberty than it takes away, equalises and enlarges the aggregate of opportunities for healthy individual exertion and expression, and strengthens the foundations of society, upon which individuals build their lives.

J. A. H.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THE reply made by six Italian Catholics to the Pope's recent encyclical is the fullest statement of the Modernists' position and aims that has yet appeared. Apart from its controversial interest, the book is a valuable contribution to scientific theology, for it contains an exposition of the religious philosophy now held by progressive Catholics, a statement of their attitude towards the Higher Criticism, and a vindication of their right to re-state Catholic dogma in the language of the present day. We are glad to learn that Mr. Fisher Unwin has now made arrangements to publish an English translation of this interesting work. The translator is the Rev. A. L. Lilley, who has also translated the striking pamphlet, "What We Want," which we reviewed some time ago. Mr. Lilley has a thorough knowledge of the Modernist movement, and we believe that he has also in contemplation a study of its development to be written from an English standpoint.

THE two volumes of historical and literary essays by Lord Acton, of which we gave some particulars in an earlier issue, will contain a lengthy introduction, in which the editors discuss Lord Acton's view of history. As showing the moral point of view from which he regarded it, the following passages are of special interest:—

"The second tendency against which Acton's moral sense revolted, had risen out of the laudable determination of historians to be sympathetic towards men of distant ages and of alien modes of thought. . . . It became almost a trick of style to talk of judging men by the standard of their day and to allege the spirit of the age in excuse for the Albigensian Crusade or the burning of Hus. Acton felt that this was to destroy the very bases of moral judgment and to open the way to a boundless scepticism. Anxious as he was to uphold the doctrine of growth in theology, he allowed nothing for it in the realm of morals—at any rate, in the Christian era—since the thirteenth century. He demanded a code of moral judgment independent of place and time, and not merely relative to a particular civilisation. He also demanded that it should be independent of religion. . . . He thought that all men might agree in admitting the sanctity of human life and judging accordingly every man or system which needlessly sacrificed it. It is this preaching in season and out of season against the reality of wickedness, and against every interference with the conscience that is the real inspiration both of Acton's life and of his writings."

MR. JOHN LANE, who should be remembered with gratitude as the publisher to introduce Francis Thompson to the literary world, has an interesting project in view. He is publishing a four-fold series of volumes, which is intended to mark the arrival of four newcomers in the field of literature. The volumes will be called "A New Poet," "A New Critic," "A New Humorist," and "A New Classic." The new poet, we believe, is Mr. Abercrombie, an example of whose work we publish elsewhere.

THE volumes in "The Tudor and Stuart Library," issued by the Clarendon Press, are deservedly popular among book-lovers. The next in the series is to be "Shakespeare's Sonnets, and A Lover's Complaint," reprinted from the edition of 1609, with an introduction by Mr. W. H. Hadow, to whose careful scholarship students of English literature already owe so much. The problem of the Sonnets is a difficult one. In Mr. Hadow's view there is no more tremendous revelation of human weakness in all literature. The cry of Catullus is, he says, faint in comparison. But he also rightly insists that the Sonnets, though lyric, have a dramatic basis, and that Shakespeare's true self is revealed "not in the story which they narrate, but in the judgments on life and love which they contain."

IN the same series we are also soon to have reprints of Thomas Wilson's "Arte of Rhetorique," and George Turberville's "Noble Arte of Venerie or Hunting"—both famous books in their day, and still of value for the help they give in elucidating Shakespeare's language and metaphors. Judge Madden, in his admirable volume on Elizabethan sport, "The Diary of Master William Silence," disputes the authorship of Turberville's book, judging it to be the work of some hack scribe. At the same time he admits that it was the standard book upon the subject, and offers no explanation of the fact that Gervase Markham and Nicholas Cox both attributed it to Turberville. Wilson's "Arte of Rhetorique" is the first critical treatise in English. The directions are given with a good deal of humour, as witness the following sentence illustrating the alliterative style which he condemns: "Pitiful poverty prayeth for a penny, but puffed presumption passeth not a point, pampering his paunch with pestilent pleasure, procuring his passport to post it to hell-pit, there to be punished with pains perpetual."

DR. H. B. SWETE, Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, has just finished a book on "The Appearances of Our Lord after the Passion," which Messrs. Macmillan will publish next month. It is described by the author as "a simple narrative of the appearances of the risen Lord, based on a study of the documents." Among theologians who have in recent years published studies of the Resurrection may be mentioned Schmiedel, Dobschütz, Meyer, Simpson, Ihmels, and Moffatt. We may expect from Professor Swete a valuable contribution to the subject.

MR. MUIRHEAD BONE, the Scotch etcher, whose prints are sought with assiduity alike by English collectors and foreign Governments, has devoted a great part of the present year to illustrating a novel of peasant life, "Children's Children," by his wife, Mrs. Gertrude Bone. It has been said by connoisseurs that the literary quality of the author's former book, "Provincial Tales," was as remarkable for spiritual delicacy as her husband's work is for purity of line. A finished edition on Japanese paper for collectors will be published early next month by Messrs. Duckworth, along with the ordinary edition for the general public.

THE interpretation of Mr. George Meredith's work is engaging a number of critical pens. Elsewhere we review Mrs. M. Sturge Henderson's "George Meredith: Novelist, Poet, Reformer," while Messrs. Routledge announce "Aspects of George Meredith," by Mr. R. P. Curle. In the latter volume there will be no systematic examination of Mr. Meredith's books, the author rather aiming at explaining different sides of Meredithian philosophy and thought from a personal point of view. A third book, "The Novels of George Meredith," by Mr. E. E. J. Bailey, is to be published in America by Charles Scribner's Sons.

MESSRS. TEUBNER of Leipzig have just published a selection from the writings of the late Hermann Usener, under the title "Vortraege und Aufsätze." Usener was one of the greatest philologists of the last century, and these essays are an admirable introduction (quite popular in character) to Usener's methods and general point of view. The essay on Mythology is particularly admirable and illuminating, and the other essays in the volume are all of great value and interest.

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The History of England During the Reign of Victoria." By Sidney Low and Lloyd C. Sanders. Volume XII. of The Political History of England. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Palaces of Crete and their Builders." By Angelo Mosso. (Unwin. 21s. net.)

"Dyott's Diary, 1781-1845." Edited by R. W. Jeffery. (Constable. Two Vols. 31s. 6d. net.)

"Fourteen Years in Parliament." By A. S. T. Griffith-Boscawen. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Letters of Edward Lear." Edited by Lady Strachey. (Unwin. 15s. net.)

"Studies in Venetian History." By Horatio F. Brown. (Murray. Two Vols. 18s. net.)

"St. Catherine of Sienna." By E. G. Gardner. (Dent. 16s. net.)

"The Comments of Bagshot." By J. A. Spender. (Constable. 3s. 6d.)

"The Empire of Christ." By Bernard Lucas. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)

"The Fruit of the Tree." By Edith Wharton. (Macmillan. 6s.)

"Le Quattrocento—Essai sur l'Histoire Littéraire du XVe. Siècle Italien." Par Philippe Monnier. Nouvelle Edition. (Paris: Perrin. 10 fr.)

"Le Peinture Anglaise de ses Origines à nos Jours." Par Armand Dayot. (Paris: Laveur. 50 fr.)

"Mademoiselle Dax, Jeune Fille." Roman. Par Claude Farrère. (Paris: Ollendorff. 3 fr. 50.)

"Der Abenteurer." Roman. Von Rud. Herzog. (Stuttgart: Cotta. M. 4.)

Letters to the Editor.

INDUSTRIAL ARBITRATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The new Arbitration Bill now before the New Zealand Parliament has a special interest for our own country at the present time. The "New Zealand Herald" of September 26th reports the admission by the Hon. J. A. Millar, the Minister in charge, that the lower grade of compulsory Conciliation Boards at present existing there "are useless, and no method of amendment will make them better as long as the present system obtains." The reason is given that they have ceased to be "Conciliation" Boards, and are simply "lower Courts with professional advocates on both sides, which prevents any chance of conciliation being obtained." These professional men, the Minister continued, "are causing all the trouble," and he goes on to cite the action of the timber workers in Auckland, the iron moulders, and two other unions, who either have agreed or are agreeing directly with their employers, quite apart from the interference of the Court. That course is what the new Bill now proposes. Its "whole principle," its introducer says, "is to bring about conciliation between employers and employees without the intervention of any party that is not directly interested in the result of the conference." The only objections to the Bill appear to come from unions where secretaries are not members of the industries affected. Mr. Millar expects the Bill to pass this session. This new departure throws an interesting light upon New Zealand experience. The Minister casts all the blame for any breakdown on the professional men. To an English onlooker on the spot the system itself, admirable as it was in many ways, seemed necessarily faulty in this, that at the outset it converted both employers and employed into present and prospective litigants for all time. It is surely a wiser ideal to invite conciliation between the two parties in the first instance, and to reserve to the last any resort to a compulsory arbitration court. This obviously allows more elasticity, more esprit de corps, more experimental relationships in industrial enterprises, whilst it still substitutes an appeal to a judicial tribunal for open war in the last instance.—Yours, &c.,

JOSHUA ROWNTREE.

Scarborough.

November 19th, 1907.

MR. GALSWORTHY AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was entrapped, by its deceptive air of being fiction, into reading an argument for Woman Suffrage called "The Mother," by Mr. John Galsworthy, which you published on Saturday; and cannot forbear from writing to suggest to you what a very bad argument it seems to be. He represents the case of a woman of saintly patience married to a criminal lunatic, who habitually beats her with a belt at the end of the day's work. At the first blush the moral seems to be that if women had votes such things would not occur; but that cannot be what the author meant, for all that "the Mother" has to do, under our present system of voting, to end her misfortunes, is to get two men in uniform to take her husband before another man, who will, according to the law which men have made, direct other men to shut the brute up in a house built by men, and punish him. If women had votes, they could hardly want much more, and they would still have to appeal to men to do it for them.

Mr. Galsworthy seems really to mean that if the man in his story has a vote, then the woman in it ought to have one, too. But anyone might write just as good a story, in which their natures were reversed, without its having any more bearing on politics than Mr. Galsworthy's. A railway-porter with a good, kind face and curly hair, for instance, goes out in the cold grey dawn, while his wife remains snoring off her drunken sleep under the only eider-down quilt; then she gets up late, beats the children, goes out without feeding them, and returns worse than ever at 6 p.m., "slipping along the railings of the houses," like Mr. Galsworthy's heroine, when she ought to be getting her angel-husband's tea. But this is no more an argument against Women Suffrage than Mr. Galsworthy's story is an argument for it.

In real life, the man would probably not have a vote, because the woman would have got the tyrannical sex to put this disgraceful member of itself in gaol. In any case, you would not find anybody who thought it a good thing that he should have a vote. That is, in fact, the only moral which comes logically out of Mr. Galsworthy's story; that the man he has invented ought not to have a vote, under any scheme of franchise, however widely extended. But if a man who beats his wife ought not to have a vote, it does not follow in the least that the wife who is beaten ought to have a vote. If a Prime Minister beats his wife he may be unworthy to be Prime Minister, but it does not follow that his wife ought to be Prime Minister. From some motive, probably artistic and not political, Mr. Galsworthy has made this particular woman quite unfit to have a vote; she has not two ideas in her head; when she is not brooding on her ill-treatment she "once more thinks of nothing," while her husband does at any rate take part in discussions at the public-house, and must have picked up something there. When she is put to it, however, the Mother manages to trot out that old argument about having borne six children; though for the life of me I cannot see why, because she has added six citizens to the commonwealth, she should claim a right to have a voice in its management, any more than I can see why a woman who is the mother of six colour-sergeants should expect to be made a colonel.—Yours, &c.,

G. CALDERON.

33, Buckingham Mansions, West End Lane, N.W.
Sunday, November 24th, 1907.

"THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am not concerned for one moment to deny a Slavophone numerical predominance in Macedonia; but I did take exception to Mr. Masterman's unqualified implication that the "native population" of the North, West, and South of Macedonia was "Bulgarian." It is by sweeping statements such as that, uttered by responsible English publicists and politicians, that the other elements in the Balkans are irritated and exasperated, and confidence in England's desire to bring about an equitable settlement is attenuated.

I have before me as I write a pile of Blue-books, and the works of some twenty writers of various nationalities who have travelled in the Balkans. I have no prepossession except against Turkish mis-government, and I have taken an active interest for the last fifteen years in the problem created by the existence of the Turk as a governing power in Europe. But I find it quite impossible to arrive at any wholesale conclusion such as that of Mr. Masterman.

Mr. Buxton quotes one of his informants as saying: "Practically all the villages in Central Macedonia are Bulgarian, both by race and language." I turn to the very able work by "Odysseus," quoted by Mr. Buxton, and I read: "The practical conclusion is that neither Greeks, Servians, nor Bulgarians have a right to claim Central Macedonia."

M. Brancoff, in his work on "La Macédoine et sa population Chretienne," counts the whole Slav population of the vilayet of Kossovo as Bulgars. I turn again to "Odysseus," and read that "The Slavonic population of the vilayet of Kossovo, north-west of Uskub, is homogeneous with that on the other side of the Servian, Montenegrin, and Bosnian frontiers." Mr. Buxton quotes Dr. Evans that "the Greek claim to Macedonia, at least as regards the greater part of the interior of the country, is a dream." But I turn to the very painstaking and impartial work of M. Edouard Engelhardt, "La Question Macedonienne," and I read: "L'ethnographie Macedonienne, si imparfaite qu'elle soit encore, met en pleine evidence ce double fait que l'élément slave domine au Nord et l'élément grec au Sud." I could continue these contrasts to great length if they would serve to convince Mr. Masterman that his impressions have been formed rather hastily.

With Mr. Buxton's statement that "the insurrection of 1903 represented the struggle of a single and coherent nationality," as with that of his informant that "the Bulgarian bands are defending their own homes," I find it impossible to reconcile the evidence contained in our own Blue-books. That arms came from Sophia, that money came from Sophia, that officers of the regular Bulgarian army came from Sophia, are facts so abundantly clear as hardly to need re-asseveration. Our own representative at Sophia, Mr. Elliott, wrote to Lord Lansdowne on May 18th, 1903, that "there can be no question that the bands are assisted by officers of the Bulgarian Army, and by officials of the Bulgarian administration." Nor, in the light of the recent controversy in the Bulgarian Press arising out of the articles by M. Natchovitch in the "Balkanska Tribuna" (Nos. 221 and 222), does it seem open to doubt that members of the Bulgarian Cabinet were in intimate relationships with the Revolutionary Committees.

And there is abundant evidence that the movement was not spontaneously conceived or warmly welcomed in Macedonia, and that complicity in it was to a large extent forced upon the local Slavophones by terrorism. The deputation from the village of Sokolartsy to the Russian Consulate at Uskub (Blue-book Cd. 1875, p. 34); the request, reported by our Minister at Constantinople (18/5/03) of the Exarchist villagers of Vronon to be received back by the Patriarchate; the reference of our Consul General at Salonika to "Patriarchists who have been compelled, under threat of death, to change their religious appellation" (Cd. 1875, inclosure in No. 157); the refusal of the villagers of Dambéni to receive Chakalaroff (June, 1903); the spontaneous reversion of the slavophone villages of Karadjora and Gradobor to the Patriarchate in the same month; the visit of a large band under Chakalaroff to the village of Zhelovo to punish "some lukewarm or unreliable adherents," reported by our Vice-Consult at Monastir—these are but a few samples within a few weeks of one another of the many incidents which reluctantly compel me to disagree with the impressions and the inferences of Mr. C. R. Buxton. And as to his claim that the Exarchate is the national church of the Macedonians, I would refer him to "Odysseus's" history of the Exarchate: "It's language was the Bulgarian of Sofia, and not the local dialect."

I think, too, it should be borne in mind, in searching for a way out of the present impasse, that there is a natural lack of enthusiasm on the part even of large masses of Slavophone Macedonians, for any solution that would place them under the Bulgarian flag. As Sir Edward Dicey ("The Peasant State") wrote in 1894, the Bulgarians have not the qualities of a ruling race. Whilst they deserve every credit for the marvellous progress they have made since their emancipation by Russia in 1878, they have as yet hardly shown themselves capable of greater responsibilities or higher destinies. Their short history, again to quote Sir Charles Eliot ("Odysseus"), is filled with "a long catalogue of stirring events of a medieval flavour," an "interesting series of elections, ejections, wars, unions, ruptures, executions, assassinations, and reconciliations."

Finally, to Mr. Buxton's summing up of the factors to which we should attach importance in seeking a settlement, "the fundamental identities of custom, language, and race" or, as M. Engelhardt prefers, "les liens de la nationalité, de la foi, et des traditions historiques"—I would add a plea for the supreme importance of considering the actual wishes and aspirations of the people themselves.—Yours, &c.,

T. PALMER NEWBOULD.

November 25th, 1907.

"WHO ARE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The Dean of Ripon's interesting letter illustrates the proposition, which I should not dream of disputing, that in Elizabeth's time—if we except, and the exception is theoretically important, unbaptised children and ex-communicate persons—Church and State were coterminous. But it also illustrates the truth of my statement that in the Thirty-nine Articles the phrase "particular or national church" is antithetical, not to "sectional denomination," but to "church universal." I adduced legal evidence which proves conclusively, I think, that the approximate legal coterminity of Church and State has long since passed away. If I am right, the Erastian arch has lost its keystone. It is very noteworthy, therefore, that the Dean makes no attempt to show that I am wrong.

I happen to know a great many Nonconformists, and believe that a large majority of my English fellow Christians who are not members of my Church are among the most courteous and the most kindly of mankind. But there is a section which habitually forgets that Churchmen have both religious convictions and feelings. Mr. Snell must forgive me if I say that his letter was conceived in the spirit which animates the controversial literature of the latter group. He narrates what he describes as "the good story" of a drill sergeant who told an infidel recruit that until he had some religious convictions he was a member of the Church of England. Mr. Snell probably does not mean it as such, but I must tell him that this is the language not of argument but of insult. He has permitted himself on this occasion to take not only his law from the barrack-yard but also his taste. For the moment the one is as bad as the other. The tone in which the Church of England is referred to in some quarters is habitually discourteous. It is, no doubt, due to this fact that Mr. Snell did not detect a lapse which in any other connection he would at once have observed and deleted. If this is the case it is all the more necessary that in the interests of good feeling I should make a protest which is strong but not one whit too strong.—Yours, &c.,

H. J. BARDSLEY.

Barton St. Lawrence, Preston.

November 26th, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Several of your correspondents have been busying themselves about the vexed question of membership of the National Church. It is disputed that in the eye of the law every member of the State is necessarily a member of the State Church, and it is further questioned whether all baptised English people are such members; while another correspondent appears to hold that only the confirmed are members of the particular Church of England, the baptised being only members of the Christian Church generally. In view, consequently, not only of the working of the new Marriage Act, but also of the cause of Church Reform or that of Disestablishment, it seems worth while to look a little more closely into the bearings of the whole question as it affects "Church and State." One of your correspondents asserts that the phrase "National Church" has no bearing on the subject. This can only be true on the assumption—often, it must be confessed, indulged in by the Pope—that the Church of England is not the historical Church of the nation. As it happens, the way in which the term is used in the XXXIX. Articles of Religion is distinctly not that of your correspondent in question. The phrase that the "Church hath powers to decree rites or ceremonies and authority in controversies" was specially added to the original form of Article XX., because this very power and authority, as exercised by the National Church, was being opposed. This is further enlarged upon in another Article in defence of the rights of independence and self-government which belong to every particular or national Church. The line adopted by the English Reformers was "in these our doings we condemn no other nations, nor prescribe anything but to our own people only." And with regard to what constitutes membership of the Church of England, the law recognises nothing narrower than the definition of "judicious Hooker" in his Ecclesiastical Polity, "that there is not any man a member of the Commonwealth which is not also a member of the Church of England." "One nation, one church," was always the rule, however much men might, and did, differ as to precise form; indeed, for a short period, it was not Episcopalian but Presbyterian. With this Blackstone agrees, saying that the laity of the Church are "such of the people as are not comprehended under the denomination of clergy." The Acts of Toleration did no more than remove certain penalties and disabilities under which the nonconforming members laboured. The Acts of Parliament upon which the late Lord Selborne depended go no further than to require an additional religious test from certain individuals for certain specific purposes.

Not even in the appointment of lay Church officers has the franchise been essentially narrowed. The parishioners assembled in vestry—now dealing solely with ecclesiastical affairs—may elect as churchwarden any parishioner who does not happen to be either a Papist or a Jew. It has been truly said that “in law every parishioner is a Churchman, so that, if they will, Jews, Turks, Heretics, and Infidels can attend a vestry meeting, and vote on questions of vital importance to the Church.” In a larger degree this is also the case with the one other statutable body of Church laity—Parliament. Your correspondent under the guise of “Audi Alteram Partem” thinks all this is so extraordinary that it cannot be. He pathetically asks how a society could exist under such a constitution, and how such a “mixed multitude” of all sorts and conditions of men can be “accepted as representing the Church of England laity?” I may assure him that in this respect he does not stand alone. It is truly a wonderful thing that the Church of England does exist and do her work without autonomy; hampered and tied by laws, regulations, and conditions which are centuries out of date, and which manifestly must let and hinder her spiritual mission as a living Church. Is disestablishment too high a price to pay for freedom and reform? If it was any other branch of the public service the present unadjusted, archaic relations between Church and State would long ago have been condemned, and either mended or ended.—Yours, &c., J. F. W.

WANTED, A NEW HONOURS LIST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The eulogium contained in your issue of November 16th relative to “this Government’s appointments” fails to take note of the grave inadequacy of the present machinery for securing reasonable attention in certain cases where the withholding of recognition is alike impolitic and inequitable. I venture to suggest that such additions should be made to the machinery referred to as would be commensurate with present day requirements.

Speaking of the awards to Civil Servants you characterise the same as judicious and timely. Whilst conceding that in each instance the honour conferred was well deserved, I am impressed by the objection raised throughout Canada that whilst honours are conferred on Civil Servants at home, it but rarely happens that merchants and manufacturers of the Colonies who have done, and are doing, so much to consolidate the Empire, are even noticed. There never was a time when the Colonies were imbued with a more loyal and patriotic spirit than at present, and I trust your readers will consider that the practice of recognising the services of Civil Servants at home, whilst excluding men of front rank standing in the Colonies, calls for early amendment.—Yours, &c.,

R. S. FRASER.

4, Finsbury Circus, London, E.C.
November 19th, 1907.

A FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I venture to express the hope that the proposal discussed in your article of November 23rd, viz., the formation of a Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Commons, will not be allowed to drop. May I also suggest an additional argument in its favour?

We may assume that the Foreign Minister, while he will naturally resist any change which will add to his very difficult task, desires to act in general harmony with the public opinion that has appointed him. How he may be assisted in this aim by a Parliamentary Committee you have shown. From what disastrous blunders such a Committee might have saved England, Lord Salisbury’s later opinion of Mr. Disraeli’s “Peace with honour” policy is an adequate illustration.

But perhaps, overwhelmed as he must be with problems too numerous to study in detail, the Minister is bound to consider, even before the representative character of his policy, the primary need that it should operate efficiently.

Now it is no doubt regrettably true that private organisations add to the labours of the Foreign Office. And again, although popular agitation is often the best weapon that a Minister has at his disposal in dealing with other States, it is a chance if this weapon is applied at the right moment; agitators are ignorant of the time when help is needed, in which case their potential help becomes an actual nuisance. Once more, popular agitations embarrass the Foreign Office, because they are regarded by foreign Governments as the underhand creations of the British Government. Thus agitators in England assume a quite undue importance abroad, so much so that among their duties is that of persuading the Ministers of foreign States that the suspicion of collusion is unfounded.

Why not, then, remove the raison d’être of these ill-informed movements? A Minister must often wish himself free from discussion, both in and out of Parliament; but in vain will he envy his confrère in Austria, where hardly even a Socialist paper will speak of foreign policy without consulting the Ballplatz. It is too long since the habit of debating foreign affairs was established by the Parliament of Charles I. to alter it now. But it may well be worth while to direct the habit into a more convenient channel by the adoption of some such method as the French—that of a Foreign Affairs Committee.—Yours, &c.,

NOEL BUXTON.

2, Princes Gate.

November 26th, 1907.

SUNDAY LETTERS IN LONDON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I observe with satisfaction that correspondents of THE NATION are moving in this matter. It has always seemed to me a perfectly unaccountable phenomenon that five millions of people living at the heart of England should for one day in seven be cut off, and submit to be cut off, from communication with the outside world. Not only is there no delivery of letters, there is no collection on Sunday evening. In this latter case London, I believe, stands practically alone; at all events, it is much more easy to send off Sunday letters from a provincial town.

The phenomenon is partially explained by the fact that the British Post Office is run primarily as a profit-making concern, public convenience being subordinated to this consideration. So it comes about that in everything except the rapid delivery of letters, in which respect the service is, I willingly admit, quite admirable, the British Post Office is fifty years, at least, behind the Swiss Post Office, the best-managed post office in the world, which makes the public convenience its sole object. Postmasters-general are quite willing to play into the hands of Sabbatarians in order to augment the profits (devoted to the general purposes of the State) of an institution which, to justify its monopoly, ought to apply all its profits to the improvement of the service. But this does not explain why London should have been singled out for treatment more rigorous than that dealt out to Scotland, the home of Sabbatarianism. Certainly, no principle is involved. Besides, for a consideration, varying from 3d. to 2s. 9d., a letter can now be delivered in London on Sunday. What can be the justification for inflicting this tax upon the correspondent of a man dwelling just within the limit of the London postal area, while the correspondent of his friend, living half a mile further from the postal centre can get a letter delivered without paying this grievous tax?

The Swiss post offices all over the country are open on Sunday for two hours in the morning and for the same time in the afternoon; perhaps this is the minimum consistent with the public convenience.

No one would wish to inflict the delivery of letters on Sunday upon his neighbours; on the other hand, no one ought to desire to deprive his neighbours of facilities abso-lately necessary in modern life. The Belgian Post Office has hit upon an accommodation. I enclose a postage stamp which has a detachable portion bearing the words "Ne pas livrer le Dimanche." If one wishes his letter to be delivered on Sunday, he removes this portion; those who object to Sunday delivery let it remain.—Yours, &c.,

ALFRED MARKS.

155, Adelaide Road, N.W.

BELGIANS AND THE GRAND CHALLENGE CUP.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I trust that you will permit me to draw the attention of your readers to the fact that the Belgians, who now hold the Grand Challenge Cup, which they won at last Henley Regatta, are not to be allowed to defend it next year, and are forced to return the trophy without a contest.

To deprive the holders of a perpetual Challenge Cup, of any description, of the moral right to defend their title is not in accordance with the principles that have till now been popularly supposed to dominate the conduct of all things English.

If the Belgians had been defeated last year, or had voluntarily resigned the Cup, the authorities would have been in an entirely different position.

It is easy to imagine the kind of comment that is being made by people on the Continent and in the United States, who naturally expect that some privilege should be extended to the first foreign nation who have ever taken from this country the "Grand Challenge Cup for Eight Oars."

The arrangement to exclude foreign entries from the Henley Regatta of 1908 could not, and should not, have been intended to apply to the holders of a cup.

It is not too late now for the British nation to insist upon the Henley Stewards revoking their decision, and inviting the Belgians to demonstrate for a third time their ability to hold the cup.

It is important that the public should be informed that the Henley Stewards have nothing whatever to do with the Olympic Games Regatta, which is under the control of the Amateur Rowing Association, who are not in any way responsible for the action of the Trustees of the Grand Challenge Cup. Possibly if the sport of boat-racing possessed, like other sports, a Central Governing Body, this awkward situation would not have arisen.—Yours, &c.,

"FAIRPLAY."

London, November 25th, 1907.

P.S.—I enclose my card as a guarantee of good faith.

"IRELAND AND LIBERALISM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am sorry that my letter in your issue of October 26th should have been misunderstood by "A Non-Catholic Elector," with whom I believe I am in entire agreement; certainly it surprised me to find that anyone had read into my letter a "suggestion that the people are dominated in political and social matters by the clergy." The facts which your correspondent cites to refute this supposition are indisputable, and it cannot be too often reiterated in England that the Irish Home Rule movement is not, and never has been, inspired by the Roman Catholic Church. The essential point on which I insisted was that Nationalism and Roman Ultramontanism are ultimately irreconcilable. The clerical party in Ireland have never led the Nationalist movement; at the same time, it was beyond their power to resist it. But by identifying themselves with a strong Nationalist movement, as the great majority of them have done, they have undoubtedly gained an influence in other matters which I cannot but regard as excessive.

The paradox of the situation, then, is that during the greater part of the last century the most Ultramontane branch of the Roman Catholic Church has been compelled to associate itself with an essentially Liberal and democratic political propaganda; and it is obvious that the leaders of the Church in Ireland are becoming alarmed as they get a clearer view of the goal to which this unnatural alliance is rapidly bringing them. So we find the Archbishop of Dublin saying that he can support the Irish Party no longer. Cardinal Logue has openly recommended Irish voters in an English election to support a Unionist candidate against a thorough-going advocate of Home Rule. In 1906 the Bishop of Limerick made a violent attack upon the Irish Party because they supported the Government in rejecting the Lords' amendments to the Education Bill.

Now there is more in this than a mere dislike of the educational proposals of the present Government. Though it has been vastly profitable to the Irish clericals to advocate Home Rule, its attainment would be by no means so agreeable. Among other things, there is not the smallest doubt that the Irish Parliament would insist on obtaining a complete control over all education, from the primary school to the University. That does not mean that we should have an entirely undenominational system; no one of any creed in Ireland desires that. But absolute responsibility to the civil authority will be enforced through every branch of education; and the clerical party naturally do not like the prospect of relinquishing the irresponsible control which they now exercise over the primary school. All that we ask of British Liberals is that they shall set free the Irish democracy, at present tied hand and foot, to deal with Irish Ultramontanism; no genuine Nationalist has any fear of the result.

This brings me to what I can only call the very narrow view of the situation taken by your correspondent "X." If I understand him rightly, his position is: "Because you cannot agree with us upon the education question, therefore we will not give you Home Rule." Now the only contention of the Irish Party was that undenominationalism, which is unpalatable to everyone in Ireland, should not be forced upon Irish children in England. A perfectly practicable modification of Mr. Birrell's scheme would have gained for it the support of the Irish members, whose opposition was never factious or uncompromising.

But, apart from this, may I be allowed to say that your correspondent's attitude seems to me to be one of mere vindictiveness? He does not apparently consider whether Home Rule is right or wrong in itself; it is to be withheld merely on the ground that the Irish Party were unable to assent to undenominational education. I cannot see how such a policy is calculated to promote even the one object which your correspondent seems to have chiefly in view. Suppose that the Liberal Party as a whole were to adopt his attitude; the only result would be the loss of some twenty or thirty seats in industrial constituencies, and the loss of even a qualified Irish support in Parliament. How all this is going to promote undenominationalism in England I cannot see.

The truth of the matter is that Irish Home Rule is only a part, albeit the chief part, of a wider policy. The present House of Commons presents the paradoxical spectacle of a hundred Irish members, elected solely on the Home Rule issue, voting on educational questions in England; of English members elected on all sorts of issues struggling with the bewildering perplexities of Irish land tenure, or with speculations on the difference between the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland; of the Anglican Church maintained as an establishment in Wales in defiance of the unanimous wishes of the Welsh members. The English Parliament is in truth struggling with an impossible task, and the only logical solution lies in some scheme by which each of the four nations shall be set free to deal with its own problems. English Nonconformists may remember that it is necessary to grant Home Rule to Ireland if they are ever to get Home Rule for England.—Yours, &c.,

"A PROTESTANT ELECTOR."

FLOGGING IN INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been informed by the Under Secretary of State for India that Mr. Morley is about to address the Government of India on the general subject of flogging as a judicial punishment, and I share your "complete confidence that he will stop the practice." It is, indeed, high time that a stop was put to the perfectly atrocious floggings which are permitted under the Indian Penal Code. Quite recently I got a Calcutta paper reporting at length the flogging to death of a male offender in an Indian jail, and Sir Henry Cotton, M.P., in a pamphlet published by the Humanitarian League, says he has known of many such cases!

In 1902 (the last year for which figures are available) no fewer than 25,186 floggings were inflicted on adult offenders, the punishment in many cases being for petty theft and the like. In many parts of India the floggings are administered publicly, on the bare skin, and the triangles are an unpleasant feature outside almost every criminal court in India. In Burma, flogging is a perfectly legal punishment for prison offences, and it is applied to "untried" as well as convicted offenders, if the discipline of these establishments requires it.—Yours, &c.,

JOSEPH COLLINSON,
Hon. Secretary.

Indian Humanitarian Committee,
53, Chancery Lane, London,
November 6th, 1907.

RUSKIN HALL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think in your paragraph on Ruskin Hall at Oxford you mistake somewhat its object. The intention was not to enable working men to take degrees and make them into schoolmasters and clerks, but to improve them as workers. An artisan, who is able, has many chances of rising in his own line; the best of shopkeepers in many trades have begun as journeymen, and the masters of many works began as apprentices. The University and other agencies have provided, and are going on to provide still more, for the boy who shows himself at school specially apt at bookwork, opportunities for development in this direction; but Ruskin Hall has not the means, and was never meant, to give a prolonged course of literary training. The aim is rather to help those workers who are helping themselves, to a certain extent to improve their intellectual status, and by this means indirectly to conduce to their advancement in life, and their grasp of questions which affect their lives as citizens and men. This is far more important than to enable units to get out of the class in which their friends and relatives remain, into one where they must of necessity occupy more or less the uncomfortable position of strangers.—Yours, &c.,

P. J. DEAR.

58, Findhorn Place, Edinburgh.
November 26th, 1907.

[Our comments were framed in full view of the point to which our correspondent refers.—ED., NATION.]

SUPPLY OF FEMALE LABOUR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In an article on October 26th, on "Women in Industries," the writer remarks that one of the chief reasons for the low level of women's wages is "the chronic over-supply of female labour for nearly all employments that are open to them." There is certainly one employment in which there is no "chronic over-supply." For the honorable and skilled labour of cook and houseworker, there is far greater demand than supply. Wages are high, and are increasing, and hygienic conditions of living are often excellent, and are on the whole much superior to those of other employments. The unlimited competition of women workers at factories and workshops could be brought into more manageable limits if there were large drafts into domestic service, and if there were some efficient instruction to fit women for that special form of employment. This good work, and the more skilled the service, the more the position of the domestic servant would be raised.—Yours, &c.,

B. BROOKSBANK.

October 26th, 1907.

Poetry.

SOUL AND BODY.

BODY.

ART thou for breaking faith, after these years,
These many married years
Wherein we have ourselves so well delighted?
Why art thou sick? Art thou beginning fears
That our dear joys have been unholy things?
Trust me, since we have been so long plighted,— Whate'er be this white worship thou dost mean
To reach on these unlucky wings,—
Thou wilt miss the wonder I have made for thee
Of this dear world with my fashioning senses,—
The blue, the fragrance, the singing, and the green.
And thou wilt find, not having me,
Crippled thy high powers, gone to doubt
Thy indignation and thy love, without Help of my lust, and the anger of my blood,
And my tears.
Try me again; dost thou remember how we stood
And lookt upon the world exultingly?
What is for rapture better than these?—
Great places of grassy land, and all the air
One quiet, the sun taking golden ease
Upon an afternoon;
Tall hills that stand in weather-blinded trances
As if they heard, drawn upward and held there,
Some god's eternal tune;
I made them so, I with my fashioning senses
Made the devoted hills: have their great patiences
Not lent thee any health of ecstasy?
Or when the north came shouting to the beach,
Wind that would gag in his throat a lion's speech,
And spindrift with a whining hiss went by Like swords,—wert thou not glad with me?
O, who will lodge thee better than I have done
In exultation?—I who alone
Can wash thee in the sacring of moonlight,
Or send thee soaring even that above
Into the wise and unimaginable night,
The chambers of the holy fear,
Or bring thee to the breasts of love.

SOUL.

DEAR Body, my loved friend, poor thanks have I
For all this service. As if fires had made me clean,
I come out of thy experience,
Thy blue, thy fragrance, thy singing, and thy green,
Passions of love, and most, that holy fear:
Well hast thou done to me with every sense.
But there's for me a fiercer kind
Of joy, that feels not, knows not, deaf and blind:
And these but led to it, that we did try
When we were person, thou and I;
Woe for me if I should dare
Partake in person now I see
The lights of unaware ecstasy.
I must not in amazement stay,
Henceforth I am for a way
Beyond thy senses, beauty and fear,
Beyond wonder even.
I want neither earth nor heaven,
I will not have ken or desire,
But only joy higher and higher
Burning knowledge in its white fire
Till I am no more aware,
And no more saying "I am I,"
But all is perfect ecstasy.

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

Reviews.

STUDIES IN POETRY.*

MR. BROOKE'S "Studies" deal with the poetry of William Blake, omitting the so-called prophetic books, the poetry of Scott, the lyrics of Shelley, "Epipsychidion," and the poetry of Keats. The Inaugural Address to the Shelley Society (1886) is also included. The writer runs to the enjoyment of poetry with the quick delight of one of Blake's children possessed by the spirit of life, and racing forward with uplifted arms. His happiness draws the imagination of a reader into like attitudes of pleasure, and this is a kind of education for the feelings. The intellectual element which goes to make a complete criticism is less apparent, but a certain body of ideas is dissolved and held suspended in the spirit of enjoyment. It is a distinction to write briefly of Blake, and this Mr. Brooke has done. The Blake of whom he writes—Blake of the lyrical poems—is a man with the heart of a child. Even the "Songs of Experience" are songs of a wonderful adult child:—

"Blake's unmodified horror is not that of an experienced man, but such as a child would feel, who, suddenly taken from his mother's garden, found himself in the dark walls of a prison. All its ugliness, tolerable to those who knew it, would be seen with loathing unspeakable by the child. Blake in this way saw the most dreadful side of dreadful things; more than we see; and he could not distinguish, as we do, any touches of light in the darkness. His expression, therefore, of experience was as exaggerated towards misery as his expression of innocence may seem to us exaggerated towards joy—and this is just the temper of a child towards the pain and pleasure, the evil and the good of the world. . . . There is nothing like the burning whiteness of some of the 'Songs of Innocence' in the whole of literature. He touches, without danger, and without shame of fear, the lightnings of the sword of innocence. We get the archetypes of good. And now we get the archetypes of evil. The same hand which drew the lamb in its essence drew also, with a fierceness of imagination, the fiercest of all beasts—not a tiger, but all tigers in one—the essential tiger."

But is the tiger evil? Is he not as right and needful a part of the divine universe as the lamb, and is not Blake even more passionately delighted with the tiger's dreadful beauty and concentration of force than he is with the soft clothing and meek heart of the lamb? And is not "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell" Blake's answer to these questions?

Mr. Brooke poses his sitters against two screens—the Romantic movement and the French Revolution. It cannot be said that he wheels in the screens, for the screens are there. But in one instance the sitter, with his back turned to the Revolution screen—all sunrises and rainbows—has his face in a shadow, which seems to alter its true expression. Mr. Brooke knows the man Walter Scott too well to imagine that melancholy—apart from the real sorrows of his life—was a characteristic feature of his mind. But he finds Scott often treating of sad themes in his poetry, and sometimes uttering poetic lamentations over the vanished past, and the critic goes on to tell us that "the prevailing temper of Scott's poetry was sadness," and that "as a poet, it was his apartness from the fresh movements of his age that made him sad." The prevailing temper of Scott's poetry is not sadness. Cheerfulness in work of the imagination, strange to say, is not the exclusive possession of the virtuous liberal in politics. Chaucer's poetry is more happy tempered than the poetry of the author of "Piers the Plowman." Scott dealt with sad themes because he saw life as it is, and sadness forms a part of life. He dealt with sad themes for a second reason—because they lend themselves to romantic art, and the paradox is true when we add that there is joy for the romantic poet in evoking beauty out of sorrow. Scott, says Mr. Brooke, felt his isolation, and felt that his isolation was sorrowful. He felt no such isolation. "About 1792," he wrote not long before his death, "when I was entering life, the admiration of the godlike system of the French Revolution was so rife, that only a few old-fashioned Jacobites and the like ventured to hint a preference for the land they lived in. Burke appeared, and all the gibberish about the superior legislation of the French dissolved like an enchanted castle when the destined knight blows his horn before it. The talents—the almost prophetic powers of Burke are not now needed." In other words, Scott believed that the advance of the British people would be along the lines indicated by Burke, not along those indicated by Godwin, and he felt that he was at one with his people. But the chief thing to remember is that Scott was, as an artist, at the centre of one of the "fresh movements of his age," and was advancing that movement more than any other contemporary in the region of art. The Romantic movement, in order that it might be saved from such crude extravagances as those of Scott's friend, Matthew Gregory Lewis, needed not only the purification and refinement of romance, which it found through Coleridge; it needed not only the alliance of "the light that never was, on sea or land," with the realities of life, which it found through Wordsworth; it needed also the alliance of romance with the historical tendency, which the nineteenth century had inherited from the eighteenth. To effect this alliance was the work of Scott, and not alone in his prose writings. In this alone there was work enough for a lifetime. Scott as a student of history and an imaginative reviver of the past was far from infallible. But with him the historical spirit supports and renders sane romance. No stream of nineteenth century tendency has been more affluent, none has flowed with a broader or a swifter current than the historical. It has affected every province of human thought except pure mathematics. In going back to the past Scott was working for the future. And this being the case, it seems an unhappy thing—almost an impertinence—to pose him as a sitter against the French Revolution screen, and to exhibit his face in shadow.

The essay on Keats in this volume may be commended to the reader as one of special excellence.

EDWARD DOWDEN.

GEORGE MEREDITH.*

A GREAT artist or a great writer has not necessarily to create his public. It may be his good fortune to express thoughts and feelings which are already in the air, to strike a note for which his generation has been unconsciously waiting, to find beauty and truth in the raiment which can best secure to them the recognition of the time. He wakes to find himself famous, and the clear spirit gets its reward of fame before the abhorred shears slit the thin-spun life. Nor is such a genius properly to be accounted less original or less vital than he who breaks new ground. The pioneer must pass many years content to hope, or at best to believe, that the recognition of the many will at last follow the adoration of the few. His foresight forbids him to envy the popularity of the imitator. Wyatt and Wilkins a century ago, Gilbert Scott in our fathers' days, were accounted masters of Gothic art, and had their reward. Now we know them for daubers and destroyers. Our feelings will perhaps be repeated when our grandchildren look on the "restored" fronts of Peterborough and Exeter Cathedrals. Tennyson had to face an opposition which sixty years ago flickered out in Bulwer Lytton's mannerless attack. After half a century, in which he rode supreme, he is coming to the point at which we can tell which part of his work will live. The cloth wears in places, and the line which cost the smoke of ten cigars to make it seem spontaneous begins to show signs of its origin. Taine anticipated posterity in judging that Tennyson only imitated the sublime, and Matthew Arnold, in judging that he only imitated the simple. Poetry, like other arts, ought to be, must be, artificial, but there are two forms of artifice. We want two words that should make a distinction like the distinction between simplicité and simplesse. If we say that Virgil is artificial, we should mean it for a compliment. We should use the same word of Tennyson, but not always in the same sense. It is in this matter of the right and the wrong artifice that the judgment of contemporaries is likely to be least secure.

Mr. George Meredith is happily still among us. His work has won its way, not without dust and heat, into the hearts of his countrymen. He has crossed the seas, and

* "Studies in Poetry." By Stopford A. Brooke. Duckworth & Co. 6s. net.

* "George Meredith, Novelist, Poet, Reformer." By M. Sturge Henderson. Methuen. 6s.

his most popular novel, skilfully translated, has lately been running in the pages of the chief Italian review. But we cannot yet pass a final judgment, if indeed any judgment be final, on his merits. Something we know. We know that he need not fear the fate of Wilkins and Gilbert Scott, for he laid no claim to the touch of a vanished hand. We know that the waters of oblivion will not roll over his head, for a critical generation has accepted his work. We do not yet know what place our grandchildren will assign him in the hierarchy of the literary heaven. Thus, while we welcome Mrs. Henderson's acute and discriminating study, we cannot be sure that she has said, much less should we claim ourselves to say, that last word on the great novelist in whom we delight. Mrs. Henderson holds that George Meredith "may almost be said to have brought into existence" the kind of fiction which he composes. His own claim is that of "exposing and illustrating the history of man." The claim is not in itself new. It has been made implicitly by many novelists, and explicitly in the opening chapter of "Tom Jones." Human nature, says Fielding, is the provision which he makes for his readers, true nature being "as difficult to be met with in authors as the Bayonne ham or the Bologna sausage is to be found in the shops." But Fielding is not without regard for his story as told for its own sake. Indeed, as a story it is too complete, a fault visible in "The Antiquary," and carried to the verge of absurdity in "Nicholas Nickleby." Nor could it well reach its conclusion without a series of coincidences hardly to be found in real life. Mrs. Henderson would further argue that George Meredith's predecessors saw the spiritual and the material forces of the world as at war with each other, whereas he sees "spirit and matter unified," and outdoes his rivals by the strength that is at work behind his conception of his art. Thus the story sinks into the background. It is necessary because without it the idea could not be illustrated, but it is not wanted for its own sake. Here there is a superficial likeness to the sentimentalist, of whom Johnson said that, if you read him for the story, your impatience would be so much fretted that you would hang yourself. Meredith never aims at the dramatic, nor, when a dramatic incident comes to him, does he always make it probable. Diana's sale of the secret is incredible, not that there are not women of character who may be driven by strange and blind impulses, but because we have come to know Diana as a woman of mind.

This neglect of purely dramatic interest shows, even if we had it not from his own lips, that Meredith is not by first instinct an artist. Virgil gave his life to poetry but always cherished the thought that he should have been a philosopher. His philosophy does indeed inform his verse, as philosophy informs Meredith's prose, but his exquisite taste forbids him to misuse it. Failing at first to please the world, Meredith, says Mrs. Henderson, took to writing for himself. He ceased, as Fielding would put it, to keep an ordinary and took to inviting his guests. Here we are to find one reason for the obscurity into which he is supposed sometimes to fall. In fact, such obscurity as there is lies rather in the subject itself. Macaulay demanded that the metaphysician should express his truths in language which could at once be understood by the man in the street. He might as well have held that Newton ought to have published a chart of his strange seas of thought for the use of children. Shakespeare has drawn the broad lines of egoism in such characters as Julius Caesar. If he had tried a Sir Willoughby Paternoe, he could hardly have avoided a difficulty of expression beyond that of the Duke in "Measure for Measure."

Mr. de Selincourt, who writes the chapters in this book which deal with Meredith's poems, rightly holds, against Mr. Trevelyan, that the novels and poems rest on a systematic idealist foundation. The line which tells us that—

"Earth was not earth before her sons appeared," recalls Hegel's dictum that God without the world were no God. Meredith knows well that, apart from thought, reality has no meaning; that, apart from the universal, there is no particular. The desire esse aliquid, to be something, is a poor and limited thing unless the phrase be interpreted to mean a whole. And the very realisation of self, which is thus postulated, depends upon a self-denial. He who is no member, even he who is no worthy member, of a community is, in fact, nothing. Such a man does indeed walk in a vain show, unaware that he parades himself a pitiable phantom among those who are in form as angels and in apprehension as gods. The true man does not start with the ego as a subject of rights. Rather, he must begin with that fellow-feeling which not only makes us wondrous kind, but can alone open the portals of the spiritual world. Thus Meredith's novels are an exposition of the true meaning of sympathy. We have trespassed upon the domain of metaphysics. The fact is that Meredith is himself a metaphysician. It is a reason why he should not be primarily an artist, but the results of art may perhaps be reached by different roads. On the one hand Meredith tells us that narrative is nothing, on the other we learn from Aristotle that the first thing in a drama is the plot. The difference is not so great as it seems. One point may suggest a clue. Aristotle tells us that tragedy purges the passions. So far, then, the dramatic art has a distinctly moral purpose. Its instrument is pity and fear. We should not, perhaps, first name these emotions as the special instruments of George Meredith's work. Nevertheless, they are there. They have their part in the laws of human life less visibly now, it may be less strongly, than in earlier civilisations. Yet, still he that thinketh he standeth must take heed lest he fall. He can learn his lesson from the great masterpieces of past ages; indeed, he can hardly learn it without them, but the lesson is hard unless he get other help. He wants a contemporary picture as well. Metaphor misleads, and we should more truly say that he does not need a picture at all, but rather a light that will open to his eyes all the springs of human action, all that keeps it right and all that leads it into wrong. Therein lies the hope of reform, of an advance in civilisation, of a new heaven and a new earth. Our own generation finds its light in George Meredith.

THE TRANSLATION OF HORACE.*

IN regard of the influence which they have exercised over men, the poems, and especially the Odes, of Horace may be classed with the books of the New Testament. They express what may be called the natural philosophy of human nature; the temper which corrects the extravagance of fanaticism, secular or religious, the fallacy of extremes. How much better are men than their opinions! There is a fund of sense, goodness, and moderation in them which takes half their venom out of the most preposterous theories and the most mischievous creeds. Of this native and instinctive reasonableness Horace is the prophet. Hence his lasting vogue and value. The modified optimism which his outlook on life embodies commends itself to experience without flouting anticipation, and expresses at least one side of the truth of things and the meaning of life as nearly as we can grasp it. Enjoy simple pleasures; be moderate; live at peace with certain men and uncertain gods—it might all be paralleled from the Sapiential Books, and not a little of it from the Gospels. The malady of thought touched him lightly; he let the "riddle of the painful earth" go by. Life has its vicissitudes, but their lesson is one of resignation mingled with hope:—

"Non, si male nunc, et olim Sic erit."

The colours of good and evil are mixed:—

"Nihil est ab omni Parte beatum."

Therefore take short views. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof:—

"Dum loquimur fugerit invida Aetas; carpe diem quam minimum credula postero."

A good deal is left out in such a philosophy of life; but it is sound as far as it goes, and to ignore it means shipwreck. Attempt to rise above nature, and, in the long run, you fall below it: we are akin to the world of flesh and blood in which we live.

* "The Odes and Epodes of Horace." Translated into English verse corresponding with the original metres by John Marshall, M.A., LL.D. Rector, Royal High School, Edinburgh. Dent. 2s. 6d. net.

The time of Horace was in many respects like our own. It was one of acute transition; of material aims and progress; it witnessed a somewhat artificial religious revival, a cultus in which men had ceased to believe was galvanised into life for political and aesthetic ends. This is why he speaks to us in our own tongue. He is at once patriot and philosopher, censor and comrade, recluse and man of the world. His hermitage, indeed, was comfortable and picturesque—and his mind matched it; the loftiness of Virgil, the sustained thought of Lucretius, the indignation of Juvenal, were not his. He recalls that inimitable creation of M. Anatole France, the abbé Jérôme Coignard, of whom it is said "il méprisait les hommes, mais il les méprisait avec tendresse": he is, on the whole, for righteousness, but he is not righteous over much. By conviction and sympathy an imperialist, his imperialism led him to throw himself into the arms of a Saviour of Society. It was perhaps, the only thing to do: society needed and was worth saving; yet, could men have seen it, there was a more excellent way. By temperament "parcus deorum cultor et infrequens," he accommodated himself, with the easy Latin conscience, to the externals of religion: he would have been a typical cardinal under a Medicean Pope.

"Hæ latebrae dulces, etiam, si credis, amoenæ";

There are probably few men of scholarly tastes who have not ventured on a translation of certain of the Odes: and, though the names of those who have given their attempts to the world include, even in our own time, Professor Conington, Sir Theodore Martin, and Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Marshall's rendering has a sufficient reason for existence. It is with Professor Conington's that one instinctively compares it; and to say that it bears the comparison is to say that from the point of view both of scholarship and of literature it stands high. Mr. Marshall has avoided the temptation to reproduce the original metres. With few, if any, exceptions the attempt to do this has been a failure, and a grotesque failure, resulting in a caricature of the original. At the same time, "the first thing at which a Horatian translator ought to aim is some kind of metrical conformity to his text. Without this we are in danger of losing not only the metrical, but the general effect of the Latin; we express ourselves in a different compass, and the character of the expression is altered accordingly." So Conington: and Mr. Marshall has acted on the wise counsel. Take, for example, I. II. :—

"Leuconoe, dear, seek not, I pray, to know what Heaven hath hid;

The span to me accorded, or to thee, is lore forbid!

Tempt not Chaldean horoscopes! More wise, what comes, to bear;

Nor fret, whether some winters more from Jove fall to our share,
Or this, which lashes now the Tuscan shore, our last decreed.
Be wise, and strain the wine! Since short at best of joy our meed,

Prune distant hopes. E'en as we speak, grim Time speeds swift away;

Seize now and here the hour that is, nor trust some later day!"

or the lines to Lalage I. 22:—

"Place me where o'er the dull and frost-bound plain
No tree is e'er by summer's breath restored,
Beneath a sky where endless beats the rain,
And storms abhorred.

Or in a homeless land my steps exile,
Where the fierce sun-god's car rolls all too near;
My Lalage's sweet voice, her gentle smile,
Shall still be dear"

Petronius remarks the "curiosa felicitas" of Horace; Quintilian describes him as "variis figuris et verbis felicissime audax." And this charm of thought and phrase is often a crux to the translator, who has to preserve the substance and to create anew the form of the idea. Except in rare instances Mr. Marshall is successful in the double task. "Infames scopulos" becomes "those cliffs of doom"; "siccis oculis," "unwavering eyes"; "monstra natantia," "strange weltering beasts"; "simplex munditiis," "simple but exquisite"; "linque severa," "let grave things be"—

"dicimus uvidi

Cum sol Oceano subit,"

"this, when wine is drawn,
We'll speak, what time suns seaward set."

The translations are eminently calculated to inspire young scholars with a genuine appreciation of the poet and his work. Few who use them will fail to echo the graceful dedication to the "Vates Amicus" which the author prefixes to his book:—

"Give me to know, friend, poet, preacher, sage,
The tenderness, the love of all that's kind
And good and unaffected, which I find
Only in perfectness in your dear page.

May I, like you, think small things of myself,
Much of my country, much of friends, and love;
Delight like you in hill and stream and grove,
And all things else deemed good, save power and self."

PETRARCH.*

It is a commonplace to say that in considering Petrarch's place in the history of literature, we are to distinguish between the Italian lyrist and the humanist, but it is not so generally recognised that under humanism itself two very unlike things are confounded. It is one thing to have revived the interest in classical literature, to have acquired a certain elementary historic sense, to have widened the range of Latin literature and opened up the literature of Greece, to have cherished a heartier relish for natural enjoyments, and to have broken up for good or ill the ecclesiastical conception of virtue and the scholastic conception of wisdom. It is a totally different thing to have diverted Europe from its freshly-made discovery of the magnificent possibilities of its own vernaculars for literary purposes, and initiated the pathetic and futile effort of two centuries, struggling with passionate energy and conviction to create literature in a dead language by scrupulous and minute imitation of models, while neglecting the living tongues in which the Troubadours and the Minnesingers, Chrestien, Ville Ardouin and Joinville, Dante, Petrarch himself and Boccaccio, the authors of the Romance of the Rose and Chaucer, and the epic biographers of the Cid, had written with independent and creative force. The one movement was on the central line of historical advance and initiated modern life; the other perpetuated under a bastard form the medieval régime of a unified Latin Europe against the rise of the federation of independent nationalities, which constitutes what Comte called the Occident, and forms the characteristic background of modern literature, life, and politics. On its own ground this perpetuation of Latin as a vehicle of European communication may have been desirable enough, but when it invaded the territory of literature proper it was pure reaction and pedantry, and its influence was no less than disastrous.

To understand the gravity of the reverse we have only to compare the splendour of the vernacular literatures in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries with the barrenness of the early fifteenth, and the long struggle of the following periods. A well-authenticated contemporary tradition tells how Dante hesitated whether to write his great epic in Latin or Italian, and thanks to the disastrous turn given to literature by Petrarch and the humanists, Ariosto had to renew the struggle two centuries later; and having decided in favour of Italian, he reaped the reward of being deliberately and even scornfully placed by the finest Latinist and the greatest critic of the day—Lillius Gyraldus—behind a whole tribe of Latin poetasters, whose very names are now forgotten. And even when the inevitable victory of the vernaculars came at last, young men were still trained to write Latin verses with the aid of a "Gradus ad Parnassum," that provided them with a huge store of ready-made epithets, synonyms, and paraphrases, by which any conceivable prose might be "made into poetry." Wherever the humanist tradition survives study may be a passion and an inspiration, but literature is only an accomplishment. The revival of letters well-nigh proved to be the death of literature.

Petrarch represents both sides of European humanism, and also the patriotic and national life and literature on which they reacted in such contrary directions. His "Canzoniere" is the perfect flower of the lyric poetry of

* "Petrarch, his Life and Times." By H. C. Hollway-Calthorp. Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.

Provence and Italy. Remote as he is from the exaltation of Dante or the exuberance of Boccaccio, he has a secure place of his own from which it is impossible to imagine that he will ever be dislodged. Probably the most perfect master of style that the world of literature has seen, he represents the supreme point at which beauty of diction strikes deeper than the mere sense of taste and refinement, and becomes an organic force. No one who has literary sense can fail to be moved by Petrarch's verse. The greater, then, must be our wonder and regret that the author himself deliberately slighted his own immortal creations, and chose to base his claims to recognition on the Latin verses, of which his most ardent disciples can only speak with cold apologies.

It is difficult not to connect this strange phenomenon with the fundamental weakness of Petrarch's character, his want of perfect sincerity. This want of sincerity was, indeed, so deep as to be unconscious. Had his passion for Laura been what he thought it was, it is impossible to conceive that he should have looked upon the poems that enshrined it in the light of a literary effort unworthy to be compared with the poem in which he commemorated the merits of Scipio Africanus. Was Petrarch incapable of distinguishing between an emotion valuable for literary and artistic purposes and genuine passion? It is almost a miracle that in his "Canzoniere" he should have succeeded in compelling his reader, who can never get away from this suspicion of insincerity, to recognise in his poems not only technical mastery, but a moving, nay penetrating, delineation of human passions, hopes, and regrets.

When we consider the whole circumstances and the atmosphere and standards of his time, we must admit that too much has been made of Petrarch's paternity, "irregular" as it undoubtedly was, of a son and daughter during the very period in which he was languishing for Laura. But his disgraceful friendship with the Visconti, the worst of the Italian tyrants, at the very time when he was full of zeal and eloquence in the cause of Italian liberty and republican freedom, forms an uncomfortable parallel which it is harder to get over. Yet probably his political zeal was more sincere than his enamourment, and quite as sincere as his religion. In two things only was Petrarch's sincerity an adequate guarantee of decent consistency. They were his love of classical literature and his love of his friends. The best that can be said of Mr. Holloway Calthrop's book (which has many defects, and some serious inaccuracies of translation, and must be pronounced decidedly inferior to the work of a somewhat similar scope produced by the American scholars, Robinson and Rolfe, in 1898) is that in its much exaggerated admiration it at any rate succeeds in deeply impressing these two sincerities on the mind of the reader. Those who derive their first impression of Petrarch from this volume will see him as a faithful and fascinating friend, a copious and charming correspondent, and an irresponsible but earnest amateur politician, licensed to address, rather than capable of influencing, the greatest men of his time, in virtue of a vast literary reputation that rested on Latin works, which no one now reads, unless under some form of compulsion.

DELIGHTFUL GOSSIP.*

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM's fame was never very great in England, in spite of the fact that his poems reached the glory of a Collected Edition in six volumes, that he edited a "Ballad Book" in a popular series, and that his correspondence with Dante Gabriel Rossetti was issued some ten years ago and made interesting reading. In Ireland he endeared himself to many hearts by his "Emigrant's Adieu," with its refrain:—

"It's home, sweet home, where'er I roam, through lands and waters wide,
And if the Lord allows me, I surely will return,
To my native Belashanny, and the winding banks of Erne."

*"William Allingham: A Diary." Edited by H. Allingham and D. Radford. 1907. Macmillan. 12s. net.

And then everyone knows his delightful song of the fairies, beginning:—

"Up the airy mountain
Down the rushy glen,
We daren't go a-hunting
For fear of little men;
Wee folk, good folk,
Trooping all together;
Green jacket, red cap,
And white owl's feather!"

Here, eighteen years after his death, we have from him a charming volume of gossip about his contemporaries. Its editors, who modestly sign themselves "H. Allingham" and "D. Radford," are perhaps better known to-day to the great public than the writer whose diary they have so happily given to the world. Mrs. Allingham is famous through the many delightful pictures in which she has made known the beautiful green of the English countryside and the glory of its many gardens to the denizens in our towns. Mrs. Ernest Radford again, under the signature of "Dolly Radford," has added much music to contemporary verse. As for William Allingham, he is a further proof of the fact that a love of poetry was more in vogue in the sixties and the seventies than it is to-day. A quiet Irishman in his Majesty's Customs, the recipient of a most modest salary, would not find, upon the strength of the books he wrote, that all the doors of the literary aristocracy of the hour were opened to him as they were opened to Allingham. He was not a great writer, but he will live in the various anthologies which every year puts forth by many poems of real distinction. He will live still more by the "Diary" which his widow and her friend have just given us. Not one of the hundred or more of literary biographies and autobiographies of the past few years has so well justified itself as does this book. The pictures of Carlyle and of Tennyson here presented are of real value as an aid to the understanding of these great men. Other contemporaries are here also. Sir Edward Burne-Jones, for example, who throughout is irreverently called "Ned"; Leigh Hunt, chatty, cheerful, humane; Robert Browning, frankly satirical over the obscurities of his verse; Ruskin—of all the later Victorians we have glimpses. But it is for the gossip concerning Carlyle and Tennyson that we are most under obligation. Mr. Froude dismisses the last few years of Carlyle's life very summarily. No one else has presented the grand old man of those last sad years as does Mr. Allingham—large-minded, generous, tolerant. It seems from this book that all the qualities which we had learned reluctantly to deny to Carlyle in old age were his. Here are hundreds of judgments upon men and affairs, and scarcely one of them ill-natured; only one injudicious and unfair appraisalment has been perpetuated. It is on the writings of Mr. Swinburne. But then Carlyle was never a good critic of poetry. He always asked the poets whom he met to write in prose. Shakespeare and Burns, he said, had better have written in prose. He made that practical suggestion to Browning. He begged Allingham to give up verse and write a History of Ireland. The book is still wanted, but Allingham, with his strong anti-national bias, could not have written it. To those who, not knowing Carlyle but loving him withal, have never got over the disastrous impression which Froude's biography conveyed to almost every reader, Allingham's record of many conversations will do much good. Not quite equally inspiring are the conversations with Tennyson at Freshwater and Aldworth. The greatest Victorian poet was a bundle of prejudices. The recording of conversations with him are amusing rather than edifying. His political sentiments were bitter. His hatred of Ireland was as ill-considered as that of an average stockbroker. His views on all public questions were trivial. But as a literary critic he was admirable, although he declared that he "hated biographies." All the world knows of his admiration for Jane Austen. Emily Brontë's "Wuthering Heights" was "a Koh-i-noor among novels." Shelley and Keats were our greatest modern poets. An exquisite sanity stamps throughout Tennyson's literary conversations, which are conveyed to us here with the real Boswellian spirit. The Diary of William Allingham is a book that the reader will add to the more permanent side of his library, and will refer to again and again.

A STORY OF SPAIN IN THE SIXTIES*.

It is a pity that the translator of this striking novel of Galician life has not prefixed to it a short critical sketch of the work of the Señora de Bazán, who is, we understand, the most gifted woman writer that modern Spain can show. There is nothing in "The Son of the Bondwoman" to settle the date of composition, and we are left to conjecture whether it first saw the light in the eighties or is a comparatively late work. And here we may add our regret that no English publisher should have thought it worth while to bring out translations of the novels of Ibanez. Modern Spanish literature apparently excites not the slightest curiosity in England.

In "The Son of the Bondwoman" the author repays the debt which she evidently owes to the French realists. Firmly handled and well balanced, the novel derives its strength from the writer's intimate familiarity, probably acquired in childhood, with provincial life in Galicia. The story is pitched in the late sixties, but in essential characteristics this description of a decaying landed gentry, sinking into the poverty-stricken and stagnant stage so common to old families in Italy, Russia, Ireland, and Spain, would probably hold good to-day. There is reason to fear that the national life of Spain is still as much at the mercy of the official politicians and their army of parasites as in the days when the tale opens.

The young priest, Julian Alvarez, who has been recommended for the post of chaplain to the Marquis of Ulloa, arrives at the gloomy and antiquated country-house, Los Pazos, to find that everything is in shocking disorder. Don Pedro himself, a vigorous man of thirty, has, underlying his arrogant manner, something of the brutality and savage rusticity of the boor. Careless of his affairs, and occupied almost exclusively with hunting and field sports, Don Pedro is in the tenacious clutches of his astute steward, Primitivo, a man who controls the whole administration of the estate, and who has made himself indispensable to his master by his business capacity. Primitivo, little by little, has gathered the reins of power into his hand, and while leaving the empty honours to Don Pedro, has quartered his own relatives and half the village on the estate of Los Pazos. He receives the rents, accounts for the expenses, levies secret toll on all the produce, and cheats Don Pedro right and left. Everybody fears and obeys this fox-like man, whose cunning vindictiveness is as much feared by his master as by the poor people to whom he lends money as village usurer. But more than this, Primitivo's coquettish daughter, Sabel, is the mistress of the Marquis, to whom she has borne a beautiful boy, Perucho, and though the Marquis has tired of her, and suspects her of infidelity with a labourer, he is afraid to get rid of her, as Primitivo has threatened that he will "put a charge of shot" into any woman who takes her place. The attitude, indeed, of the steward to his master resembles that of a crafty Oriental minister, who indulges an Eastern potentate in his pleasures that he may himself bleed his realm undisturbed. Don Pedro is, however, sick of being plundered, and eaten out of house and home by the numerous hangers on, and enraged one day by Sabel's behaviour at a village dance, he makes up his mind to marry one of his cousins, the Señoritas de la Lage, who have long sighed after him in vain. He hastily quits Los Pazos for the town, taking with him the young chaplain, Julian, though Primitivo, "the man of bronze," throws obstacles in their way, and, indeed, prepares an ambush for them! The feeling conveyed of the steward's crafty purpose and resourcefulness is admirably rendered throughout by slight pregnant touches.

The breaking away of Don Pedro from the entanglements of his boorish life at Los Pazos affords the author the occasion for a brilliant sketch of Spanish domestic life in a decaying country town. The old hidalgo, the Señor de la Lage, and his four marriageable daughters, whom he keeps shut up in the family mansion through fear lest they should marry some plebeian, are admirably observed; and none but a clever woman could have so subtly suggested the undercurrent of feminine deception beneath the paternal rule. "Cousin Perucho," as Don Pedro is called, is received with great archness, with secret whispers and serious glances by the young ladies, who divine in an instant why he has come; and most admirably indicated is the business-like though joking attitude of their cousin while deliberating, under the teasing eyes of the girls, the question to which of them he should throw the handkerchief. The Spanish author shows us with truly feminine malice how Don Pedro chooses the serious Nucha, the woman least suited to him, inspired by a suspicion that the frank and lively and provocative Rita, his real mate, may make of him a jealous husband. In his coarse masculine way the Marquis wants to feel absolutely safe, as he understands conjugal honour in a truly Spanish sense, "very indulgent in the case of the husband, and implacable in that of the wife." The description of the scene in the lumber room, where the laughing girls dress themselves and their cousin up in the moth-eaten eighteenth century finery of their dead and gone Galician noble ancestors, is as admirably done as is the accompanying picture where Don Pedro in the dusk mistakes Nucha for the lively Rita, and, being repelled, man-like, determines that she is the wife for him. It is a tribute to the firmness and sobriety of the Señora de Bazán's art that she is able to make us ourselves actors in these rallying yet serious passages between the sexes. The solemn and lugubrious Spanish marriage, in the old style, is also indicated with an artistic economy that preserves for us everything that is essential. The chaplain, Julian Alvarez, is despatched to Los Pazos by the bridegroom to "make arrangements," and get Sabel and her child out of the way, but, of course, in the hands of Primitivo, the steward, he proves himself a child. Primitivo, outwardly submissive and respectful, tells the chaplain that Sabel is going to be married; but while the days slip by peacefully nothing is done, and when the Marquis comes home with his bride everything is going on at Los Pazos exactly the same as when he left it.

The tragedy that is slowly preparing for Nucha in the coarse and unfriendly atmosphere of her new home is precipitated by Don Pedro's bitter chagrin when she bears not a son and heir but a girl. He has married to have a son, and he soon begins to neglect her and leave home on hunting expeditions when he finds her ailing and weak and wrapped up in the care of her child. There is the finest feminine insight shown in the study of the young priest's feelings, and of how his dormant paternal instincts are awakened by Nucha's need for protection and love. Quite beautiful are some of the little scenes where the priest, the mother, and the child find an innocent domestic happiness in the illusion of family life, and the effect of these is heightened by Nucha's affection for little Perucho, who is always hanging round the baby's cradle, fascinated by this strange new arrival. But the day comes when Nucha discovers the secret so carefully kept from her by Don Pedro and the priest, and all her jealousy awakens that this beautiful boy is her husband's son. Her face is transformed at the sight of the child, she thrusts him away whenever the baby coos for him, and she will not allow the latter to be a moment out of her sight. Meanwhile, the young priest, to his horror, discovers that the Marquis has again entered into a degrading amour with Sabel. His marriage has turned out a complete failure.

The catastrophe comes through the machinations of Primitivo, who has instilled suspicions into Don Pedro's mind that his chaplain's devotion to his suffering and tormented wife is of the earth, earthy. The savagery and coarseness of the boor is awakened in Don Pedro's nature, and in a terrible scene the young priest answers his slanderer, his blood boiling with indignation, as he casts in the face of the other all the indignities that the distraught Nucha has suffered. So innocent are the accused that they have actually been planning Nucha's flight back to her father without dreaming how the world would have misinterpreted their action. The young priest is thrust ignominiously from the house, and news is brought to him six months afterwards of the martyred woman's death. The last chapter, which shows us the chaplain's return, after ten years to the neighbouring church of Cebre, and his prayer by Nucha's grave, is beautiful in its fresh force of feeling, and we have little doubt that this touching scene has been inspired by a reading of that supreme piece of art—the scene of the old parents at Bazarov's grave in Turgenev's "Father and Children."

* "The Son of the Bondwoman." By E. P. Bazán. Translated from the Spanish by Ethel Harriet Hearn, John Lane. 6s.

A SELECTION FROM Werner Laurie's List.

THE HAPPY MORALIST. By HUBERT BLAND.
A Series of Sparkling Essays by the Author of "Letters to a Daughter." 3s. 6d. net.

OSCAR WILDE

BY

LEONARD CRESSWELL INGLEBY.
Demy 8vo, 410 pages, with Crayon Frontispiece by S. Wray. 12s. 6d. net.

THE CHAIN INVISIBLE. By RANGER GULL.
(A Novel of Monte Carlo.) 6s.

A CATHEDRAL COLOUR BOOK.

THE CATHEDRALS AND CHURCHES
OF NORTHERN ITALY. By T. FRANCIS BUMPUS. With 80 plates, many of them in colour, and a coloured frontispiece by F. L.
GRIGGS. 2 by 9½, 15s. net.

DAYS STOLEN FOR SPORT. By PHILIP
GEEN. Author of "What I Have Seen While Fishing, and How I Caught my Fish." 40 Pictures, 10s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF TOM MORRIS: with Glimpses of St. Andrews and its Golfing Celebrities. By Dr. W. W. TULLOCH
With 27 Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net.

THE LOVER OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.
Being the Story of the Life of Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester. By MRS. AUBREY RICHARDSON. Demy 8vo, fully illustrated, Hand-
Coloured Photogravure Frontispiece, 12s. 6d. net.

THE LAST EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.
Being the Life of the Empress Eugénie, Wife of Napoleon III. By PHILIP W. SERGEANT, B.A., Author of "The Courtships of Catherine the Great," &c. With Hand-Coloured Photogravure
Frontispiece and many other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

WERNER LAURIE, Clifford's Inn, London.

No. 1.

NOW READY.

No. 1.

THE

NEW QUARTERLY

A Review of Science and Literature.

Edited by DESMOND MACCARTHY.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS:

LORD RAYLEIGH (President of the Royal Society).
How do we perceive the Direction of Sound?

The Note Books of SAMUEL BUTLER (the author of "Erewhon").

MAX BEERBOHM. On Fires.

HON. R. J. STRUTT, F.R.S. Can we Detect our Drift through Space?

HON. BERTRAND RUSSELL. The Study of Mathematics.

STURGE MOORE. Baudelaire.

G. L. STRACHEY. The Last Elizabethan.

G. A. PALEY. Biology and Politics.

ARTHUR SYMONS. A Triptych of Poets.

Half-a-Crown Net. Yearly Subscription, 10s. post free.

"We congratulate Mr. MacCarthy on his first number."—
The Nation.

Prospectus and subscription forms post free from—

J. M. DENT & Co., 29 & 30, Bedford Street, LONDON, W.C.

Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner & Co.

NOW READY.

IN AUSTRALIAN TROPICS.

By ALFRED SEARCY.

For many years Sub-Collector of Customs at Port Darwin
With a Map and 50 Illustrations from Photographs. Demy 8vo cloth. 10s. 6d. net.

A racy account of Adventures, Sport and Life in the Northern Territory. Incidentally Mr. Searcy notes many facts of interest to the ethnologist, the botanist, the naturalist, while those whose interests are in mineral products or pearling will find food for reflection.

SOCIETY, SIN, & THE SAVIOUR.

SERMONS PREACHED BY FATHER BERNARD VAUGHAN, S.J.

IN 1907.

Author of "The Sins of Society." Crown 8vo, 5s.

SIDELIGHTS ON CHINESE LIFE.

By the Rev. J. MACGOWAN

Author of "The Imperial History of China." With 12
Illustrations in Colour by MONTAGUE SMYTH, and 34 other Illustrations. Royal 8vo, gilt top, cloth, 15s. net.

In this entertaining work the Chinaman is depicted in the various phases of his daily life, and illustrates his points with many anecdotes. In a word, the work is not an ordinary globe trotter's note book, but a serious contribution to our knowledge of the amazingly complex and interesting Chinese character, by one who knows his subject thoroughly from everyday experience.

CHEAPER EDITION.

THE SONNETS OF MICHELANGELO BUONAROTTI

Translated into English verse by S. ELIZABETH HALL, to which is prefixed a Life of Michelangelo Buonarroti, translated by the same from the Italian of Ascanio Condivi. Fcap 8vo. Price 3s. 6d. net.

NEW EDITION.

KING'S DISCIPLES.

By MRS. HAMILTON KING. Pott 8vo, price 1s. 6d. net leather, price 2s. net (Dryden Library).

THE SQUARES OF LONDON.

By E. BERESFORD CHANCELLOR. With numerous Illustrations from old prints. Crown 4to, £1 1s. net.

Also a special edition limited to 50 copies, signed and numbered, on hand-made paper.

Daily News.—"We have here a perfect Thesaurus of anecdotes of all sorts—social and political, grave and witty—and it would be no exaggeration to say that every person of note who played any part in the London life of the last two or three centuries has been included in Mr. Chancellor's miscellaneous gallery. A word must be said in conclusion about the illustrations, which are admirably reproduced, the views painted upon fans being especially charming."

GODS AND HEROES OF OLD JAPAN.

By VIOLET M. PASTEUR. With four illustrations in colour, marginal decorations on every page. Cover design and endpapers by ADA GALTON. Demy 4to, gilt top. Price 12s. net.

"One of the most artistic books of the year. Most fascinatingly got up. The stories of the Heroes of Old Japan are intensely curious and interesting to all who love the East. The coloured plates and the drawings on every page are worthy of the highest praise."—British Weekly.

SPIRITUALISM NOT SPIRITUALISM.

By W.N. WILSON, M.R.C.S.

THE HUMAN SOUL REVEALED.

Being a Revelation of the Present and Future Life by MINERVA VICKERS, a Spirit of the Fourth Sphere, through WILLIAM NORMAN WILSON.

THEOCOSMIA; or, The Spirit World Explored.

By WILLIAM NORMAN WILSON. In Two Parts. Demy
8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net, per vol.

Three very remarkable works—all being essentially of an advanced and religious nature. The author of these works has been called upon to devote many years of his life to the solution of the numerous problems inseparably associated with the Christian religion. Every point relative to the soul's sojourn upon earth is treated from an entirely new and lofty standpoint, as well as explained in a lucid and intelligible manner.

Write for a copy of Autumn List, free on application.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., LTD.,
DRYDEN HOUSE, GERRARD STREET, W.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

MADAME DE SEVIGNE, says M. Faguet, united in herself "almost everything that the whole seventeenth century had produced which was distinguished, pleasant, and elevated," and he adds that she possessed "a quick intellect, incredible fertility, and the most original, the frankest, the most direct, the easiest, the richest, as well as the most picturesque style of any French writer since Montaigne." We have no English letter writer who equals her, and a large number of readers will turn with pleasure to "The Queen of Letter Writers: Marquise de Sevigné," by Janet Aldis (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net). The author does not attempt to give a resumé of Madame de Sevigné's complete correspondence, but has written her book "mainly with the idea of giving the personal history of the Marquise in its relation to her times, of showing how intimately she was connected with the great events of her day, and of showing how closely she came into contact with the great personages who were, consciously or unconsciously, occupied in making history." The attempt has been a most successful one. The author has a good knowledge of the history and memoirs of the period, she has a just admiration for Madame de Sevigné's personality, and she makes excellent use of the Marquise's delightful letters. Not the least useful portion of the book is the way in which we are introduced to the famous people who formed Madame de Sevigné's world. Her uncle, the Cardinal de Retz, the Duc de la Rochefoucauld, Bussy-Rabutin, Fouquet, Lauzun, Turenne, and many others, figure in these pages, and they are all hit off with a lightness and sureness of touch that give a special charm to the volume. The great merit of Madame de Sevigné's letters is their ease and naturalness. To use her own phrase, she allowed her pen to trot, "throwing the reins upon its neck," and her biographer appears to have acquired something of the same ease and charm. "The Queen of Letter Writers" is a thoroughly delightful book upon which the author is heartily to be congratulated.

* * *

IN "Clubs and Clubmen" (Hutchinson, 10s. 6d. net) Major Arthur Griffiths has an attractive subject to which he fails to do full justice. His book contains an amount of entertaining gossip and anecdote concerning the foundation and subsequent fortunes of the chief London clubs, but it gives nothing like a complete history of those institutions. Instead of this we have a number of details of club management which might well have been spared. Who wants to know, for instance, that "a good kitchen to be well served needs also a scullery-maid and an odd-maid, who acts as general servant or charwoman," that "a useful functionary is the kitchen clerk," or that "the barman is also often a sort of odd man to the cashier, whom he supplements and replaces on occasion"? Yet the chapters entitled "Club Administration" and "The Inner Life of a Club" are largely taken up with statements of no more interest. It must be admitted, however, that the first three chapters on "Clubs in General" are written in an entertaining style, and contain much interesting matter. The same may be said of the concluding chapters, which treat of art treasures in clubs, and enable the author to gossip about the actors and actresses whose portraits are to be found in the Garrick. Though the book cannot be regarded as a serious contribution to the history of clubs, it is written in a readable style, and Major Griffiths's fund of anecdote will probably make it attractive to many readers.

* * *

IN these days of lengthy biographies Mr. F. K. Aglionby's "Life of Edward Henry Bickersteth, D.D., Bishop and Poet" (Longmans, 6s. 6d. net), has at least the negative merit of being written in brief compass. The whole book runs to little more than two hundred pages, which is perhaps about as much as the average reader will care to have about the late Bishop of Exeter. Mr. Aglionby, who was curate under Bishop Bickersteth, and afterwards became one of his examining chaplains, writes with full personal knowledge of his subject. His admiration for Bishop Bickersteth's work and character does not blind him to the Bishop's error of taste in adding a fourth stanza to Newman's "Lead, Kindly Light," a treatment of that beautiful lyric which he admits was all but universally felt to be uncalled for. Bishop Bickersteth's ecclesiastical activities call for little comment. After a few years in a country living he became vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, where he was very successful, and he was chosen to be Dean of Gloucester in 1885. In the same year, just too late to prevent his installation to the Deanery, Mr. Gladstone nominated him to the Bishopric of Exeter, which he held until 1900, when he resigned and spent the closing years of his life in London. At Exeter he did unostentatious though useful work. He cultivated good relations with the Nonconformists, and a large number of them attended a service at the cathedral which he held for Nonconformist ministers. Bishop Bickersteth is known to thousands by his hymn "Peace, Perfect Peace," which, despite its unfortunate second line, has always been immensely popular. Mr. Aglionby has given an excellent record of Bishop Bickersteth's career, and his book might well be taken as a model by more voluminous biographers.

* * *

BOOKS of African travel have been so numerous of late that the subject has lost a great deal of its freshness, but "A Woman's Journey from the Cape to Cairo," by Mary Hall (Methuen, 16s. net), deserves to be read as an unpretentious but very pleasant and readable account of a unique achievement. The author is the first woman who has made the entire journey from the Cape to Cairo, and although the expedition was for the most part safe and comparatively easy, she met, while travelling in the unsettled region to the south of Lake Victoria, with difficulties which required courage and resolution to surmount. There is some interesting information about the habits of the different native peoples she met with, as well as a number of entertaining anecdotes illustrating their peculiarities. The author had no opportunity of inspecting any of the Belgian settlements. For the administration of German East Africa she has nothing but praise, and she also speaks highly of the work of the various mission stations which she saw. A number of capital photographs add to the interest of the book.

* * *

"CONCLUSIONS OF AN EVERYDAY WOMAN," by Hildegard Gordon Brown (Lane, 6s.), contains a number of essays upon such subjects as "The Mantle of Self-Satisfaction," "The Asset of Silliness," "Tinsel," "The Zest of Life," "The Untamed Element," &c. We can see no reason for publishing them. The thought is commonplace, and although there is a certain vivacity of style, we believe that most everyday women could, without undue exertion, produce a similar volume of essays if they were minded to do so. We have always considered "inoffensive" as one of the most offensive of epithets, but it is an accurate description of the book before us.

* * *

MOST readers are now able to guess the kind of fare that will be provided in a volume of essays by Mr. G. W. E. Russell. "A Pocketful of Sixpences" (Grant Richards, 7s. 6d. net) is as clever and as readable as its predecessors. Mr. Russell gossips anew about politics and social changes, about eminent men in Church and State, about "great ladies" and famous ecclesiastics. There is the same thorough knowledge of what we may call "the oral tradition" concerning notabilities of the Whig and High Church parties, and the same power of apposite and felicitous quotation. Two of the essays on Beaconsfield as a writer of fiction are charmingly written—easy, fluent, and happily allusive. Beaconsfield seems to have a peculiar attraction for Mr. Russell. The title of his book is explained by a quotation from "Lothair": "He was not an intellectual Cæsar, but his pockets were full of sixpences." Among Mr. Russell's sixpences there are several pieces of more precious metal.

* * *

Two beautifully produced anthologies are "The Call of the Sea," compiled by Mr. F. G. Aflalo (Grant Richards, 4s. net), and "The Charm of London," compiled by Mr. Alfred H. Hyatt (Chatto & Windus, 2s. net). Mr. Aflalo has aimed at offering as much variety in his selections as was compatible with the size of the volume. His quotations, which are all in prose, accordingly range from the Bible to the work of living authors, such as Mr. John Masefield, Mr. Kipling, and Mr. Filson Young—three writers

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF LADY DOROTHY NEVILL.Edited by Ralph Nevill. With Portraits. 8vo, 15s. net.WILLIAM ALLINGHAM: A Diary.Edited by H. Allingham and D. Radford. With Portraits in Photogravure, 8vo, 12s. net.THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO.By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. Patterson, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS IN KENT.By Walter Jerrold. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON. Extra Crown 8vo, 6s.SILAS MARNER.By George Eliot. With Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Cranford Series]THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMMON SENSE. By Frederic Harrison.

Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE GOLDEN BOUGH.A Study in Magic and Religion. By J. G. Frazer, D.C.L., LL.D., Litt. D. Third Edition. Part IV. ADONIS ATTIS OSIRIS. 8vo, 10s. net.THE FRUIT OF THE TREE.By Edith Wharton. Extra crown, 8vo, 6s.CHRISTMAS (DEC). NO.*The Century MagazineIllustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s. The DECEMBER Number contains—THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. II.—English Social Traits—Life at Blenheim. By Mrs. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST.BEHIND THE CHRISTMAS CAROLS. A Story. By MARY B. WOOD.NEW PHOTOGRAPHS OF MARS. Taken by the Astronomical Expedition to the Andes, and now first published. By PERCIVAL LOWELL.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

2s. 6d. Net.2s. 6d. Net.

Now Ready the December Issue of

THE ALBANY REVIEWEdited by CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

CONTENTS: Current Events; Queen Victoria's Sovereignty—G.W.E. RUSSELL; Modernism—A Scholastic; Proportional Representation; A Reply—RT. HON. LORD COURTNEY OF PENRITH; The Persian View of the Anglo-Russian Agreement—PROFESSOR EDWARD G. BROWNE; The Man and the Garment—C. R. J.; Justice!—A Letter—JOHN GALSWORTHY; The Railway Settlement—P. W. WILSON, M.P.; The Wanderer, Being Words for Botticelli's Birth of Venus—HENRY BRYAN BINNS; The International Anarchist Congress—KARL WALTER; An Anonymous Autobiography—DESMOND MACCARTHY In Prison (concluded)—MAXIM GORKI.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON, W.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION
Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

A Selection from

JAMES CLARKE & Co.'s
CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.*OUR CITY
OF GOD.By J. BRIERLEY, B.A. ('J.B.'). Author of "Ourselves and the Universe," "Studies of the Soul," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 6s. "That it will maintain, if it can hardly enhance, an already deservedly high reputation need hardly be said.—Leicester Post.
"Written in a fresh and stimulating style."—Dundee Courier.FAITH AND VERIFICATION.

With Other Studies in Christian Thoughts and Life.

By Principal E. GRIFFITH-JONES. Author of "The Ascent through Christ," &c.

Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. With Photogravure Portrait, 5s.

"Clearness of outlook and a calm judiciousness in weighing modern tendencies in religious thought characterise the pages from first to last."—Dundee Courier.THOUGHTS FOR LIFE'S JOURNEY.By GEORGE MATHESON, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E. Author of "Leaves for Quiet Hours," &c.

211 pages, cloth boards, gilt edges, with head band and marker, 3s. 6d. net; leather, 5s. net.

"They are in every way worthy of reproduction."—Dundee Courier.
"These chapters are pregnant with helpful inspiration and sanctified common-sense."—Notts Daily Express.
"They are gems of their kind."—Sheffield Telegraph.A WORKING WOMAN'S LIFE.The Autobiography of Marianne Farningham, Editress of The Sunday-School Times, and author of "Girlhood," "Harvest Gleanings,"

"Women and their Work," &c. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top. With Photogravure Portrait and Eight Illustrations on art paper, 3s. 6d. net.

"Tells very sweetly and very skilfully the story of a lady journalist who has worked for fifty years, and is still working. . . I cordially recommend this pleasant, sunny, fresh book."—The Reader.
"I do not know any more fascinating record of a woman worker's career."—British Weekly.PRACTICAL LAY PREACHING
AND SPEAKING TO MEN.By H. JEFFS, Editor of The Christian World Pulpit. With outlines of Sermons and Addresses by leading Preachersand Speakers. Crown 8vo, 256 pages, cloth boards, 2s. 6d. net.
"It is done very admirably, and the novice who takes Mr. Jeffs for his guide will not be led astray."—Daily News.THE GOSPEL
OF GRACE.By J. D. JONES, M.A., B.D. Author of "Christ's Pathway to the Cross," &c. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net."Specially suitable for young men."—Sheffield Telegraph.
"Treats of many aspects of the Gospel story in a fresh and stirring manner."—Aberdeen Free Press.JESUS AND HIS TEACHING.By ERICH VON SCHRENCK, Mag. Theol. Translated by J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., D. Phil., Author of "The New Evangel." Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.A VOICEBy GRIFFITH JOHN, D.D. Edin.*FROM CHINA.

Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

"This ably written, instructive, and learned book cannot be too widely spread."—British Weekly.STORIES
OF OLD.Bible Stories Retold. By C. D. MICHAEL. Author of "Noble Deeds," &c. 4to, cloth boards, with Eight Original Illustrations on art paper, 2s. 6d. net."We commend the book to Sunday-School teachers and young people generally."—Methodist Sunday School Record.
"Could not be improved upon."—Newcastle Weekly Chronicle.THE CHRISTMAS
CITY.By CONSTANCE NEVILL, Author of "A Cathedral in a Garden," &c.

Fcap 8vo, with parchment cover and lettering in gold, 1s. net.

THE ROSEBUD
ANNUAL FOR 1908.

Four Coloured Plates and one-half of the book in colour. Coloured paper boards, varnished, 3s.; cloth boards, with design in gold and colours, 4s.

"As attractive a budget as one could put into the hands of the youngsters. It has admirable stories, amusing rhymes, and a host of really capital pictures."—The Liverpool Daily Courier.FIRESIDE FAIRY TALES.Full of delightful Stories and Pictures of Fairies and Pixies. Coloured Frontispiece, Crown 4to, coloured paper boards, varnished, 1s. "An excellent collection. A very old favourite."—Westminster Gazette."Written and illustrated in a style that should entrance the nursery circle."—The Scotsman.
"Here is a wealth of nicely written stories illustrated with coloured pictures, telling of fairyland and the doings of its inhabitants in a delightful manner."—Eastern Morning News.

Full Catalogue will be sent post free on application.

London: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 & 14, Fleet Street,
And of all Booksellers.

who have little in common except an admiration for the sea. The extracts given are in various languages, and describe the sea under almost every possible aspect. Mr. Aflalo has done his work well, and although a maker of anthologies can never hope entirely to please anyone but himself, every lover of the sea will be glad to possess this dainty little volume. Mr. Hyatt's book includes verse as well as prose, and contains a large number of extracts in praise of London. The plan is novel, and Mr. Hyatt's execution of it deserves praise. He admires London with an almost religious veneration, and in a prefatory note he expresses the hope that his book may help readers "towards a still greater appreciation of London whose every street is 'holy haunted ground,' and whose every bye-way is fragrant with the spirit of the past."

* * *

THE nine chapters of Mr. Edward Fraser's "Champions of the Fleet" (Lane, 6s.) give a spirited account of some interesting episodes in our naval history. Mr. Fraser begins by telling the story of the Dreadnoughts—the present battleship is the seventh man-of-war to bear the name, which was first given to an English vessel by Queen Elizabeth in 1572, the year of the massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day. Other chapters tell of the taking of the "Téméraire" by Admiral Boscawen; of Hawke's capture of the "Formidable" in Quiberon Bay; of the help given by the navy to Clive in 1757; while, of course, Mr. Fraser has much to say about Trafalgar and the famous "Victory." As might have been expected from the author of "Famous Fighters of the Fleet," the book is written in a fresh and vigorous style. It is just the book to give to a boy who wishes to read of the most thrilling events in English naval history.

* * *

It is strange, says Mr. Alexander Macdonald, in his interesting book "In the Land of Pearl and Gold" (Blackie, 10s. 6d. net), how little really is known of Australia even by Australians. Mr. Macdonald was for some years a prospector and miner in Australia and New Guinea, so that his book is mainly taken up with the less explored districts of those countries. Some of the adventures he met with in prospecting were highly exciting, and Mr. Macdonald tells them with a great deal of narrative power. Such a story, for instance, as that in the chapter "How we held Mackay's Find," with its mixture of adventure, humour, and bluff, gives the reader a better idea of the fascination of prospecting than is to be found in most novels. Some of the accounts he gives of "rushes" to peg out newly discovered gold or copper fields are also well done, while the description of a midnight "corroboree" of natives is wonderfully impressive. Mr. Macdonald seems to have been chiefly attracted by the adventurous side of gold and opal hunting, and as he possesses unusual power of vivid description his book makes capital reading.

* * *

"THE POEMS OF COLERIDGE, with an Introduction by Ernest Coleridge, and Illustrations by Gerald Metcalfe" (Lane, 10s. 6d. net), is the first illustrated edition of the poetical works of Coleridge as a whole. The basis of the text used is that of the edition of 1834, but Mr. Ernest Coleridge has in many cases chosen other readings, though no synopsis of variants is given on the ground that it would be out of place in an illustrated edition. The volume contains all the poems not subject to the law of copyright, together with some that have appeared in newspapers but have never been published in book form. Mr. Metcalfe's pictures are effective. He succeeds in conveying something of the weird quality of Coleridge's poems. To do more than this no artist can hope. As Coleridge said, his mind "made pictures," "the images rose up before him as things, with a parallel production of the correspondent expressions." Mr. Metcalfe is to be congratulated on his success in catching the spirit of the poems.

* * *

THE expiration of the copyright in "Alice in Wonderland" has led a number of publishers to issue editions of Lewis Carroll's delightful volume. One of the best of them is published by Mr. Heinemann (6s. net), and contains illustrations by Mr. Arthur Rackham. It was a bold undertaking to rival Tenniel on this almost classic ground of the imagination, but Mr. Rackham's whimsical fancy and gift of grotesque elaboration give a special charm to his pictures of Alice's adventures. Messrs. Cassell publish an edition (6s. net), with pictures by Mr. Charles Robinson, and Mr. Thomas Maybank has illustrated yet another edition, issued by Messrs. Routledge (2s. 6d.); while Messrs. Macmillan, the original holders of the copyright, have published an edition, containing Tenniel's illustrations, at a shilling.

* * *

MESSRS. BLACKIE have just made three interesting additions to their "Red Letter Library" series (2s. 6d. net each volume). These are Kinglake's "Eothen," with an introduction by Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch; Leigh Hunt's "Imagination and Fancy," with an introduction by Mr. Edmund Gosse; and Hood's "Poems," to which Sir F. C. Burnand has written the preface. In their "Red Letter Shakespeare," the same publishers issue "Antony and Cleopatra," "Twelfth Night," "Troilus and Cressida," and "Cymbeline" (1s. 6d. net each), each volume containing short notes and an introduction by Mr. E. K. Chambers. Both series deserves high praise. Print, paper, and binding are all excellent, and we know of few cheap reprints produced with more care or in better taste.

* * *

In her preface Miss Mitton explains her title, "A Bachelor Girl in Burma" (Black, 6s. net) by saying that "Bachelor girls are scarce in Burma," and her book by saying that it is not a book "on Burma." She thus somewhat unfairly deprives the reviewer of his sharpest weapons, and, deprived of his foil, he is left to do the best he can with a wooden sword. A weapon of some sort is unfortunately necessary. There seems to be so very little raison d'être for "A Bachelor Girl in Burma"; there is no reason for her being a bachelor, beyond the fact that with Burma the word makes a halting alliteration; and there is nothing particularly Burmese about the book, beyond the geographical names, and here and there a pagoda. Perhaps the mistake of the book is that, in the shortness and hurry of her visit she has not been able to adopt a point of view. Her book, not being "on Burma," conveys no information either from the sociological or the ethnological point of view. Miss Mitton speaks of having obtained glimpses into native life. If that is so, she keeps her secret well, for beyond a few superficial touches, she gives us nothing which carries us out of England to other climes and races. She has lived with "England" everywhere in Burma. "The Way to China" is perhaps the best chapter in the book, and that is because of the suggestiveness of the title. When Miss Mitton describes a signpost inscribed with "The Way to China" as calmly as though it were "London: 60 miles," she touches our imagination. Her own has evidently been touched, too, and we feel that for once she is not looking at things from the point of view of the inquisitive tourist. Her relations with the boy, Chin-nasawmy, are interesting, too, for there the personal touch has slipped in almost unconsciously, and we no longer have long descriptions—and they are good descriptions in their own way—standing by themselves in absolute detachment from anything human, English or Burmese.

* * *

A NEW and cheaper edition of Mr. Sidney Lee's "Great Englishmen of the Sixteenth Century" has been published by Messrs. Constable (5s. net). Messrs. Chatto & Windus have issued an edition of Mr. Justin McCarthy's useful "Short History of our own Times" (6s.) which has been revised and additional matter added, bringing the history down to the accession of King Edward VII. Messrs. Macmillan publish a fifth edition of Professor Mahaffy's "Rambles and Studies in Greece" (5s. net) with a new preface. Messrs. Routledge have added Lamb's "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets," Archbishop Trench's "Parables of our Lord," and Sir G. W. Dasent's "Popular Tales from the Norse," to their excellent "London Library" (2s. 6d. net each). The same publishers send us in their "New Universal Library" (1s. net per volume) Macaulay's "History of England" in five volumes, Longfellow's translation of Dante's "Divine Comedy" in three volumes, Newman's "Apologia," Ramsay's "Scottish Life and Character," and Harrison Ainsworth's "Windsor Castle" and "Rookwood."

THE CHRISTMAS SCRIBNER.

This December SCRIBNER'S is a distinguished number in every respect. Among the contents of more than ordinary interest are:—

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, Portrait Maker
By R. T. H. HALSEY. Illustrated with a series of remarkable reproductions in colour of many of his most celebrated medallions.

"THE CHILD IN FAIRYLAND." By
SARAH S. STILWELL. A series of drawings in full colours, accompanied by some charming verses by EDITH B. STURGIS.

SEVEN SHORT STORIES. Of exceptional interest.

Among the Poems of the Number is:

"THE WILD ROSE." By GEORGE MEREDITH.

The Christmas SCRIBNER'S is a criterion for Magazine making.

ON SALE EVERYWHERE, GET YOUR COPY TO-DAY. ONE SHILLING

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
New York and London.

TALLIS HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, E.C. Telephone Holborn 5849

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

SEE . . . WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Every Friday. Twopence.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

What Mr. R. B. Haldane says of "PUBLIC OPINION."

Dear Mr. Parker,—

War Office, 1st October, 1907.

I think that in the new form of "Public Opinion," under your editorship, you do well to make prominent what is concrete and living in the shape of the opinions maturely formed of men who are trying to do the work of the nation, and of journalists the standard of whose criticism is high. What interests people is that which is expressed in a concrete form and has in it the touch of humanity. The views of strenuous spirits and the criticisms of really competent critics given in their own words comply with this condition. Your paper will succeed if it can only keep up to this standard, and I think you have brought it on to the right lines.—Yours faithfully,

PERCY L. PARKER, Esq.,
Office of "Public Opinion," Temple House,
Tallis Street, E.C.

R. B. HALDANE.

What Sir Gilbert Parker, M.P., says of "PUBLIC OPINION."

Dear Mr. Parker,—I cannot but congratulate you on that excellent paper "Public Opinion," which I read regularly. You have a journal of great influence and usefulness.—Yours truly,

GILBERT PARKER.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION,"

30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

THE INQUIRER

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL RELIGION

Special Articles of Interest to Liberal Thinkers and Workers.

Reviews of Important Books and Magazines.

News of Churches and Societies.

SUBSCRIPTION TERMS:

6/6 per year, to all parts of the World.

SPECIMEN COPY FREE ON APPLICATION.

Published every Friday at

3, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Week in the City.

DURING the past week there has been a distinct relaxation of anxiety. The bank return is much stronger, and the market rate of discount has fallen away in anticipation of an early reduction in the bank rate. The American demand for gold has fallen off, and with it the pressure on currency. If all goes well, the banks in the United States hope to resume cash payments in a few days' time. This does not mean that all difficulties are at an end. The "sequelæ" of the panic may be long and painful, and I do not see how we can hope to escape our share of the trade depression. But the situation certainly looks much clearer than it did. I should now advise the professional pessimist, if he is disappointed in America, to turn his eyes to Germany.

MERCANTILE MORALITY IN AMERICA.

People both in London and Paris have been quite shocked to find that in the United States it is considered quite the thing to pay bonds engraved as "payable in gold" in a depreciated paper currency called "Clearing House Cheques." The New York Press endeavours to apologise for this roguery and dishonesty in various ways, but principally by saying that such things have always been done in first-class panics. The thing, of course, is utterly illegal, and it is interesting to learn that the United States Government is refusing to take cheques for taxes and duties. However, the Yankees themselves are beginning to be alive to the fact that honesty is the best policy, and that evasion of obligations does not pay, and ought not to be allowed. There has been quite an epidemic of cancelling orders in all the principal industries. But the manufacturers are leaguely together to resist it, and to compel purchasers to carry out their contracts. If this crisis ends in a raising of the standards of commercial and financial life in the United States, the losses and misery it entails will be repaid over and over again.

THE IRON BAROMETER.

The iron trade is usually regarded as the best barometer of industrial activity in a great manufacturing community, and therefore the severity and suddenness of the slump in American trade may be measured by the following facts which I take from the "New York Journal of Commerce," a well-informed and respectable newspaper. In October the United States was producing pig iron at the rate of over 28,000,000 tons annually; in the middle of November the rate had fallen to less than 22,775,000 tons per year; and a further heavy decrease was expected in the next two weeks. The steel companies led the movement of contraction. In the East the finished output had been cut down over 50 per cent.; in other sections the curtailment was less, but there was a minimum decline of 30 per cent. The situation in the Pittsburg district was reported as follows:—

"General retrenchment and curtailment of production are in evidence in all parts of this district. As a rule, orders for material are not being cancelled, but producers are asked to postpone shipments sixty to ninety days. Buyers give tight money as the reason, and intimate they will be in a position to take the material in two or three months. The Jones & Laughlin Steel Company has asked for a postponement of shipments of material for the new plants at Alliquippa, and it is understood that construction will be stopped until after the first of the year. The Lindsay, McCutcheon plant has ceased operations, and it is reported that the Neville Island plant of the United States Steel Corporation will close this week. Practically all steel plants are reducing the number of employés."

Mr. Carnegie's industrial home seems to be in a specially bad way. The Pittsburg Stock Exchange has been closed for weeks, and the currency famine in the town has been almost intolerable. Reports from Chicago stated that contraction in the iron and steel industry had resulted in wage reductions of 5 to 10 per cent. at many operating mills, and that more general reductions were pending. Only from 65 to 75 per cent. of the mill capacity would be operated the remainder of 1907. Let us hope that the decline of trade in Great Britain will only be a faint reflection of the conditions that trusts, tariffs, over-trading, over-speculation, bad banking, and dishonest finance have produced in the States.

AMERICAN RAILWAY BONDS.

In view of the possibility that American railways now may be somewhere near the bottom, I give below a list of twenty railroad bonds listed on the New York Stock Exchange, with the prices as they stood at the beginning of the month and the income to be derived therefrom, in comparison with the highest prices of the same issues in the year 1905, an average year.

	Early Nov. Price.	To yield about	Highest 1905.
Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway... General 4s, Interest April and October, Due October, 1895	91	4.45	106
Atlantic Coast Line Railroad: First 4s, Int. March and September, Due July, 1952 ...	85	4.85	103½
Baltimore & Ohio Railroad: First 4s, Int. April and October, Due July, 1948 ...	89	4.60	106½
Baltimore & Ohio Railroad: Prior Lien 3½s, Int. January and July, Due July, 1925 ...	88½	4.50	97½
Baltimore & Ohio Railroad: South-western Division 3½s, Int. January and July, Due July, 1925 ...	83½	5.00	93½
Buffalo & Susquehanna Railroads: First Refund- ing 4s, Int. January and July, Due April, 1951	90½	4.50	100½
Central Railroad of New Jersey: General 5s, Int. January and July, Due July, 1987 ...	118½	4.25	136½
Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad... Illinois Division 3½s, Interest January and July, Due July, 1949	83½	4.45	98
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway ... General Mortgage 4s, Interest January and July, Due May, 1899	101½	4.00	107½
Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway ... Chicago and Pacific West Div., First Mort- gage Gold 5s, Interest January and July, Due January, 1921	106	4.55	118½
Chicago, Rock Island, & Pacific Railway ... General Mortgage Gold 4s, Interest January and July, Due January, 1888	90½	4.50	107½
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, & St. Louis Ry. General 4s, Interest June and December, Due June, 1893	93	4.40	104½
Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway ... 25 Year Debenture 4s, Interest March and September, Due September, 1928	86	5.15	102½
Louisville & Nashville Railroad: Unified 4s, Int. January and July, Due July, 1940 ...	93	4.50	106
Louisville & Nashville Railroad ... 5-20 Year Collateral Trust 4s, Interest April and October, Due April, 1923	90½	4.90	100½
Manhattan Railway: Consolidated Gold 4s, Interest April and October, Due April, 1890	95½	4.20	107
New York Central & Hudson River Railroad... Gold Mortgage 3½s, Interest January and July, Due July, 1897	85½	4.15	100½
Northern Pacific Railway: Prior Lien 4s, In- terest quarterly January, Due January, 1897	94½	4.25	106½
St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Unifying and Refunding Mortgage 4s, In- terest January and July, Due July, 1929	79	5.80	96½
Union Pacific Railroad ... First Mortgage and Land Grant 4s, Interest January and July, Due July, 1947	94	4.40	108½
Wabash Railroad: First Mortgage Gold 5s, Int. May and November, Due May, 1939 ...	101½	4.90	119½

All these bonds are legal investments for savings banks in various States of the Union.

THE ELECTRIC UNDERGROUND NOTES.

It is very unfortunate that the electrification of the Underground, undertaken by Mr. Yerkes and Messrs. Speyer, and the extension of the tube system, have so far proved a financial failure, for there is no doubt that from an engineering point of view the work has been well done, and has proved a great boon to the people of London. It must be conceded that both Mr. Yerkes and Messrs. Speyer were far too sanguine in their anticipation, and it is to be regretted that such large amounts of capital have been lost by investors. The case of the Underground Electric Notes is particularly serious, and it will be seen from our advertisement columns that a plan is now being prepared by the directors for submission to the noteholders and shareholders. The coupons falling due on December 1st are to be purchased at their face value by Messrs. Speyer Bros. of London, Messrs. Speyer of New York, and Mr. Lazard Speyer-Ellissen of Frankfort. Let us hope that before next summer the traffics will improve sufficiently to make the outlook for the London Underground Railways substantially better.

LUCELLUM.

Ah, fill the Pipe:—what boots it to repeat
How Time is flying underneath our Feet:
Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday,
Why fret about them if to-day be sweet!
Omar-Khayyām (modernised).

A Pipe of PLAYER'S NAVY MIXTURE

makes

Yesterday a pleasant memory,
To-day a time of sweet enjoyment,
and its anticipation
Tomorrow brings peace of mind and contentment.

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0443

To the Holders of the

5 PER CENT. PROFIT-SHARING SECURED NOTES OF THE

Underground Electric Railways Company of London Limited.

The Board of the Underground Electric Railways Company of London Limited has been for some time considering in conjunction with Messrs. Speyer Brothers of London and Messrs. Speyer & Co. of New York the best plan for dealing with the Notes which fall due on 1st June, 1908.

A plan is now in course of preparation for the extension and conversion of the Notes and the provision of further moneys for the requirements of the Company.

Owing to the serious financial situation all over the world the Directors feel that it is inexpedient at the present moment to take the steps necessary in order to carry through the Plan. As soon as the necessary arrangements can be made the Plan will be published and submitted to the Noteholders and Shareholders for their consideration and approval.

In the meantime the above-mentioned Houses and with Mr. Lazard Speyer-Ellissen of Frankfort o/Main have arranged to purchase at their face value from the Noteholders the Coupons falling due on 1st December, 1907 and the Sterling Noteholders are invited to present their Coupons in due course to THE LONDON & WESTMINSTER BANK LIMITED, Lothbury London E.C. for the purpose of carrying through this arrangement.

A statement of the Company's affairs will be published with the Plan.

By order of the Board

W. E. MANDELICK,

Secretary.

HAMILTON HOUSE,

VICTORIA EMBANKMENT, LONDON, E.C.,

27th November, 1907.

To the Holders of the

5 PER CENT. PROFIT-SHARING SECURED NOTES OF THE

Underground Electric Railways Company of London Limited.

Messrs. Speyer Brothers of London, Messrs. Speyer & Co. of New York, and Mr. Lazard Speyer-Ellisson of Frankfort o/Main, have arranged to purchase, at their face value, from the Noteholders, the Coupon falling due on the 1st December, 1907, and the Sterling Noteholders are invited to present their Coupon in due course to THE LONDON & WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED, Lothbury, London, E.C., for the purpose of carrying out this arrangement.

The holders of the Sterling Notes are invited to deposit their Notes, with the Coupons, at THE LONDON & WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED, pending the publication of the Plan mentioned in the Company's advertisement of to-day's date. The Bank will issue against the deposited Notes Receipts transferable by delivery.

If within twenty-one days of the publication of the Plan any Bearer of a Deposit Receipt by notice in writing, addressed to THE LONDON & WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED, expresses his dissent from such Plan, or if the Plan be not published before the 1st day of June, 1908, a Note of equal nominal value to that represented by his Deposit Receipt will be delivered free of charge to the Bearer of such Deposit Receipt in exchange for such Receipt duly endorsed. If within 21 days after the Plan is published such notice of dissent is not given by the Bearer of a Deposit Receipt, the aforesaid Bank may treat him as assenting to the Plan, and may give on his behalf any formal assent which may be necessary. When the Plan becomes effective the Bearer of the Deposit Receipt will be entitled in exchange for his Receipt, duly endorsed by him, to the rights and benefits attached by the Plan to the Note represented thereby.

A similar notice will be published in New York by Messrs. Speyer & Co. dealing with the Notes in United States currency.

SPEYER BROTHERS.

7, LOTHBURY, LONDON, E.C.

27th November, 1907.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON

PARIS

BUENOS AIRES

VISIT CALIFORNIA

THE LAND OF SUNSHINE, FRUIT, AND FLOWERS,

And Travel
by the Southern Pacific Company's Routes.

Luxurious trains leave New York and New Orleans daily, provided with Dining, Sleeping, Observation Cars, etc. MAGNIFICENT NEW PASSENGER STEAMSHIPS, 10,000 tons, leave New York for New Orleans weekly, offering a delightful route between those Cities. THROUGH TICKETS issued.

Apply, RUD FALCK, General European Agent, Southern Pacific Co.
LONDON: 49, Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 22, Cockspur Street, S.W. LIVERPOOL: 25 Water Street.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire, proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Telephone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C., are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS
at HALF-PRICE.

ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.

LISTS SENT POST FREE.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

ART GALLERIES.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.

39TH EXHIBITION of MODERN PICTURES, OPEN DAILY, 10 to 6, at the GALLERIES in Dering Yard, 67A, New Bond Street, W. Admission 1s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

APPOINTMENT.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON,
Goldsmiths College (Day Training Department).

A MATHEMATICAL LECTURER (WOMAN) will shortly be required in the above Department. Salary £175. Applications must be received not later than Saturday, December 7th, 1907. Particulars may be obtained from the Warden, Goldsmiths College, New Cross, S.E.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

CHINGFORD, ESSEX.

ROYAL FOREST HOTEL. Mr. John Brill.

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of HEAD MISTRESS of the L.C.C. Sydenham Secondary School for Girls, Sydenham Hill Road, S.E.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £300 a year, and will rise by six annual increments of £15 and one of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to £400 a year.

The successful applicant will be required to commence work after the Easter holidays, 1908, or, if possible, earlier.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, L.C.C. Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, January 6th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly, or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W. Price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
November 26th, 1907.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of a WOMAN PRINCIPAL of Avery Hill Residential and Day Training College for Women, Eltham.

Applicants must possess a University degree or its equivalent. The salary attaching to the post is £500 a year, together with board, residence, washing, and medical attendance.

The candidate appointed will be required to commence work after the Easter holidays, or, if possible, earlier.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Thursday, January 9th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of the Council's requirements as to appointments vacant are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W. Price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
November 23rd, 1907.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—Entries close December 3rd. Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD RD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.

The next ENTRANCE EXAMINATION will be held at the SCHOOL on DECEMBER 3RD & 4TH.

For particulars of admission on the FOUNDATION apply to the HEADMASTER.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS ON JANUARY 11th, 1908. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts, and for certain of the Oxford Honours Examinations.

Ten Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60 a year, and a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for Competition in June, 1908.

For further particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

MILL HILL SCHOOL, LONDON, N.W.

The next EXAMINATION for ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and EXHIBITIONS will be held on December 12th and two following days.

Application should be made at once to the Bursar.

NEW DEPARTURE IN PREPARATORY SCHOOL TRAINING.

Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.

Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER,
B.A., Camb.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description. High-class work, reasonable charges, prompt, accurate. E. G. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

* * *

Now Ready.Of all Newsagents.

PEARS' ANNUAL

CHRISTMAS, 1907.Price*6^{d.}*only.*7 Great Stories*BY*7 Great Authors*INCLUDING*Geo. R. Sims, Barry Pain, the Baroness Orczy,
John Strange Winter and W. Le Queux.*Illustrated with 20 Illustrations in Tints by*7 Great Artists*Including*Frank Dadd, J. C. Dolman, Tom Browne, A. Forestier, Maurice Greiffenhagen, Gordon Browne, and Will Owen.*IN HANDSOME COLOURED COVER AND ACCOMPANIED BY*Four Coloured Plates*ALL WELL WORTH FRAMING.*"A Chip of the Old Block,"*By FRED EVANS.*Dedicated by special permission to Lord Roberts, V.C.
&c.*"A Merry Xmas,"*By FRANK DADD, R.I. An Old English
Skating Scene.*"Dessert,"By E. LADELL. A beautiful Study of Fruit."A Quiet Pipe,"*By the late SIR EDWIN LANDSEER, R.A.*Order a copy from your Newsagent at once, or you will be too late.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 10.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1½d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 325	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	The Decline of the Oxford
The New Trend of Politics... 328	Movement. By G. K. Ches-
The Cynicism of Prince	terton ... 344
Bülow ... 329	"The Ruin of Macedonia,"
The Lines of Licensing	By Charles F. G. Masterman,
Reform ... 330	M.P. ... 344
Rebellion—Mongering in Natal 332	The West Hull Election and
Mr. Roosevelt's Sermons ... 333	Electoral Reform. By John
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	H. Humphreys ... 345
The Peasant's Hope ... 334	"Who are the Members of Winter Sleep ... 335	the Church of England?"
The Seekers ... 336	By H. J. Bardslev ... 345
TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE:—	The Critics and "Waste." By
The Giants of the Sudan.	E. A. Baughan ... 345
By Sir Alfred Pease ... 337	Mr. Galsworthy and Woman
THE DRAMA:—	Suffrage. By Emily Tomlin-
Mr. Shaw's "Cæsar" and the	son ... 347
Critics By M. ... 338	Alliteration's Artful Aid. By
CONTEMPORARIES:—	G. E. Mitton ... 347
I.—Francis Joseph ... 339	"William Allingham." By
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	H. M. Gray ... 347
Germany's Ireland. By Ed.	Metaphor. By "Irish-
Bernstein ... 341	American" ... 347
POETRY:—	"Trouble Among the Trout."
On a Railway Platform. By	By Wilson H. Armitstead 347
Alfred Noyes ... 341	Lord Roberts. By Ian Mac-
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 342	Alister ... 347
Books to be Read ... 342	REVIEWS:—
	The Paradise of the Fathers 348
	A Friend of Ruskin ... 348
	Cheerful and Whimsical ... 349
	THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK ... 352
	BOOKS IN BRIEF ... 354
	INSURANCE:—
	Own Case Agency Commission 356

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

A SERIOUS and inexplicable situation has arisen in Zululand. Without a word of warning, or even of plausible explanation, there has been a general summons to arms in Natal, for an expedition to Usutu, under the command of Sir Duncan Mackenzie, against Dinizulu, the successor of his famous father, Cetewayo, in the headship of the Zulus. A force of 3,500 men is being gathered, leading up to a general levy of the white population. Dinizulu has offered to repair to Pietermaritzburg to answer any charges that may be brought against him, but it is said that his reply does not affect the policy of the Natal Ministry or the despatch of the force. He has also repeatedly telegraphed to the Government expressing his surprise at the preparations against him. Sir Arthur Hime, the ex-Premier of Natal, supports the Government, while declaring that he is ignorant of the grounds of their immediate policy, and even calls for the use of Imperial troops. The Government of Cape Colony appear to have promised assistance, but opinion in Capetown is bewildered and irritated at the absence of any stated cause for a resort to arms. Reuter's correspondent with the field force says that he sees no sign of unrest among the natives. One or two isolated murders, of doubtful origin, in a very large country, are the only facts known to the public in support of this astonishing action.

* * *

THE debates on the address on the Reichstag have given rise to a farcical but interesting crisis. Prince Bülow had made one of his now familiar appeals to the groups of the Liberal-Conservative coalition, in which he urged them to stop prating about principles and attacking one another, and to unite for a practical and national policy. A conscious aim and self-restraint were the two desiderata. It is unfortunately the Conservatives who supply the aim, and the Liberals who contribute the self-restraint. They do, indeed, so far realise this, that a Bismarckian "Liberal," Dr. Paasche, responded by attacking the War Minister for his mildness in dealing with the officers exposed in the Moltke-Harden trial. General von Einem made a feeble but irritated answer. The Reichstag immediately rose, and the parties of the "Bloc" sat in conclave. Prince Bülow intimated that he would resign at once, unless they observed the discipline and silence that become a Governmental majority. After reflection, they decided to support him, and on Thursday their leaders rose, one after the other, to express their confidence in him. The Radicals, however, amid general laughter, added the reservation that they "maintain their principles." Nobody believes that the truce can be durable. The financial situation, with a deficit of 5 millions, is very grave. Indirect taxation, with depression in the air, and prices already intolerably high, would be unpopular and unproductive. Direct taxation would be unconstitutional, for it is the prerogative of the federated States.

* * *

MEANWHILE, in the Prussian Diet, the unreality of the coalition has been much more gravely exhibited, and Prince Bülow has met with an even sharper check. The monstrous Expropriation Bill, which was to clear out Polish estates by compulsion to make way for German "colonists," has been unexpectedly rejected by the Standing Committee to which it was referred. The radicals voted with the Centre and the Poles against it. The National Liberals and most of the Conservatives are for it. This does not necessarily mean that the Diet will reject it, for the officials who form so large a proportion of its members will, of course, support the Government. Moreover, a bargain may even yet be struck with the Radicals. But the chances of the Bill are not bright. In Austria the demonstration against the Bill in the Reichstag has been followed by a popular manifestation at Lemberg, where the residence of the German Consul was attacked, and the Kaiser burned in effigy. However much Prince Bülow's personal credit may be staked on this Bill, its defeat would save him from a grave international embarrassment.

* * *

THE Government have dealt with the offence of cattle-driving in Ireland by prosecuting, under the ordinary law, both Mr. Farrell, a member of the Irish Parliamentary Party, and a number of smaller offenders. The Archbishop of Tuam has answered Mr. Birrell's appeal for aid in the keeping of the law by instructing his priests to denounce the practice as "illegal and immoral." Some of the prosecutions have been successful, others not. At Galway five men were sentenced to four months' imprisonment apiece, but at Dublin and Limerick the juries have disagreed in the face of fairly clear evidence, and at Cork, in spite of strong pressure by the Chief Justice, they returned a verdict of not guilty. At Dublin, Mr. Farrell, one of Mr. Redmond's colleagues, has been tried for heading a party of cattle drivers and exclaiming, "There are the cattle, drive them." The jury have disagreed. Mr. Ginnell has again defied the Chief Secretary, and declares that Mr. Birrell's speeches really meant that the people were to "apply the hazel to the ranch cattle with all their might." The "Westminster Gazette" calls for Mr. Ginnell's prosecution in terms which, we are afraid, will be considered a veiled plea for coercion. Mr. Ginnell can doubtless be prosecuted, but how? Is trial by jury to be suspended? Or are the juries to be packed? These are the historic methods of coercion. Are the Government prepared to adopt either of them? Mr. William O'Brien still urges the repudiation of the cattle drivers, and we hope Mr. Redmond is endeavouring quietly to suppress them.

* * *

THE West Hull election, whose significance we discuss elsewhere, resulted in the return of the Liberal candidate, Mr. Guy Wilson, by a majority of 241 over Sir George Bartley, the Unionist and Protectionist candidate, and of 1,111 over Mr. Holmes, the Labour and rival Free Trade candidate. Thus the joint Free Trade majority was 4,753, and Protection proves, as usual, to be hopeless electioneering. Yet a slightly larger transference of votes from one Free Trade candidate to another would have turned the representative of a small minority of the electors of West Hull into the member for the whole constituency, and given the victory to Protection. Since 1905 the strength of the Labour vote has grown from 1,400 to 4,512.

* * *

THE speeches of Lord Tweedmouth and Mr. Haldane do not point to the expected reductions in the Army and Navy Estimates. Mr. Haldane, speaking at Manchester on Tuesday, and later to the Parliamentary correspondent of the "Daily News," defended the present expenditure of £27,600,000 upon the army, and compared it with the German estimates, with which, of course, it has nothing to do. He admitted that his new territorial forces might cost more than the expenditure on the Volunteers and Yeomanry. It is difficult to believe that the Cabinet can have accepted a proposition which stereotypes the present cost of the army. Even under the late Government, the whole Liberal Party united with a powerful section of Unionists in demanding the reduction of the regular army by 27,000 men. Meanwhile, the attempt to organise the new County Associations proceeds with some success in Lancashire and Yorkshire, where the manufacturers are co-operating with the Lord-Lieutenants, but with small or no results in the South, South-East, and West of England, where the undemocratic character of the Associations—which almost revive the old feudal militia—tells heavily against their success. Meanwhile, Lord Tweedmouth, speaking on Tuesday, at Chelmsford, outlined the Admiralty's scheme for a great naval basin at Rosyth, large enough to accommodate 112 ships of war. This is, of course, the new "watching basis" against the German Fleet. Lord Tweedmouth admitted that Rosyth would cost a great deal of money. The situation, therefore, is serious for the large body of Liberal Members of Parliament who are deeply pledged to a substantial reduction in warlike expenditure.

* * *

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT's annual message to Congress was given to the world on Tuesday, having first been printed for the private information of the Western world on the previous day. It is of interminable eloquence, suggesting in tone and contents a papal encyclical rather than a political document. It declares that the financial crisis is largely due to dishonest men, and that there is need of "unflinching perseverance" against them. Both the American Constitution and the needs of the hour call for an "extension of federal activity." Thus "big concerns engaged in inter-State business" should be compelled to submit their accounts to Government inspectors, and inter-State monopolies of the necessities of life should be forbidden. The President suggests a vague scheme of currency reform, but declares for the protective system, and for a tariff high enough to create a parity between the cost of labour at home and abroad. He favours both a graduated income tax and an inheritance tax. He re-affirms his big navy policy, thinks that America should provide for four battleships in the current year, and "plenty of torpedo boats and destroyers," with a fighting policy based on "hard hitting and an aggressive sea-going navy." The American Press comments with some sarcasm on this curious jumble of idealism and philistinism.

* * *

THE proposal of the Budget Committee of the French Chamber, to reduce the period of service on manœuvres from 28 to 21 days for reservists, and from 13 to 8 days for territorials, has led to a painful display of "incoherence" on the part of the Government. General Picquart, then a contributor to the "Aurore," was among the first to advocate this reform in 1904. He advocated it officially as Minister before the Budget Committee. But during the debate in the Chamber, he urged that the time had not yet come, and even declared that it would compromise the national defence. M. Clemenceau, realising the strong feeling in the Chamber on behalf of the reform, was silent. As one critic put it, he did what the balloon "Patrie" ought to have done in the face of the storm, "il s'est dégonflé." The general expectation is that the Senate will reverse the vote of the Chamber, and, indeed, the Government is supposed to have reckoned on this solution. When the vote of the Senate comes back to the Chamber, on the eve of Christmas, the Government will doubtless enquire, "Gentlemen, will you have a conflict, or will you have your holidays?" and the Chamber will answer, "Holidays." The episode is interesting, for it shows how heavy the burden of military service is felt to be, and how reluctant a directly elected chamber is to oppose any alleviation of it. This is the more remarkable, as the latest manœuvre of Prince Bülow has revived all the alarms of 1905. Another symptom of the same tendency is a proposal, which will probably be ripe next spring, to impose conscription on the Arabs in Algeria. If carried, this would relieve the French troops of an onerous and unpopular service, and at the same time add a large additional force to the French Army.

* * *

LORD LANSDOWNE, speaking at Sheffield on Thursday, resisted all proposals for a restriction of the veto of the Lords. The Prime Minister had called for a "fundamental change" in the Constitution, and his case was based on "frivolous arguments." At the same time Lord Lansdowne confessed that the Lords were not "perfectly organised" for legislation. He thought that their work would be better done by "a carefully selected body" of members, chosen presumably on the representative system. He said nothing on Protection, and hinted in dubious phrases that the Colonial Conference should be reopened, and an effort made to "tighten the bands of Empire." The "big pistol" was fired again, with a blank charge. Retaliation was to be used to "strengthen the country in its negotiations with the foreigner."

* * *

MR. LLOYD GEORGE has rendered a second great service to British industry. Proceeding to Manchester on Thursday, with heroic self-conquest, straight from the funeral of his eldest daughter, he was able to conclude the work of conciliating the menacing dispute in the cotton trade. His earlier intervention had secured a fortnight's respite, and an authoritative opinion from the Law Officers of the Crown on the disputed clause of the complicated Brooklands agreement, which now regulates rates of wages, so far as the payment for fine spinning at Oldham was concerned. The breathing time was wisely used by the employers to make what the "Manchester Guardian" describes as a proposal of a 9 per cent. advance in the wages of a far greater number of workers than those who asked for a rise of 10 per cent. On this basis the Conference of masters and men came to an agreement on Thursday, which was at once communicated to Mr. George. Nothing can have been more tactful than Mr. George's method, which wisely observed the limits of an outer conciliating force in a complicated technical dispute.

* * *

WE observe that Sir William Holland pleads in the "Times" for a recognition of Mr. George's services to the State by way of raising the salary for the President of the Board of Trade from £2,000 to £5,000 a year. This proposal, which is not new, suggests itself not merely as a personal tribute to Mr. George, but as a necessary acknowledgment of the importance of a Ministry of Commerce in the greatest of commercial States. It is absurd that the head of the Home Office, whose work is nothing like so important as that of the Board of Trade, should be a Secretary of State, with £5,000 a year, while the President of the Board of Trade has no such status, and has only £2,000 a year. Public life in England is costly—too costly. It involves a great deal of entertainment, and as there is nothing so important to Great Britain as her trade, it is absurd to cut off a poor Minister of Commerce from this side of his responsibilities. The Liberal Government owes the country a reorganisation on modern lines of the pay, the duties, and the constitution of the great public offices.

* * *

LORD MILNER seems determined, with the help of the "Morning Post," to place himself at the head of a school of Tory democracy. In opening an exhibition of sweated industries at Oxford—which included a show of straw hats sold for 1s. 6½d. as against a payment to the maker of 1½d., and of a lady's "bolero" costume sold for 31s. 6d. and made for a shilling—he declared boldly for the establishment of Wages Boards by the State, with the power to fix minimum rates of wages. He thought this a better remedy than the driving of the home workers into factories, which would involve great suffering. The fixing of a limit below which wages must not fall already existed practically in the State service and in staple industries, like cotton and iron. He approved Sir Charles Dilke's Bill for establishing Wages Boards in certain employments, such as tailoring and shirt-making. Sweating meant a "rotten" basis for the national industry, and thousands of workers should not be allowed to live in a "preventable state of misery and degradation," for the State had a "supreme interest in the efficiency and welfare of all its members." Lord Milner endorsed the Victorian policy of Wages Boards.

* * *

WE do not know for whom Mr. Fuller was speaking when he talked at Warminster on Tuesday of a pension scheme to cost between seven and eight millions, to be restricted to the poor and the deserving. An income limit the country will accept on grounds of economy. But, as we have recently shown, a scheme which is to include all people over 65 with incomes of less than 10s. a week will cost not 7½ millions, but nearly fourteen. Mr. Fuller must mean to halve the cost by excluding the whole class of those now in receipt of poor relief, outdoor and indoor together. That is to say, he will omit that class which the scheme is specially designed to benefit. The test of desert destroys the whole value of the pension, the object of which is to emancipate the aged poor from the harsh scrutiny of the poor law, and to render them the elements of a bare but independent living as of right. The Government will do better to produce no scheme at all, than to start the pension system on radically wrong lines. If they cannot meet the fourteen millions required on the basis of the 10s. income limit their next best course is to raise the age limit, and for the intervening years adopt the French plan of extending the pensions to those who are medically certified as disabled from following their ordinary occupation.

* * *

THE Nasi trial (our Rome Correspondent writes) has again brought to the front the discussion concerning the differences which exist between the North and South of Italy. On this subject Deputy Colajanni, a Sicilian Radical Member of Parliament, has just delivered an interesting speech, showing that the North and the South, taken as a whole, differ so much in their historic traditions and in their economic and moral conditions, that perhaps a federal form of Government would be preferable to a uniform rule. A few figures will better illustrate this situation. The average wealth of each individual in the North of Italy is calculated at £103, while in the South it is only £63, in Sicily £64, and in Sardinia £32. The money deposited in the savings-banks of Lombardy alone amounts to £44,600,000, while Sicily has only £4,600,000. In the North each inhabitant consumes an average of 150 lb. of meat a year, 3 lb. of coffee, and 40 lb. of sugar, while in the South the meat falls to 60 lb., the coffee to 2 lb., and the sugar to five pounds. The same difference exists in illiteracy, and in criminality. All this, however, must not be understood in the sense that everything is good in the North, and everything bad in the South. While murders are numerous and frequent in the South, the modern delinquency of stealing fortunes is prevalent in the North. The South is practically immune from alcoholism, suicide, corruption of the family, which are the main curses of the North.

* * *

THE French airship, "La Patrie," escaped from its moorings and the hands of nearly 200 soldiers at Verdun, in a gale, and having shed its ballast, passed at great speed over the Channel, was sighted at Cardiff, and came in contact with the ground near Belfast, where it lost some of its machinery and flew off again into the upper air. It is clear that these machines have wonderful powers of motion; their steerability still lies within a narrow compass.

* * *

OUR City correspondent writes: On Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday the markets were quite buoyant, and people began to look for a reduction in the bank rate. But on Wednesday it became known that the gold premium in the United States had hardened, and that further large withdrawals from London might be expected. In view of this the bank directors on Thursday made no change in the bank rate, and on that afternoon a very serious failure was announced, that of the National Bank of Commerce in Kansas. The statement of its affairs will, it is to be feared, deepen the gloom, distrust, and anxiety that seemed to be lifting a little on the other side of the Atlantic.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the Pittsburg Stock Exchange remains closed, by daily action of the directors each morning, and is likely to remain closed during the remainder of this month, and possibly until January. The bankers are in control of the situation, and the exchange will not open until permission of the Clearing House Association is obtained. This pitiful state of things is attributed to the scarcity of currency. It has been found that the country banks have been piling up reserves, and it seems that they would close out every loan they possess. "In fact, so scared were some of them, that 100 per cent. reserve seemed small," to quote a Clearing House member. The result was, that as soon as the exchange was closed, all the out-of-town loans were promptly called. One broker, a fortnight ago, was called for 1,000,000 dol. before noon. "He could not pay, and said so; and, the exchange being closed, the country bank was afraid to try to close him out."

Politics and Affairs.

THE NEW TREND OF POLITICS.

THE trend of the bye-elections since the birth of the present Parliament is something altogether new in our politics. Hitherto it has been the accepted rule that bye-elections tell against the Government in power, and mark the gradual swing of the pendulum towards the opposite side. Liberal Governments lose seats to the Tories, Tory Governments to the Liberals. Thus the strong Gladstone Administration of 1868 lost twenty seats, the Disraeli Government which followed lost six. The second Gladstone Government lost seventeen, and the first Salisbury Administration twenty. Between 1892 and 1895 the Liberal Government had time to lose five seats. From 1895 to 1900 the Unionists lost eleven seats, and from 1900 to 1905 they lost twenty. In 1906 the Liberals came back with an unexampled majority. The circumstances of the election were peculiar. The Conservatives were divided, and lost a great number of seats owing to the unpopularity of Chinese labour, the dislike of Mr. Balfour's tactics, and the growing zeal of social reform. Almost any observer, with a knowledge of English political history to guide him, would have said that the result must be a very unstable equilibrium. The Liberal Party, he must have thought, owed its great numerical preponderance to a combination of causes which could hardly occur again, and in particular to mistakes of its opponents of a kind which are soon forgotten. Here, if anywhere, was a case where the pendulum had swung to its extreme limit, and where the backward movement might be expected to show itself vigorously in the bye-elections.

But what has happened? The Unionists have, it is true, gained two seats. But only one of these was won in a straight fight between the parties. The Brigg election remains the solitary genuine success that the Unionists can boast in nearly two years. If we look at other elections, particularly in the populous districts of the North, we find the whole trend in the opposite direction. The Liberals have lost two more seats, but they have lost them to a Labour representative and a Socialist. If we examine the votes cast the result is still more striking. We find Labour candidates polling votes by thousands, drawing them, as far as the figures enable us to judge, from both parties, but drawing two, three, or four votes from the Liberals to one from the Conservatives, and in the result establishing a division of the constituency by three rather than by two, as the normal state on which party agents have to base their reckonings. At Cockermouth, where he is least successful, the Labour candidate polls 1,436 votes; at Huddersfield he gets 5,422, coming within 340 of the Liberal member; at Jarrow he wins the seat with 4,698; and in the Kirkdale division of Liverpool he polls 3,330 in the face of a concentrated attack on Socialism of extraordinary bitterness; and now in Hull he polls 4,512, and, nevertheless, leaves the Liberal with a margin of 200 over the Tariff Reformer. A Socialist obtains 1,740 votes in South Aberdeen, and wins the Colne Valley division.

The importance of these figures is much greater than the mere loss or gain of a seat. Who gets the odd 200 or 300 that decide the victory is, in judging the permanent trend of things, of much less significance than the rise of a new party from zero or from a few hundreds to as many thousands. Nor is this significance lessened when we consider the character of the constituencies in which this new phenomenon is appearing, and recognise that the forces which are redistributing political power are solidly based in the hard-headed populations of the great industrial districts of the North, the home of all that is most vigorous and living in the England of to-day. What the figures show is that this great industrial population, far from reverting towards Conservatism, is advancing in the opposite direction. It is not more Conservative than the Government, but more Radical. It does not want less democratic legislation; it wants more. It is not taken by the bait of Tariff Reform. It is thinking of old-age pensions, land questions, housing questions, unemployment. Though the ranks of democracy are divided by the new movement, Toryism gains far less than of old from the division. The democratic parties at Huddersfield, or Hull, or Jarrow, have, it seems, three or four thousand votes in hand. They can squander them on internal divisions, and yet leave the Tory candidate out in the cold. The Conservatives have sunk to a third, or less than a third, of the electorate.

If these proportions are to rule in the future, the democratic ideal has at length the big battalions on its side. It remains to employ these forces with wisdom and economy. The present division between Liberalism and Labour, which, under existing conditions, must inevitably grow, squanders strength. Nor does it correspond, as every close student of politics knows, to the real division of political ideas. Between the thoroughgoing democratic Liberal and the average Labour leader there are doubtless differences of formulæ, but there are very few divergences as to practical politics. The voter finds it difficult to choose between them, and we believe that at Hull there was, till the eve of the election, the greatest doubt about the result owing to the large number of voters who appeared equally friendly to Liberalism and to Labour. The voter himself did not well know how to choose between the two, and probably did not make up his mind till the last moment. It is absurd that divisions between men so nearly allied on practical issues should weaken the forces of progress. But the worst of the absurdity is that the advent of Labour is indiscriminating. If all the democratic forces were to combine, they would easily form a body of opinion strong enough to overcome those social and official influences which emasculate a certain type of Liberalism when it comes into power. They might secure a democratic budget, a sympathetic administration of the Unemployed Act, a humane and liberal diplomacy, the sweeping away of ornamental military expenditure. Such things are desired by the Labour Party. They are desired by the bulk of Liberals. In the House of Commons Labour and Liberalism, on the whole, work together to obtain them. But in the country these two forces are recklessly opposed.

How is this opposition to be dealt with, so as to prevent a paralysis of the democratic forces? In part, by changes of political machinery. The principle of one man one vote was simple enough as long as there were only two parties in the field, though the arbitrary division of the great towns struck a blow at their healthy political life from which they have hardly yet recovered. But with the growth of a third party the principle is put out of date. There is now in every other election the possibility, even the probability, that the elected candidate will represent a minority of the constituents. The time will come when a thorough overhauling of the democratic machine will be recognised as essential for true progress, and it will probably be found to involve the reconstitution of the larger constituency in accordance with more natural boundaries, and the institution of the proportional system, as the only adequate method of representing the real opinions of the country, and liberating democracy from the tyranny of the "machine." Such a change will not be undertaken all at once in a country which hates ideas. But some steps leading to greater freedom in the selection of candidates are rendered immediately necessary by the new distribution of parties, and either the principle of the second preference or the second ballot will doubtless be adopted by this Government before the end of the present Parliament. At Hull last week a mere accident might have secured the return of a Tariff Reformer against something like a two-thirds majority of the electorate. Had the voters been able to express a second preference, it is probable, from the figures, that the bulk of the Labour votes would have gone in the second place to Mr. Wilson, who would thus have secured a majority proportionate to the real feelings of the constituency. Similarly, in a second ballot, there would have been a straighter fight between Free Trader and Tariff Reformer, the issue of which would have shown the real opinion of the electorate.

Beneath the question of the machinery, however, there is another issue of even deeper import for Liberalism. The new Labour force is not at bottom antagonistic to Liberalism proper—the vital Liberalism which kept alive its protest through the Boer War and all the worst years of the Reaction. But unless true Liberalism can get its way with its own leaders, the quarrel will go on. The masses of people who are now being brought round to a dim idea of political possibilities, hear protestations and promises on all sides. They have no means of judging the value of these promises except by results which they can see. Hitherto, for long years, Liberalism has done nothing to strike their imagination. This Parliament, though it has done much useful work of the sound order, has not done enough to hold the mind of the people, no great Act to which its missionaries can appeal, and say: "This is what Liberalism has done for you; this is what Liberalism means." To arrest the masses, now floating between friendship and hostility, to fix them in loyalty to Liberalism, we need a statesman of boldness and decision. It will be his task to gather together the efforts towards social reform, and focus them in some great measure, which will stand out in our generation, as Free Trade and the Factory Acts stand out in the nineteenth century, a turning-point in our social history.

THE CYNICISM OF PRINCE BÜLOW.

It rarely happens in the modern world that a great Power suffers in its external prestige and its diplomatic relations for the oppression which it works at home. Thrice in the past century could Turkey reckon on the armed support of Liberal England. Russia in the worst spasm of reaction contracted the French alliance, and the coup d'état of last June did not even delay the English rapprochement. But with one instance to the contrary we have long been painfully familiar, and this week has brought a second exception to our knowledge.

Just as our failure to improve our relations with Ireland at home has made the Irish race in the United States a perpetual source of discord and disturbance in our relations with America, so the persecution of the Poles in Prussia is beginning to have its reaction on the sensitive links which bind the two leading partners of the Triple Alliance. The peculiar political conditions of Prussia may render such a measure of race persecution as Prince Bülow has just introduced in the Diet comparatively safe for the time being at home—though even there it has met with an unexpected check. With a franchise which gives to the wealthier 15 per cent. of the population exactly double the voting power of the remaining 85 per cent., the governing classes have forgotten the meaning of the word Nemesis. It will cost twenty millions to carry out the scheme of "plantation" which Prince Bülow meditates, in order to establish German racial ascendancy in the Prussian provinces. But undoubtedly it offers certain advantages to both sections of the class which confounds its own interests with those of the German race. When the Polish landowners, large and small, have been compulsorily dispossessed of their estates, there will come ample opportunities of gain to the Prussian Agrarians, who find agriculture, and, above all, speculation in land, decidedly profitable under a tariff which has added 87s. to the annual bread bill of the working-class family. When the Polish peasants, evicted to make room for a German "garrison," are driven into the towns, the industrial capitalists who form the other half—the "Liberal" half—of Prince Bülow's coalition, will reap their reward in the form of an increased supply of cheap and easily exploited labour. Nothing, it seems, has been forgotten within the range of the Chancellor's calculations. He knows, of course, that an intelligent and conscious race cannot be crushed without resistance. The pendant to the Prussian Polish Expropriation Bill has therefore been introduced into the Imperial Reichstag. While ostensibly extending the right of meeting to satisfy "Radical" scruples, it forbids the use at public meetings of any language other than German. The Poles (and incidentally the Danes and the Lorrainers) are to be shorn, but they will at least be shorn dumb.

The forces at home had been studied. Prince Bülow is undoubtedly as clever as he is shallow, as adroit as he is cynical. Even the "Radicals," who as doctrinaire Liberals ought to be fighting the whole system of Imperialism and class rule, have been bought, in the Reichstag at least, by a Bill, dear to their Jewish and financial clientèle, which legalises speculative operations on the Bourse. In the Prussian Diet, on the other hand, they are restive, and their opposition may possibly kill the Expropriation Bill. But one aspect of the Polish problem Prince Bülow had forgotten. It is an international question. If a common dread of Polish nationalism unites the Prussian and the Russian bureaucracies, a common sympathy links the oppressed Poles of Prussia with the prosperous and powerful Poles of Austria. Universal suffrage has given the future to the Slavs of Austria, and in the face of such provocations as this, they have learned unity. The demonstration in which the Poles, the Czechs, the minor Slav races, with the Italians of the Tyrol and the Social-Democrats, combined with the assent of the President of the Reichsrath in a solemn protest against the persecuting policy of Austria's ally, opened a new chapter in the history of the Triple Alliance. The Slavs with their willing allies are the masters of the Parliamentary situation, and unable to strike directly at Prince Bülow, they are quite prepared to vote against the Austrian Foreign Office estimates. The Germans of Austria are no longer the ruling race, and the Cabinet now includes several Slav deputies. The Alliance, of course, will not be broken or publicly disavowed. The Government, indeed, has rebuked this demonstration as an unwarrantable comment on the internal affairs of a friendly Power. But in private we may be sure that Baron von Aehrenthal will have something to say to the German Ambassador about the Polish question. The Triple Alliance has long been moribund. The Austrian Slavs will have little difficulty in diminishing what residuum of vitality it still possesses. It is the habit of German publicists to complain that M. Delcassé and King Edward between them "debauched" their allies, and engineered the isolation of Germany at Algeiras. This Polish incident should teach them how unnecessary is any artificial scheme of isolation. The real engineer of German isolation is Prince Bülow himself. It is the Prussian spirit which isolates Prussia. A bureaucracy which defies all the aspirations of modern Europe, and builds its prosperity on might alone, can hope for no natural or congenial friends beyond the frontiers of Russia and Turkey.

Prince Bülow's review of foreign affairs has done nothing on this occasion to diminish the suspicion with which every European democracy regards his policy. His references to Great Britain were correct and even cordial, though we do not forget that the Kaiser's visit to England coincided with a serious increase in the German Navy Estimates. His allusions to France and Morocco were unobjectionable, if cold, though he admitted, with somewhat gratuitous frankness, that Germany was on the eve of war with France before the Algeiras Conference. But no sooner was the speech printed and telegraphed to Paris than the official "North German Gazette" published a criticism of French policy which has excited in France an indignation as natural as it is unmeasured. An unofficial journalist, wielding a free pen, may express an unfavourable opinion of French policy in Morocco without giving cause for national anger. We have ourselves had occasion to criticise some of the incidents which marked the affair of Casa Blanca, and the "North German Gazette" only repeated what the Socialists have said both in Paris and Berlin. But such criticisms when they come direct from a Chancellery are not the comments of a disinterested spectator watching from outside the pageant of the world's affairs. They are the views of the Government, whose Monarch made half the present trouble by his escapade at Tangiers, the opinions of a Chancellor who has admitted that Morocco may and nearly did furnish a casus belli, the pinpricks of a Foreign Office, whose agent, Baron Oppenheim, was detected in the act of printing seditious anti-French manifestoes in Algeria itself.

For the rest the criticism is, in our view, as unjust as it is malicious. Prince Bülow's organ insinuates that the French deliberately neglected their defensive precautions at Ujda and on the Algerian frontier, in order that they might afterwards have a pretext for extending their operations unduly. We have seen little reason to admire either the skill or the humanity of French policy in Morocco. But its failure, in the view of any unprejudiced observer, has sprung from an almost morbid fear of assuming unnecessary responsibilities, and exaggerating the scale of the necessary interventions. It has shrunk from prompt and drastic measures, and confined itself to inadequate, and therefore bloody, displays of force, solely because it sincerely meant to avoid a policy of conquest and adventure, and sought, above all things, to spare German susceptibilities. The manoeuvres of German agents have caused half its difficulties. And now its very virtues and hesitations are converted into a ground of suspicion and offence. This ill-natured comment will have no overt or immediate consequences. But it will serve to remind official opinion alike in London and in Paris how little Prince Bülow is to be trusted when he talks of promoting a détente which will in time beget an entente. It will also warn the friends of peace in both countries that nothing is to be gained, even in the high cause of international amity, by ignoring the psychology of the ruling classes of Prussia.

Prince Bülow, indeed, went out of his way to inform us that we must not reckon on his co-operation in any of the humaner common purposes of Liberal Europe. The recent aggravation of the Macedonian anarchy has horrified public opinion, not only in England and France, but even in Austria and Russia. The Concert has under discussion a trivial but well-meaning little scheme of judicial reform. The Sultan is preparing to forestall the Concert by elaborating a scheme of his own, which will be even more trivial and more ineffective. But Prince Bülow has thought it advisable to advertise the merits of his competing scheme, and to assure us that he "counts upon the particular interest with which the Sultan takes in his Macedonian subjects, and upon the sagacity which he has so frequently exhibited in dealing with difficult questions." Such diplomacy as this stands outside the range of European sympathy, we had almost almost said of European tolerance. But it will survive while the class-franchise reigns in Prussia, and Prussia continues to dominate Germany. While it lasts, Germany will have the allegiance of the only friend whom she appears to value, the regard of the only ally whose susceptibilities she respects. She will be the mentor and the confidante of Turkey.

THE LINES OF LICENSING REFORM.

THE main lines of the Government Licensing Bill, which the Prime Minister has stated will be the first important measure of next Session, have, we believe, been approved by the Cabinet, and the details are now being worked out by a Committee. The task to which Ministers are committed is one which will need their utmost resources of courage and statesmanship, for the coast which they have to navigate is strewn with wrecks. It is a necessary condition of success that they should secure for their bill, not the languid adhesion, but the enthusiastic support of one temperance party, including that large body of good citizens who, though non-abstainers, are willing to see great changes in the licensing laws, but are not prepared for anything that savours of prohibition. It is an equally necessary condition that they shall not alarm by anything that impartial men can fairly describe as confusion, investors in licensed pro-party who are now, through the operation of the company system, widely diffused among all classes of the community. Mr. Asquith's and Mr. George's speeches show that within these limits the Government mean to act faithfully and courageously, and on lines capable of simple and intelligible statement. For the Bill must not be merely a complicated catalogue of technical amendments to an unduly complex body of legislation; it must be the expression of ideas and broad principles.

What are the ideas that it should embody? First of all, surely, that the moral and social evils of drunkenness, and the enormous economic loss to the nation through the excessive expenditure on intoxicating liquors, even by those who are not in any sense drunkards, may be mitigated by legislation vigilantly and honestly administered. Second, that the national system of licensing must give opportunity for the reforming energy of local communities to exercise itself, with growing freedom of initiative and experiment, as the enlightenment of the public conscience in these localities, and its power of making itself effective, increase. Third, that at the earliest moment compatible with financial justice, the vested interests which now fetter the exercise of this reforming energy shall be removed. And, lastly, that as soon as is possible, there shall be appropriated to the use of the community, that monopoly value which has been brought into being simply and solely by its own restrictive policy—which would, indeed, be absolutely non-existent if the sale of liquor had not for centuries been regarded, and rightly regarded, as a privilege which must be restricted and regulated by the State.

How can these ideas take concrete form in any Licensing Bill which it is possible to pass into law during the next Session of Parliament? The first provision on which thoughtful temperance reformers, abstainers and non-abstainers alike, are unanimous, is that a time limit must be enacted, at the expiration of which all retail licences will terminate. It may be regarded as certain that the period of seven years which Lord Peel's report proposed in 1899 before the legislation of the late Government, must be exceeded. But what is vastly more important than the length of the time limit, is that it should be an effective one—that is to say, that it should be a limit on the existence of the licences themselves, and not merely on the continuance of the compensation provisions of the Act of 1904. We had occasion last March to point out to the Government, when they were considering the provisions of the measure they were then drafting, the fatal effect of adopting an illusory time limit, which would leave to those who have to administer the licensing system of the country when it expires a legacy of embarrassment and confusion. Sir Thomas Whittaker has lately repeated this warning with characteristic terseness and clearness of statement, and it was reiterated by Mr. Arthur Sherwell in his powerful speech at the National Liberal Club on Monday evening. We are glad to be able to infer from the remarks Mr. Asquith made when receiving the debenture holders' deputation that the Government are determined, at the end of the time limit, to secure to the nation in respect of all licences the monopoly value which, as he then pointed out, is recognised by the Tory Act of 1904, in the cases of new licences, as the property of the community. Any faltering on this point would take away from the Bill the momentum without which the Government could not hope to carry it into law. The reduction of licences with compensation while the time limit is running must be accelerated by the simplification and improvement of the machinery created by the Act of 1904, by making the compensation levy national and compulsory, and by identifying the basis of compensation with that of taxation. By this means not only will the national and local revenue from licensed property be considerably enhanced, but also the process of reduction will proceed at an increasing ratio. For, of course, the number of years' purchase of the annual value of a licence awarded as compensation will diminish year by year as the expiration of the time limit approaches. The reform of public-houses, to which experienced licensing administrators look with even greater hopefulness than to mere reduction of their numbers, may be made possible by restoring to licensing authorities the power which their unfettered right of refusal before 1904 gave them, of imposing reasonable conditions with regard to the management and conduct of the licensed premises. We notice with satisfaction that the Liverpool Licensing Justices, mostly Conservatives in politics, the success of whose efforts in this respect give them a right to an attentive hearing, have pressed on the Government with clearness and force the vital importance of this reform. Its great virtue is its flexibility and the possibility it gives of improvement in the conduct of public-houses as opinion ripens, and as the success of previous experiments makes further progress practicable. Either under the operation of such provisions or by express legislative enactment it is also possible to shorten the hours of sale, to close public-houses on election days, and during a much larger part of Sunday than the law at present allows, and to deal drastically with the evil of the presence of children on licensed premises.

The thorny question of clubs will also have to be attacked if the legislation with regard to licensed houses is not to be nullified in practical operation. To deal with it will need courage, for the electoral power of clubs is considerable. And moreover, any legislation must differentiate between bogus or merely drinking clubs and institutions which are as much a social necessity for the working classes as for other sections of the community. But the moral effect of shirking this question would be disastrous to the Government Bill, more particularly when it is remembered that the small but progressive Licensing Act of the Conservative Administration in 1902 created the precedent of dealing with clubs in one and the same measure with public-houses. The registration of new clubs, at any rate, should come under the control of the licensing authority. And, in justice to the publican and the taxpayer alike, all clubs, new and old, should make a substantial contribution to the public revenue. Some of the reasons which call for legislation with regard to clubs apply also to off-licences, with which we have no further space to deal. We have not attempted to discuss the anomalies of the licence duties, which is a matter for the Budget, nor have we referred to the larger questions of local option and disinterested management which interest so many licensing reformers. If they are not dealt with in the Bill there will no doubt be considerable disappointment among the various sections of the temperance party. But they are reforms which cannot have effective operation until the expiration of the time limit. Whether they should be dealt with in the measure of next session, or postponed to some time nearer the period in which they can be put into actual working, is largely a matter of Parliamentary tactics on which the Government have the best materials for forming a sound judgment.

REBELLION-MONGERING IN NATAL.

BEFORE it is possible to understand the significance of the expedition into Zululand, and the proclamation of martial law, it is necessary briefly to rehearse the leading facts in last year's "Natal rebellion." The Press censorship under martial law, combined with a concealment of many material facts in the carefully postponed official documents, succeeded in hiding from the British public the plain outlines of one of the most shameful episodes in the recent history of the British Empire.

An illegal attempt to enforce upon Kaffir tribes the premature payment of a poll-tax in February last year, led to a police affray near Richmond, in which two policemen were assailed. Thereupon martial law was proclaimed over the entire Colony, on the pretence that a dangerous conspiracy of Zulu chiefs existed, of which this police affray was the first overt action. Troops were despatched to harry various tribes, which were accused of "unrest," and of intended "disloyalty"; when chiefs were tardy in delivering up suspected tribesmen, they were themselves treated as rebels, their kraals were burned, their cattle confiscated, and their persons subjected to indignities. No serious resistance was offered to these marauding expeditions, except in one instance. A turbulent chief, Bambaata, already in bad odour with the Government, and deprived of his chieftainship, turned outlaw, gathering round him such malcontents as he could seduce from his own and neighbouring tribes. These men, the only "rebels" in the whole affair, turned against their hunters and showed fight, killing some half dozen of their foes. Escaping into the bush districts of Zululand they were at last crushed with immense slaughter, Bambaata was killed, and the remnant of his band remained as outlaws in the Nkandhla forest.

The net effect of this "drive," misnamed a military campaign, was that several thousand Kaffirs were butchered, in many instances after surrender, some scores of villages were burnt, the cattle of whole tribes seized, the crops destroyed, and thousands of women and children exposed to starvation. Alleged ringleaders of sedition were tried by courts of mock justice under martial law, nearly a score were executed, a dozen in one batch, hundreds were flogged, and large numbers sentenced to imprisonment, twenty-five chiefs being exiled to St. Helena. No tittle of solid evidence was ever adduced in support of the alleged conspiracy, or of any intended or actual rebellion, such as was made the pretext for this destructive work. During the whole period of agitation no instances were recorded of attacks by natives upon any of the thousands of white men's farms scattered over Natal.

The instigators of these misdeeds were not, however, wholly satisfied with the results. Incessant rumours had been set afloat implicating in the "conspiracy" Dinizulu, the son of Cetewayo; and charges were brought against him which completely broke down. The acquittal of Dinizulu has been rankling in the breasts of those who were anxious to bring the whole Zulu business to a head, for purposes quite intelligible to students of Natalian policy. The present expedition, as we read it, is simply the next move in an attack upon the territorial integrity of Zululand. The theory of the instigators of this expedition is that a rising is contemplated in Zululand, of which Dinizulu is the prime mover, and in support of it they make allusion to a "recent great increase of murders and outrages." Now what are the facts adduced to substantiate these general charges? A murder of a "loyal" chief, Sitzitzhela, is attributed, probably correctly, to the outlaws, and another murder by unknown persons has taken place in South Zululand. A sergeant of police is said to have been fired at by someone unknown, a native post-runner is alleged to have been assaulted, and somebody appears to have done wilful damage to a bridge. Such are the hard facts. There is nothing to connect them with Dinizulu or with any widespread disaffection of any kind. What could be more certain than that a few sporadic acts of violence should issue from last year's lesson in destruction? Suppose that all these deeds could be traced to outlaw Zulus, they furnish no justification for martial law and a military expedition. If when the Act of Indemnity was passed, by which the Government of Natal whitewashed the perpetrators of last year's marauding expeditions, they had offered amnesty to the fugitive Zulus, these desperate men would doubtless have settled down in peace after the terrible lesson they had learned. This was not done.

We shall doubtless be told that the Natal authorities, whose action we criticise, are alone in possession of the full facts of the situation, that we have no right even to speculate upon their motives. In reply, we point to the plain teaching of most recent history. We defy any honest student of official documents to construct out of the materials furnished by the officials and the soldiers concerned an even plausible defence of the allegation of a conspiracy or a rising, when martial law was proclaimed last year. No tittle of solid evidence has ever been adduced against Dinizulu. As for the general condition of Zululand, the official reports of the resident officials have always paid a high tribute to the excellent behaviour of the natives ever since the settlement by Sir Marshall Clark, and we observe that even now Mr. Dunn, who is perhaps more familiar with the native mind than any other white man, expresses his astonishment at the expedition, in view of the pacific state of the country in which he lives. If any valid ground existed for suspecting illegal conduct on the part of Dinizulu, why send an army to arrest him? He came down quite quietly last year into Natal to meet the worthless charge against him, and would doubtless have done so again if requested. An armed expedition, forcibly to arrest and carry off their honoured hereditary prince, is the one course most likely to resuscitate the dormant fighting instincts of a martial race, and to give reality to a "rebellion" which has hitherto belonged to the realm of fiction. We sincerely hope that Dinizulu's influence with his people will be sufficient to prevent their armed interference with his arrest, but we hardly venture to expect so pacific an issue.

It must be remembered that this is not the first nor the second, but one of a long series of attempts of politicians and concession-mongers in Natal to break into the Zululand reserve. Those who think that the white inhabitants of Natal can be trusted to deal fairly and humanely with the rights and interests of natives would be surprised and grieved were they to read the recent report of the Native Commission. There is set down the strongest condemnation of the native policy as a system of land-grabbing, money-lending, and enforced labour, with a wealth of evidence which cannot be gainsaid. What these men have done with the broken tribal system of Natal they seek to do with Zululand. They will probably succeed after much bloodshed and disorder, if there exists in our civilised Empire no hand of justice to restrain them.

MR. ROOSEVELT'S SERMONS.

IN a sermon which would occupy nearly twenty columns of a newspaper, Mr. Roosevelt repeats all the things he would like the Government to do for the improvement of the United States. All these proposals he has enunciated separately upon many occasions: he now puts them together in a single document, designed as a preliminary programme for the great Presidential campaign next year. Most of them stand midway between pious aspirations and practical proposals: they are designed to leave upon the mind of good American readers a sense of something strong and definite, without committing the author or his party to any concrete act of policy. We do not wish to imply that Mr. Roosevelt is not thoroughly in earnest as an advocate of economic and social reforms. As an administrator he has always shown himself courageous, energetic, and most pertinacious in the pursuit of justice. Indeed, it is to these qualities he owes the fact that the present financial episode will go down to history as "Roosevelt's panic." But neither in this Message, nor in the legislative policy which he seeks to procure, can one discern the high qualities of statecraft needed to deal with the extraordinary situation which his country presents. Here is a nation where the concentration of industrial and financial power is further advanced than in any other nation in the world, where one or two little groups of trust-owners, railway-men and bankers, control the destiny of entire provinces, and the livelihood of millions of "free and equal" fellow citizens. Yet no political instrument exists enabling the people, through the Government, to protect their most vital interests against abuses of this economic oligarchy. There are two reasons why the present democracy of America is incompetent to perform its functions. In the first place, the rigid federal Constitution gives no power to the Government at Washington to carry through the necessary legislation. In the second place, the machinery of the two great political parties, through which the will of the people is compelled to seek expression, is dominated by men to whom the naked term "enemies of the people" is strictly applicable. The business-politicians of the great national parties will not permit the passing of laws by the national or State Governments calculated seriously to impair the financial power of their paymasters, the great railroad, banking, and financial corporations.

No one who understands the force of these two barriers can set great store upon the radical proposals of federal reform embedded in the great rhetorical conglomerate of Mr. Roosevelt. Does he really disclose any practicable method of distinguishing "good" from "bad" corporations, or of remedying the abuses of monopoly which he denounces? In most civilised countries no safe settlement has been found for the railway problem except the national ownership of the nation's high roads. Such a solution is neither constitutionally nor politically, nor, one might add, economically, feasible in the United States. The Inter-State Commerce Clause of the Constitution does indeed give to the federal Government a right of control; but though this power enables an energetic administration to hurry and to worry railroads in the Courts, it cannot really force them to compete when it is their interest to combine, or even to refrain from giving preferences of rates or other facilities of transport when it pays to do so.

Still smaller is the constitutional power of legislating effectively against industrial trusts. Here Mr. Roosevelt still entertains the notion that the Supreme Court may allow him so to stretch the spirit and the letter of the Constitution as to establish a federal registration and control over the great manufacturing and commercial businesses, upon the sole ground that in the course of their operations they use the railroads. We do not believe that the highest judicial body in America will take their trust so lightly as to consent to any such lax interpretation of the Constitution. But even if they did, control of the kind foreshadowed by Mr. Roosevelt, and in fairness to the two parties, we may add, by Mr. Bryan, is chimerical. "No corporation or association of any kind should be permitted to engage in foreign or inter-state commerce that is formed for the purpose of, or whose operations create, a monopoly or general control of the production, sale, or distribution of any one or more of the prime necessities of life or articles of general use and necessity." An excellent-sounding maxim, with a ring of plausible formality about it, but a veritable sieve, when it forms the basis of a legal enactment. Even Mr. Bryan's crude proposal to prevent any corporation from doing more than half the business in any single trade, would not prove more difficult to express in law or to enforce. That something might be done through federal registration, were it constitutional, to protect investors against inflation of capital and other financial jugglery, is possible. But that federal control could be exercised over contracts for sale or purchase, or other ordinary incidents of business operations, so as to restrain "monopoly" on the one hand, and "unhealthy competition" on the other, is a pretty obvious delusion.

Mr. Roosevelt's currency reforms are couched in even vaguer terms, and exhibit a very proper note of caution. Apparently he does not look in the direction of a federal bank of issue, or of any radical reform of the existing National Bank system, but is content to secure an emergency issue of currency, to be made by the private banking corporations under federal regulation; in other words, to secure more elasticity, without altering the instruments and avenues of money. On the important matter of taxation, he is at once conservative and radical, the latter where his Government is incompetent to act, the former where it is competent, but where party considerations preclude action. So we have large language about the desirability of a drastic policy of inheritance and income taxation. The latter of these proposals has already been pronounced unconstitutional, while the former would probably meet the same fate, if embodied in a law. On the other hand, there is to be no tampering with the sacred principle of a protective tariff, though this system is manifestly responsible for many of the abuses of monopoly against which Mr. Roosevelt inveighs. Tariff readjustment is indeed promised, but it is to be carried out, not by the enemies, but by the friends of Protection, and after, not before, the next election. Until Mr. Roosevelt, or some American whose statesmanship is equal to the task, directs the reforming energy of the nation to a radical alteration of the constitution, so as to secure for the central Government the constitutional power needed to grapple with the concentrated power of capitalism, such utterances as these of the latest Presidential message will continue to be little better than "hot air."

Life and Letters.

THE PEASANT'S HOPE.

HE is vanishing from the world, and there are few that regret his departure. "Progress" has effected a destruction where penury and starvation had failed. He endured through all the lean years, somehow obtaining nourishment and rearing his children, clinging tenaciously to the earth, within the earth-bound horizon. At length appears the end of a long tradition stretching back into the dim centuries; a rather squalid and ignoble ending to a life which had once stood for the bed-rock life of England. The peasant's resources, the peasant's vigour and resistance, the peasant's slow-moving, deliberate mind, had borne the burden of war and change. From his villages came the old folk-songs of the nation; he built the village churches, which are the glory of rural England, and once took a pride in them. His secret wisdom, the fragments of half-heathen, half-Christian philosophy, his standards of bitterness and enjoyment, made up the temper and mettle of the common people of England. The period of his greatest degradation coincided with the period of a sudden offer of escape. As the common land passed from his occupation, and he sank steadily to the landless depth of day labour, the cities, with their unlimited demands for the peasant energy and vigour, opened to him welcoming arms. We are devising legislation hastily with a view to retaining, perhaps, a remnant of what remains. The "Land Hunger" (so ran the cant last summer in Parliament) is dead in England. No one wants small holdings. Allotments merely stand derelict, growing plentiful crops of weeds and thistles. The landlords and farmers are only anxious to encourage the labourer to an independent position on the soil. As to rural tyranny or rural opposition—any allusion to such an impossible prejudice evoked in the debates in the House of Commons a somewhat similar sentiment to that excited by an improper story in the drawing-room.

Well, we shall see what we shall see. The Land Act is already revealing a quite unexpected stirring of enthusiasm. Those who continued to assert, despite all ridicule, that the Land Hunger still remained, however dormant, the inheritance of generations who had lived close to the soil and drawn strength and familiarity from that contact, seem likely to be vindicated. In his forlorn picture of the crumbling village life, "Where Men Decay" (Fifield), Colonel Pedder declares that this is the one hope for the future; the spark in the dark night from which a great fire may yet be kindled. He shows the two great wants of the labourer still unsatisfied—Hope and a Home. He laments the passing of the old village gentry, who still had some sympathy and channels of communication with the labourer; and the substitution for them of the large farmer, who utterly hates and despises the class beneath him. "'As long as a man stays on the land, he can't call his soul his own,' is an expression often heard among the poor." He exhibits the striking contrast between the brother and sister: the sister who has "gone into service," and found a demand for her work, and acquired under such conditions hope, independence, and a vigour of mind; the brother left on the fields, with the prospect before him of unchanging manual labour, at unchanging, scanty wages, until the workhouse absorbs him at the end. He shows the tragedy of the mere material collapse in the material conditions; village after village, in which no new cottages have been built for a hundred years; crumbling walls, falling into decay; crowded families, with all the starved life and degradation inevitably associated with such overcrowding; the whole presenting an aspect of fatigue and of decline. "To outsiders, who live in country villages, the wonder is not why many leave, but why any stay." Here is a testimony which would have created something like a "scene" in the Parliamentary debates of last summer. "'Still as a slave before his lord,' represents the attitude of the farm hand in the presence of his employer. No sheep before her shearers was ever more dumb than the milkers and carters and ploughmen at the village meetings to which their masters choose to summon them. They are cowed. It is to this that the race have come whom Froissart described as 'le plus périlleux peuple qui soit au monde, et plus outrageux et orgueilleux.' Pride is dead in their souls."

"The monopoly of great farmers must be broken up," he boldly declares, "before the dawn of hope can rise upon the English peasant." Yet he does not despair of the future. He has discovered deep in the heart of the country labourer that "Love of the Land" which has survived through all the generations of hopeless drudgery. He recognises it as "a survival from the days when an able-bodied Englishman, bred on and to the land, might cherish the hope of one day calling a corner of it his own, at least as the tenant of a landlord without personal interest in the degradation of his dependents." Here is the sole asset we possess in the work of rural revival. The labourer to-day is slowly and doubtfully realising that Parliament has passed a law which is designed to work for his benefit. The whole conception is new to him, "Law" he has hitherto regarded as something remote or inimical, symbolised by the village policeman or the magistrates, who penalise poaching and petty larceny. Those who have made themselves missionaries of the new Act in the villages tell everywhere of this first incredulity. They announce the decree of Government that henceforth the first charge on the land shall be the allotment or small holding; that nothing is to stand in the way of the provision of such holding when it is desired; that, if necessary, by compulsion, the claims of sport, the claims of pleasure, the ambitions of the large farmer adding field to field, the prejudice or caprice of those who dislike the creation of these small plots and gardens, are to be made to yield to the primary necessity of finding land for the landless. The labourer is silent, astonished, doubtful, wondering if this is a new trick designed for his disadvantage. There are meetings at night, to which men come furtively; suggestions that one is a "spy," and dogged silence until he has departed; wonder and doubt as to what Mr. A. (the landlord) will think of it, or whether Mr. B. (the farmer) will dispossess all those who apply for land, or if Mr. C. (the vicar) will be inclined to look favourably on the affair. But the stirring and the movement is real, far more real than many had ventured to hope for when the Act was passing through Parliament. The testing time will come next year, when the rather cumbrous machinery is put into operation. If the Parish Councils and County Councils and Central Commissioners prove adequate to the situation, they may yet reveal life where there now is little but death, and a transformation of England's deserted countryside. If they prove hostile or—what is more probable, and far more dangerous—dilatatory and timid, embarking upon one experiment chosen from ten applications, postponing for months or years any energetic action; there will be no vocal protest, and few who cannot look beneath the surface will realise what has happened. The serene life of rural England, viewed from the country house or city observatory, will continue undisturbed. There will be no revolution, red flags, open riots, rick-burning. But the people will quietly melt away, into the cities, beyond the sea. The last of the Sibylline Books will have been flung into the flames.

What this vanishing life signifies, in its strength and in its weaknesses, can only be revealed to those who through months and years have made it the subject of sympathetic study. The landlord, the farmer, the clergyman, the newspaper correspondent primed with casual conversation in the village inn, thinks that he knows his labourer. He probably knows nothing whatever about him. With his limited vocabulary, with his racial distrust of the stranger, and all of another class, with a mind which maintains such reticence except in moments of overpowering emotion, that labourer stands, a perplexing, enigmatic figure, alone in a voluble, self-analysing world. Only in such a study as that of Mr. George Bourne does the figure of the real man becomes gradually apparent. In the "Memoirs of a Surrey Labourer" (Duckworth & Co.) this writer has given a picture of the last days of an old man who himself stands for the last days of a vanishing race. He has collected and treasured the sayings of "Bettesworth" as he passes slowly downward in the day's decline; remarks trivial or commonplace, worldly wisdom, strange superstitions, acceptance of the sunshine, bewilderment before the hostile forces of the world. There are years passed in almost daily intercourse before his master discovers that Bettesworth had once fought through the Crimean war. That experience had made no permanent impression of horror or of pride. The events of the day which influence men's passions in some mobile, distant universe filter down into this quiet country like the noise of something far away, and the South African war and the death of the Queen and a General Election scarcely do more than ripple the edge of these deep sea waters. Of more importance is the untimely summer rain which spoils the harvest, dispossession from a cottage, the illness of a wife, the calamity of advancing age. Mr. Bourne reveals the heroic patience and endurance of the labourer in face of the accepted and inevitable changes. He resists the embraces of the workhouse and infirmary with that dogged despair with which the English rural poor have resisted the "Bastilles" since their foundation. He clings to life and its possible activities, continuing his work suffering and half blind, meeting death when it comes as the poor have always met it, without hope and without fear; his mind at the end with the past rather than with the future. The Pagan remains, and refuses to be silenced by the long centuries of Christian tradition. There is scepticism concerning "these here places nobody ever bin to an' come back again to tell we." "Nobody don't know nothin' about it. 'Tain't as if they come back to tell ye. There's my father what bin dead this forty year, what a crool man he must be not to've come back in all that time, if he was able, an' tell me about it." And as to the Vicar, "What do he know about it more'n anybody else?"

WINTER SLEEP.

THERE are at the present time two growing points at which science seems to be in the stage at which we may at any time hear of something new and suggestive in the way of discovery. Experiments on the effects of stimulants, organic and inorganic, on various organs in plants and animals, are leading to very important results, and opening up new lines of research. On the other hand investigations as to the nature of the agents and conditions which have the effect of slowing down and even of suspending the vital functions, and of allowing them to be resumed after prolonged intervals of time, give promise of results still more interesting when viewed in their possible relationship to human life.

As the days of our northern winter shorten and darken towards the December solstice, certain wild animals in this country, which during the summer and autumn are much in evidence, completely disappear from view. It is not that, like the land-rails, fly-catchers, swallows, and cuckoos, they have migrated to follow the sun in its southward march. They are still in the land; they have only retired to hiding-places and fastnesses where, secure from observation and disturbance, they fall into the death-like trance known as winter sleep. Our native animals which hibernate, do not all exhibit the habit of winter sleep in the same phases. Our common bats, hedgehogs, squirrels, badgers, field-mice, frogs, toads, and certain fishes, are examples in which the habit is displayed in many varying degrees of intensity. In its most extreme forms, the conditions of hibernating sleep are very striking; so much so that it is probably only because of the difficulty of observing animals in this state in nature that the subject has not been much more widely studied. Some years ago the present writer was struck with the recurrence from year to year of accounts in the newspapers of live toads said to have been found embedded in wood or clay, cut off from food and water, and apparently from air for prolonged periods. He began a series of observations with toads, and the results obtained were so unexpected—the animals suffering no inconvenience—that a more prolonged series was attempted. For instance, a common garden flower-pot of a large size was taken and lined with clay, to a depth of some inches. On this, near the bottom, a live toad was placed, under an inverted flower-pot of smaller size, the larger being then firmly packed to the brim with impervious clay, completely hiding the smaller pot. The large pot was further thickly covered over with clay, so that it was the centre of a ball some feet in diameter. The whole was then buried deeply in the ground, in a bed of firm London clay. Had it not been for previous experiments with the animals, it would have been impossible to believe that any breathing creature could continue to live under such conditions. The burial took place in July. In August of the following year the pot was dug up, in the presence of three persons, who had followed the experiment, and who were entirely sceptical as to the result. The toad proved to be alive, and in good condition. It was torpid at first; but it became quite active in a few hours, and it lived for long afterwards.

The usual explanation in experiments of this kind is that some air must reach the animals in conditions of sleep-trance or suspended animation. There are other observations, however, which show that all air may be excluded for a time, from animals in the profound torpor of winter sleep. One of our native warm-blooded creatures, which passes deeply into the hibernating condition, is the hedgehog. Early in the winter it buries itself under hedges, banks, and other places. If it be dug out in cold weather, it may be observed to be in a state in which the life functions are almost suspended. No secretions will be observed for a long period. Even the action of breathing appears to be interrupted for long intervals. The creature may be placed in coal gas for a considerable time, without any inconvenience being noticed. It may be sealed in a jar for hours, and it will take no hurt. It may even be put under water for half-an-hour, if the winter torpor is deep, without causing it injury. Bats exhibit an almost similar condition of suspended life functions in their winter sleep. Torpid dormice may be placed for hours in coal gas, or in carbon dioxide, without causing them injury. In most cases the state of trance into which true hibernating animals fall is slow in its onset, and it gradually increases in intensity with the advance of the year, until at its maximum the vital functions almost cease. Yet it is not always this maximum condition of inertness which is accompanied by the most remarkable results. In the case of frogs and toads, the outward appearances of winter sleep are not nearly so much in evidence as in the case of bats, hedgehogs, badgers, and other warm-blooded animals. The torpor of the former animals never appears to be profound, and movement readily takes place. Yet frogs, which breathe through lungs, will lie under water for long periods during winter, or they will bury themselves deeply in mud. It is said in these cases that exchange of air must take place through the skin, and this is true in certain circumstances. But there is no doubt that we must recognise that no air at all is necessary for long intervals. The writer has put a torpid toad in a hermetically sealed bottle, from which the oxygen contained in the air had been burnt out. At the end of two days, the bottle was opened, and on testing it the contained gas instantly extinguished a light. The toad, however, was none the worse, and it lived for months after.

The most interesting question underlying all the aspects of hibernation and winter trance in animals is—how far does the suspension of vital functions really go? Can the machinery of life ever completely stop and yet resume its motion again? And yet further—if there is only suspension of functions is the tale of life taken up where it left off, so that the suspended interval does not, as it were, come out of the creature's capital of longevity? The answer to the last question, in particular, has an important bearing on many interesting problems of human life. In the case of hibernating animals we appear to have all the gradations, from ordinary sleep to the conditions of such profound insensibility as has been described. Not only is there sleep in the deeper stages, but there is absolute loss of sensation, as in anaesthesia. In cases of true hibernation the descent towards insensibility is gradual, and affects all the senses to an overwhelming degree. The recovery is similarly gradual, so much so that animals in a deep state of winter sleep often die if suddenly awakened. All these conditions point to the completeness with which the functions of the body have been suspended. It is, therefore, not unlikely that the interval of torpor is economised, and that the life processes are taken up again at a stage at, or near, where they were left off.

The only condition in human subjects which can be compared with those of winter sleep in animals, are those of ordinary trance. There are many well-authenticated instances of persons who have slept continuously for years, the sleep being so profound that they could not be roused. One case in which certain of the Professors of McGill University were interested some years ago was that of a woman who had spent a considerable portion of her life in an unconscious condition. She had intervals of sleep-lethargy from which she could not be awakened, the last continuing for thirteen years. This case resembled others of the kind in human subjects, in which, however, the conditions fall far short of those prevailing in the profound winter sleep of animals. The bodily functions are not usually suspended to the same degree. The woman mentioned, who would not otherwise have been reckoned a good life, died at the age of seventy. There was no clear conclusion to be drawn as to the effect of the long intervals of unconsciousness on the patient's longevity, although the indications were that it had been extended.

THE SEEKERS.

THEY fringe the plate-glass windows—an ever-moving mass of silhouettes—and follow closely the contour of the shops, moving fitfully as people at a picture show; and they are equally intent.

They gaze and gaze and gaze, and the gazing crowds around them are as nothing. For they know not what they want and look for inspiration; therefore they look long at everything, craning their neck or bending their head in thoughtful concentrated stares, and take no heed of the gentle onward push of others coming on behind. Then they pass on slowly, for seldom at the first time do they make up their mind to enter in and buy. With lingering, sideways gaze, they move, so that others must give place to them or collide. But there are few collisions. For they side round each other easily, meeting and passing without hitch, as the oiled links of driven gear chains pass over the toothed drum.

Though they all seek something, there is no competition; and the harassed frenzy of sale scrambles is absent, though they are mostly women hovering to buy. For theirs is a task of discriminate selection, accomplished leisurely, and only at the end is there any necessity to hurry. Thus they are different to the methodical, busy folk who race round a pre-arranged route, at the last moment, consulting lists and spending money in appointed places.

They block the pavements, because they do not know beforehand what to get, and, though they publish their indecision plaintively, they concentrate on their search with contented enthusiasm. Slowly and resolutely they move to and fro, up one side and down the other of a street, seeking with fastidious critical inspection to shape a hazy, preconceived idea of what will suit and be acceptable. Though they are all actuated by one motive they are attracted by many different displays, each governed by many limitations.

By their interests and remarks you shall know something of them and of those for whom they choose. For they are almost invariably in pairs, and talk aloud, oblivious in their zeal, exchanging knowledge of the wants of many pet-named people.

Outside the blaze and sparkle of the silversmiths, they argue the suitability of inkpots, and describe accurately the writing table to be adorned; they hesitate between date calendars and cigarette cases, and inventory the possessions of relatives and friends; they gauge the size of silver frames for photographs; they question doubtfully pencils, match-boxes and many-chained chate-laines, for fear that they have been forestalled. The wealthy few point out the jewellery, and speak openly of others' favourite stones.

At the book-shops they criticise the literary tastes of many individuals and advertise their own difficulty to choose according, because theirs does not coincide; they read aloud many titles, and interrupt the inspection of their companion to beg advice on all the books they do not know. They choose a first prayer-book with mentioned memories of their own, and pounce thankfully on wondrously coloured picture books for the children of acquaintances and old dependents.

Around the children's wonderland of toys they gather in almost stationary crowds; they talk of many strange requirements, of forts and soldiers, of motor cars and dolls, and boats which will go by clockwork in the bath; they discuss the educational effect of paint-boxes and the quieting advantages of bricks; they recall memories of the joys of picture puzzles, and the pride of proprietorship in dolls' houses and butchers' shops. They discuss the ages of many little nephews and nieces, and their eyes wander up the window in the hope of finding something extraordinary for each. They become plaintive in their bewilderment as to what will amuse and what will be execrated by parents; they suggest real-steam-driven trains and reject them because of the danger; and they calm their fears as to the watery nuisance of magnetic ducks with the plea that they can easily be kept for rainy days. During their long inspection they become reminiscent over traditional possessions, and eloquent in recounting the observed tendencies of many very youthful individuals. For here they spare no effort of discrimination, because there is so much to be considered, and here their choice is so serious—to the recipient.

Many linger around the varied assortment of dainty unnecessaries, and their task is not so hard; for where everything will suit anybody they may indulge their own fancy in the choice. Even so, though they mention multitudes who want a purse or fan, they speak of many who seemingly have everything that is displayed. But they do not despair; they gaze and gaze, and pick out something which will do, with sudden joy, mentioning for whom it is to be. They choose many things, and give many different reasons for their choice—a suddenly remembered wish, a reminder of an oft-repeated joke.

So they cluster in continuous, adjoining groups, continually changing but never dwindling away, and each shop has at least a quota of the crowds.

They choose gloves of many sizes, and ties of many hues, handkerchiefs also, and bits of lace. Even at the chemists they linger with thoughts of scent and soap; and some, perforce, consider the everyday necessities of wear. For they are of every cash denomination.

This they reveal continually, gauging the price of things unmarked with calm or anxious wonder, or a certain conviction that it is beyond their means. Some go in to ask the price and others move reluctantly away; for each thing must bear its proportion to a preconceived sum total of expense. Even so, they all invariably exceed. Though they start out with firm resolve, though they make so many careful calculations by the way, they reach their limit all too soon, because there are so many to remember and everything was just a little more; therefore their expenditure mounts up until they wilfully forget it.

When the last brown-paper parcels have been carried home on Christmas Eve they are very poor—for the joy of giving possessed them, and made them very reckless at the end.

Travel and Adventure.

THE GIANTS OF THE SUDAN.

[BY SIR ALFRED PEASE.]

THE word Sudan, rendered into English, simply means the country of the Blacks (Arabic—swad—black, masc. plural sud, with locative terminal an). The blacks are of many races, tribes, and languages; together they represent the aboriginal inhabitants of the Sudan. I do not know of an older race in the Egyptian Sudan than these blacks whom we may class together as Nilotic negroes. There may be a still more ancient family of man yet to be identified, such as we find in other parts of Africa, similar to the diminutive light-coloured Bushmen of South Africa, the pigmies of the Congo forests, or the representatives of a later family, such as the Midgans of Somaliland. I have not space here to allude to more than two or three of the black nations of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan. The Shilluks, Dinkas, and Nuers, among the Nilotic negroes, have many characteristics in common. These three races are at certain points contiguous. Their country may be very roughly described as that of the banks of the upper White Nile and its tributaries. Beyond them, further West and South of the Bahr el Ghazal, are the Nyam-nyams, a people said by some travellers to be somewhat higher in the scale of intelligence than those just named; and this in spite of the fact that they are cannibals.

As for the country itself, there are two kinds of Sudan; the one more or less real desert, that is to say even when it is bush or scrub country, there is, if not an entire absence of water, a great scarcity of it. The other is the land of rivers and swamps, where water is often too abundant. But both may truthfully be described as thirsty lands, for I have heard a man say that even among the rivers, it was not much better than being in the desert, as wherever you may be in the Sudan there is never time enough to drink enough. On the other hand, some faint notion of the heat is to be gathered from the story of the unfortunate man, whose favourite beverage in the desert was hot tea, and who, having taken a good supply of this with him in thermos bottles, died of thirst, as he could not reduce the temperature enough to drink it.

If travelling in the desert has its drawbacks, so has sailing on Sudanese waters. During the winter months, the North wind blows steadily, and you can sail as far South as navigation is possible, but you can not hope for a South wind to take you Northwards before March. On our homeward journey, even on the White Nile, where the river is often wide enough to allow of tacking, we once took ten days to make sixty miles. Another drawback is the insect life—mosquitoes in such variety, and in such myriads, that after sundown every kind of mosquito protection is wanted. On the Bahr el Ghazal I saw, besides the dreaded Anophele and other noxious kinds, the Elephantiasis mosquito, and we observed some horrid cases of elephantiasis among the Nuers. Among the plagues of daylight I may mention one, the Seroot fly, a large gentleman, who literally gashes you as he strikes you. On the Bahr el Ghazal, I was once attacked, in the night, by a countless host of marsh ants. This, I think, was the most unpleasant experience I have ever had, and I would rather take on a dozen lions alone, than face a similar army of ants again.

In point of height, the people of all the three tribes of Shilluks, Dinkas, and Nuers are above the normal stature of mankind. There are many Dinkas who are giants, and it is common to see men among them 6 feet 5 inches high. The Shilluks are not so tall, but the Nuers considerably taller. I have been in a village where they were all literally giants and giantesses. Of three men I was with one day, only one of which I measured, the shortest measured 6 ft. 8 in. At one place the average height of the men could not have been much under this, and the tallest women must have come within an inch or two of it.

Comparatively early in the last century, Mehemet Ali crossed the Nubian Desert, and conquered the Northern Sudan. Ismail Pasha continued this policy of expansion, and under him the railway towards the Sudan was begun, and the telegraph reached Khartum. Khartum became the emporium of the Sudan slave and ivory trade, and European Consuls, merchants and adventurers, pushed further into the countries of the Southern blacks than we have yet reached. Man-hunting and elephant-hunting proved a very lucrative occupation, and those who pursued it gave the first reliable information we have of the Nilotic negroes. To Pretherick, the British Consul at Khartum, belong the first honours of the first records in English of the countries south of the Bahr el Ghazal.

It was not till 1871 that the Egyptians, with some 700 troops, at Fashoda, finally subdued the Shilluks. In these times the Bahr el Gebel, now the highway to Gondokoro, was choked with sudd, and such communications as there were with the countries in that direction were via the Zeraf. The Shilluks then were estimated at about 1,200,000 people, supporting themselves by a pastoral life, some agriculture, fishing, and hunting. They were well organised, under chiefs of villages, and these under chiefs of groups of villages (50 to 100 villages). The village place equivalent to our market square is the centre of the life of these primitive communities. Here, under the protecting clouds of cow-dung smoke, they sit and have their smoking concerts, or talk and dance late into the night. Instead of the market cross, you find a tree or dom palm, on which hang the drums which are used to tell the news of the day, to warn, or are employed in the orchestra. The Shilluks, like the Nuers, wear a diabolical aspect from the habit of protecting themselves from mosquitoes by covering themselves with white wood ashes, mixed with certain unsavoury ingredients. They are a tall race, but not as tall as the Dinkas. They, at least the men, affect a great variety of head-dress. Some of their fashions, in this respect, are similar to the Dinka's. They are armed with spears and lances.

The Nuers, however, are the race which I am to deal with here; the race of giants which has its home amongst the awful swamps that spread North and South of the Bahr el Ghazal. We were warned by the authorities that if we came across them we should possibly find them unfriendly, and at any rate shy and difficult to get into touch with. Sir William Garstin, who had himself been up these streams, said that on such occasions as he saw them, they waved their hands with a deprecating motion, as if they were averse to having any communication with strangers. It is in the winter that the best opportunity of seeing something of these people is afforded; for when the rivers are in flood and the water out over the whole of the adjacent regions, the Nuers retire to the drier ridges and islands of the interior. In the winter, as the waters recede, they desert their inland villages, and take up their residence in their winter ones, on ridges of dry swamp clay, within a few miles of the main channels. The first of the giants whom I saw were on a spit of bush and high grass country, between the Zeraf and Ghazal. I was hunting, and was following some roan antelope, which I had seen disappear into grass so tall that nowhere could I see over it. Suddenly I saw three hideous heads and shoulders and spear-heads moving towards me. I moved a few yards, to where there was an open spot, which they would have to cross if they held on in the same direction. Immediately they stepped into the open they marked me, and stood rooted to the spot with amazement at the apparition of myself and my Arab Shikari. Each of them was, at a guess, 7 ft. high, stark naked, of course, for afterwards, when we had penetrated further into their country, we found both sexes innocent of any clothing whatever. In one hand each held two spears, in the other a knoberry; their covering of white ash gave them a grey, corpse-like appearance. The custom of breaking out their lower incisor teeth, which causes the upper teeth to grow down and protrude (hence the name, Abou Senoon, Father jut-tooth), their hair, by means of clay and gum, worked into a sort of curved peak, after the pattern of a guinea fowl's crest, or the front and sides of the head shaved, and the rest of the hair towzled out behind into a mane, (and treated by a process I will not describe to make it red), all added to the strange and weird appearance of these warriors. One of the three turned and fled, another put all his weapons into one hand, and made the deprecating sign I had heard of. I immediately imitated it. The effect was all I could desire. They came up to us, and the senior of the two took the Arab's hand, and bending over it, spat into it; I, with a little more ceremony, received the same salute, and then we gazed in smiling and mute admiration at each other, the giants looking down on us, and we looking up at them.

(To be concluded.)

The Drama.

MR. SHAW'S "CÆSAR" AND THE CRITICS.

No student of contemporary English drama will have been surprised by the attitude of the critics towards Mr. Barker's "Waste" and Mr. Shaw's "Cæsar and Cleopatra." It is precisely what might have been expected. The dramatic critics have, as a body, accepted the state of degradation into which the English stage has fallen under the reign of the commercial drama and of the actor-manager. They are not likely, therefore, to extend a warm welcome to a movement of reform. If that movement exhibits traces of excess, a touch of the morbid introspection, the pessimism, which belongs to our time, it is natural for the journalists who have acquiesced in the absence of sincerity, the frivolous and immoral atmosphere, of the London theatre, to exaggerate these characteristics. This has been the fate of Mr. Barker's work. It would have been far better for an added touch of reserve, a softer, more human, note. But can any serious playgoer doubt that the atmosphere of "Waste" is a more moral atmosphere, and a far keener intellectual one, than that of "The Spring Chicken" or "The Gay Lord Quex"? Yet it is difficult to discern among the professional critics of the play an endeavour to institute this kind of comparison—in a word, to "standardise" the productions with which they have to deal.

Yet this is surely the first business of criticism. What relation has this or that drama to life? Has the author any views about life, save, let us say, the common, superficial, light-minded view of the amusement-drugged playgoer, the average sensual man and woman of our day? Is he existing for them, and them alone, or has he any thought for the better minds and affections of his audiences? Does he care to make them acquainted with pity and terror, or does he aim merely at finishing the evening agreeably for a well-dined audience? We know that, with us, he is thinking in the main of the latter aim, and that in the main the critics encourage him to pursue it. In this moral heedlessness the English Press stands almost alone. We cannot imagine the more cultured newspapers of any country but America taking the same view, let us say, of Tolstoy's "Power of Darkness" and Ibsen's "Ghosts," as our Press took when the late Mr. Clement Scott, then the leading dramatic critic in London, described Ibsen as a "muck-ferreting dog," and as it is evidently quite prepared to take now. Ideas, and the pursuit of ideas, are still hateful to us, or despised by us. We still see with complacency the decline of the drama towards the standard and method of the music-hall. For example, a class of play has lately sprung into favour, the humorous attraction of which consists largely in long, eccentric monologues in the vein of grotesque comedy. The idea of these monologues is borrowed from the pantomime or the music-hall stage; their chief feature is their absolute disconnectedness from the piece, and the way in which each joke is divorced from its predecessor. All effort of imagination is thus spared to the audience. These frivolous monologues, which are mere displays of the vanity and complete irresponsibility of a clever actor, may be quite amusing in their way; but they indicate a long step on the road to the complete abasement of the British drama.

It is easy to trace this acceptance by the critical world of the contemporary drama as it stands to-day—degraded and unconscious of its degradation—in the treatment of work to which the author has attempted to give some intellectual significance. Till within the last few months the Court Theatre has been the home of the intellectual drama. It has now been transferred to the Savoy, and Mr. Shaw's "Cæsar and Cleopatra" has succeeded his much inferior, but interesting, "Devil's Disciple." For the most part the critics will not have "Cæsar and Cleopatra," any more than they would have "The Doll's House." The atmosphere being absolutely innocent, and the dialogue scrupulously reserved, it cannot be accused of impropriety. So it is largely treated as a mere freak of Mr. Shaw's fancy, incidentally insulting to Shakespeare. One gentleman suggests that it would have scored as comic operetta. From some of the criticisms one would gather that the writers believed Rufio, and Pothinus, and Achilles, and Theodotus, and other historical figures, to be as fabulous as the Sphinx. It is not for me to enjoy all the characteristics of Mr. Shaw's art. It is possible to think some of its teaching, notably that of the third act of "Major Barbara," very bad for mankind, and to regard his passion for joking, in season and out of season, as a blot on his dramatic method. But his "Cæsar" is neither a contemptible nor an unhistoric conception. It is Mr. Shaw's way of translating into terms of modern thought, and through the reflection of his own ironical temper, Mommsen's theory of Cæsar as the "entire and perfect man." Here and there I suspect Mr. Shaw has allowed the unspeakable Froude to draw him into a misconception of facts; but on the whole the author's presentment of Cæsar—his calculated clemency and geniality, his subtle management of men, his more than Napoleonic power of making soldiering serve statesmanship, his personal temperance in eating and drinking, his serenity and sweetness of temper—is a real addition to the stage portraiture of great men, and is in line with the modern view of the great Roman's character.

Moreover, the main intellectual design of Mr. Shaw in drawing his Cæsar and his Cleopatra—namely, to show that mankind, new and old, is all of one pattern—is the design of all writers of power; to them the whole world is kin; there are essentially no new discoveries to be made about it, so far as the main stuff of human character is concerned. These are not contemptible or fantastic notions, though they are worked out with touches of fantasy, sometimes rather crude and capricious fantasy. Are they not worth discussing? In any other capital but our own, the validity of Mr. Shaw's idea of Cæsar, its worth as drama and as literature, would have been seriously canvassed. I cannot find that it concerns even the cleverest of our dramatic writers. It is the lighter kind of technique which mainly absorbs them. And not till an intellectual and moral standard is set up in literary London, as it is set up, for example, in literary Paris, will they have a right to criticise, as, for example, Mr. Archer has a right to criticise, the shortcomings of Mr. Shaw's dramatic ideas, and the disconcerting play of his temperament. It is little to their particular school of criticism what Mr. Shaw meant Cæsar to be and to represent, and how far he may truthfully call such a presentation a fair interpretation of historical truth. To take a small point, more than one gentleman scoffs at Cæsar's rejection of wine and elaborate cookery, and his calling for a glass of barley water. Yet nothing is more natural or more in harmony with the evidence, friendly and unfriendly, of Cæsar's personal habits. After the wildness of youth, Cæsar probably established as good a model of moral restraint as the world in which he moved could understand and appreciate. On another disputed point Mr. Shaw is clearly right. Cæsar was merciful beyond all contemporary ideas of mercy; his great enemy, Cicero, was eager to admit and extol the virtue which, incidentally, spared the orator's own life. It is, no doubt, open to say that Mr. Shaw has given too little dignity, or plausibility, to this or that side of his hero's character. But Mr. Shaw's brains and fancy are on the whole the best brains and fancy available for English dramatic work at this moment, and it is idle to belittle them.

Contemporaries.

I.—FRANCIS JOSEPH.

MORE perhaps than any man now living Francis Joseph has confounded the wisdom of the wise. That he should still be Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary must on any reckoning be held one of the most remarkable facts of modern politics. Nothing seemed less likely sixty years ago when, as a youth of eighteen, he ascended a throne shaken by revolution and tottering, as all thought, to its final overthrow. The ferment of resurgent nationalism and democracy that in '48 swept through Europe from Dublin to Milan was nowhere so fierce and complex as in the historic realm of the Hapsburgs. A five-cornered revolution was Francis Joseph's introduction to the cares of rulership. The world, men said, had ceased to believe in monarchy. Hapsburgs and Hohenzollerns and their ascendancy with them would vanish utterly from the earth, or if they survived it would be but as constitutional conveniences and figure-heads, possessing at the utmost a mere social primacy. The popular view was that monarchy as an institution had exhausted its mandate and could never again be the political, still less the autocratic, force it had been. Wilhelm I., the present Kaiser, Napoleon III., and Francis Joseph are the ironical answer of history to these expectations, and in many ways Francis Joseph seems the most complete and the most ironical of them all. In Germany and France monarchy regained or consolidated its position by victories on the battle-field. But Francis Joseph has always been defeated. By the fortune of two bloody wars precious parts of his empire have been lost to him for ever. Moreover, he has barely known a year of domestic peace. The vengeance he took on the insurrectionists of 1848, or that was taken in his name, thrilled Europe with horror. His name became the symbol of all that was bigoted, reactionary, cruel, and tyrannical. He rode rough-shod over nearly a dozen races. He tried to Germanise by force a realm four-fifths of which had grown to loathe the very name of German. He suppressed all popular liberties; he placed all education, public and private, in the hands of the Church; he revived, in all its infamy, the alliance between the sword and the cross. The first twenty years of his reign were as repressive and unenlightened as absolutist instincts stimulated by and working through a stubborn priesthood, a secret police, and racial militarism could make them. The last forty have shown a painful, often halting, but on the whole constant approximation towards Liberalism. No living monarch has made more or worse mistakes; none has retrieved them with a greater success. No one by his irresolution has helped to provoke more crises or has disentangled them with greater patience and persuasiveness. The ruler who sixty years ago was not less than a menace to his peoples and the Empire has become the kindly, revered, fair-minded protector of both.

Looking back on the blunders and obliqueness of his early years, one might with justice plead for Francis Joseph that he was not a free agent. He came to the throne a pupil of Metternich in politics, and spiritually almost a vassal of the Holy See. His mother was the incarnation of eighteenth-century Toryism. The Minister he found in power was Prince Schwarzenberg, Metternich's inferior in everything except the violence of his reactionary principles. And Francis Joseph himself was a young and ardent soldier, intelligent no doubt; but when you have a whole realm ablaze, what is the intelligence of a boy of eighteen worth? Force, and plenty of it, is his sole conception of a remedy—a remedy in this case buttressed by the bias of education and training, by the opinions of all around him, and by every tradition and instinct of his House. It is the distinction of Francis Joseph and his great certificate of fitness for the kingly craft that, though he has learned slowly, he has always learned at last. It took him twenty years to undo the results of his first false start—twenty years' expulsion from the German Confederation and the loss of the Italian provinces. But character may be revealed more truly in bearing the consequences of errors and crimes than in their original commission; and Francis Joseph, if he has lacked insight and foresight, has rarely failed to assimilate the warnings of experience. From the moment he was tardily convinced that absolutism was not the key to the Austrian puzzle, his growth has been continuous. Considering, indeed, all that he had to throw off and break away from, his sustained effort to live with the times may fairly be called wonderful. He found Austria a feudal State; he will leave it with the fundamental liberties as secure as they ever can be in a realm where race is everything. A Constitution, trial by jury, the right of public meeting, freedom of the Press, and now universal suffrage—he has consented to them all. The Concordat is abolished, the serf is no longer subject to the lord, the shackles of the old trade guilds have been largely removed, and commerce allowed more or less to seek its natural channels. That the non-settlement of the Bohemian question is a reproach to the Emperor's sagacity or strength of will, and that in his conception of the State the barracks still come before the factory, is probably true. But he has at least grasped the principle of equal justice to all the nationalities of his polyglot realm; he would probably subscribe to Gladstone's prophecy that Federalism is the ultimate destiny of the dual monarchy; and amid an infinity of difficulties—Austria-Hungary is a whole series of Irelands—he has done much to make it a reality. Both in form and spirit the Austria of Metternich seems centuries removed from the dual monarchy of to-day.

A monarch who has merely presided over so swift and vast a transformation deserves at least the credit of his adaptability. A monarch who, like Francis Joseph, has guided, and, to some extent, has initiated it, may prefer a higher claim. As the semi-autocrat of a would-be constitutional system he has raised the throne to the position, almost, of a final court of appeal, to which all his peoples have learned to resort with confidence. That is to put the royal office to a fine and statesmanlike use. Fortune, no doubt, has befriended him. The clash and turmoil of race and of wrangling groups, by paralysing Parliament, has brought to the occupant of the throne a freer scope, a more decisive authority, and larger opportunities. Francis Joseph, in the maturity of his character and experience, has known how to make the most and best of them. He has schooled himself into moderation and impartiality, the qualities of all others that the politicians of his Empire most lack. With a native gift of industry, and a real capacity for affairs, toiling for sixty years at little else, he has amassed an experience such as no Minister can pretend to; and the throne is at last a watch-tower from which a king with eyes may see his kingdom steadily and see it whole. The sliding procession of Parliaments and Cabinets has but emphasised the permanence of the monarch. All races and parties have come more and more to lean on him; the trust in his disposition and his sense of fairness, if not always in his judgment, is implicit. Francis Joseph has won the kind of confidence that is never refused to men of his simple, conscientious, frank, and dependable nature. The great tragedies of his life have penetrated that confidence with an irresistible emotion of tender and affectionate sympathy. To call him the most hapless of men is to forget the high reward his sufferings have found in the unique devotion and gratitude of his peoples. To call him the least successful of monarchs is to forget that under his rule the realm of the Hapsburgs has been revolutionised, and that his peoples and the common opinion of Europe, with perhaps an exaggerated fearfulness, have come to look upon him as the chief pledge and bulwark of unity and peace.

Letters from Abroad.

GERMANY'S IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Almost simultaneously the Reichstag and the Prussian Landtag have been reopened after their long holidays. The Reichstag has been presented with two significant Governmental Bills: the draft of an Imperial law on assemblies and associations, and a Bill to amend the existing law on the Stock Exchange and the wholesale trade in stocks and commodities. It has also received the Budget Bill, and, with it, the confirmation of the existence of a considerable deficit. The Empire and State increased expenditure must be met by increased taxation, and the Imperial Government insists, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Herr von Henzel, declared, on taxes on commodities and for Government monopolies. Food and other provisions—already much increased in price—are to be made dearer still. Why not? The biggest item in the additional expenditure of the Empire will be for “the navy, the fighting navy.”

Of the draft Bills put before the Reichstag, the Stock Exchange Bill is the least objectionable. But the Bill on Associations, as presented by the Government, does not better the state of things even in Prussia, whilst for some German States it would mean a serious reaction. Some of the obsolete and ineffective proscriptions of the Prussian law of 1850, the creation of the reaction after the revolution of 1848, have been dropped, but others of the same type will now be applied to the whole German Empire. Associations dealing with public affairs will in future be everywhere obliged to send their rules and the names of the members of their committee to the police; public meetings, except at an election, must be announced to them twenty-four hours before their time; and meetings in the open air are to be dependent upon the permission of the police. These regulations are now mostly unknown in quite a number of German States.

Besides all these reactionary provisions, Clause 7 of the Bill prescribes that the language in all the meetings dealing with public affairs must be German, exceptions being only obtainable from the central authority of the State. This provision is in the first instance directed against the Poles, although it may also in time be applied to the Danish-speaking population in Northern Schleswig, and the French-speaking population of Alsace Lorraine. As an anti-Polish measure, it is on a par with the Expropriation Bill submitted to the Prussian diet.

Whilst the speech from the throne in Prussia has been dumb on the question of franchise reform, for which, on Tuesday last, more than a million of people have demonstrated all over the Kingdom, the Prussian legislature is asked to empower the Government to acquire in the two eastern provinces, Posen and Westpreussen, Polish estates by compulsory expropriation, in order to settle German agriculturists on them. The existing fund for the increase of the German element in the Polish provinces is for this purpose to be augmented by 300 millions of marks. 350 millions have already been spent on its head, another 100 millions are demanded for regular purchases under it, so that on the whole the fund will amount to no less than 750 millions of marks, or 37½ millions of pounds sterling.

It is not necessary to raise the question of the right of the Poles to an independent united Polish State, in order to judge the wisdom of the policy to which this fund is devoted. Until now the representatives of the Poles in Prussia have again and again denied any intention to join a movement for the severance of the Polish districts of Prussia from the Prussian State. Quite apart from the question of acquired historical rights, a glance at the map of Prussia is enough to show that the State, as at present constituted, would rather sacrifice twenty or thirty times the above amount of money, and thousands of lives, than acquiesce in such a severance. Already the Eastern frontier of Prussia is, from a military point of view, badly formed. With the two provinces severed, it would be almost indefensible. The possession of the two provinces is for the present Prussian State a political necessity. This the Prussian Poles know, and since 1848 no movement for a new Poland, including these provinces, found adherents amongst them.

But what they insist upon are the rights solemnly promised to them when the Polish tracts of the Provinces were annexed to Prussia, particularly the right to the free use of their own language, and for many years there was no quarrel in this respect. The Poles did not object to have German taught them in addition to instruction in their own language. They performed their military service as obediently as any other Prussian citizens, and in the wars of 1866 and 1870 they freely shed their blood for Prussia and Germany. Things began to change with Bismarck's so-called Kulturkampf against the Catholic Church. The Poles are Catholics whilst the German inhabitants of the two Provinces are mostly Protestants. Catholic and Pole, German and Protectionist are there quasi synonymous concepts. Great love, it must be admitted, has never prevailed between the two sections. But with the Kulturkampf the friction became more acute, and consequently the national feeling on the side of the Poles more accentuated. Bismarck intensified it by offensive speeches on the Poles and several measures in the direction of compulsory Germanisation. It was under his rule that the settlement fund was founded. When he was dismissed Count Caprivi tried a policy of conciliation, and the Polish nobles, up to then the leaders of the Poles, were eager in supporting the demands of the Government. One of them, Herr von Koszielsky, obtained for his fervour in regard to navy grants at that time the nickname of “Admiraliky.”

But in the meantime important social changes had been going on in the ranks of the Polish population and now they began to make their influence felt in politics too. At the time of the partitions of Poland, the provinces finally taken by Prussia were of the poorest and the population extremely ignorant and dependent. Prussian legislation freed the peasantry from feudal obligations, and for some time the peasant could be played against the noble or the squire. But later on this opposition ceased, and the Polish peasant looked upon the Polish noble as his born national representative. Up to the sixties and seventies there was very little of a Polish middle-class in Prussia. The better trades and professions were in the two provinces in the hands either of Germans or of Jews. From that period, however, a Polish middle-class began to evolve. The peasants got better instructed, and at least a number of them improved their social standard, whilst out of the Polish labourer—once the most submissive of beings, very slaves in the social meaning of the word—grew a class of workmen with a sense of independence and an understanding of the political problems of the time. Defenders of the present policy of the Prussian Government like to point to this improvement and say that the Poles owe it wholly to the good government and administration they enjoy under Prussian rule. But it is at least as much due to the energies and the capabilities of the Poles themselves. They have shown that they are not the lower beings they had been believed to be. But whatever the reason, Polish society having changed, the traditional policy of the nobles did not any longer answer their claims and social conceptions. A radical movement sprang up and quite naturally took a more pronounced national colour.

It must be admitted that the situation of the German population of the two provinces has simultaneously become more uncomfortable. The Poles are much more closely united than the Germans. Caste feelings, and religious or racial differences, divide the Germans. Semi-feudal squires and Government officials of all sorts form one section of them, and not a small number of the German-speaking population are of Jewish descent and creed. Consequently, the German clubs are split up, for the East Elbian squire is a born anti-Semite, and of most members of the Prussian upper bureaucracy the same can be said.

But in another and a much more important respect the squire stands out as the cause of the weakened position of the Germans in the two provinces. By a policy of buying up farms, and settling large estates in the shape of entail, he has through generations deliberately prevented the growth of a healthy German peasantry. By low wages and bad treatment he has driven away the German tenant and the German labourer, and he has also, by depopulating the country, hampered the development of towns that would, by and by, have become German strongholds. In 1875 the province of Posen had 720,000 Germans and 880,000 Poles; in 1900 the latter have increased to 1,200,000, the Germans only to 750,000. If you compare with this the increase of the German population in the whole State of Prussia—from 25 millions in 1875 to 37 millions in 1900—you will at once see that the lesser fertility of the Germans cannot have been the reason of the present misproportion in the population of Posen. As a matter of fact there was, year after year, a wholesale emigration of Germans, sometimes approaching a flight. Villages formerly mainly German have become almost wholly Polish, and towns have changed their character in the same way. Thirty years ago, the only decent hotels or inns, in most places, were German; to-day, in a great many cases, it is the reverse. In the capital town of the province, Posen, you find to-day a much greater number of Polish shops than of German ones; and the Polish theatre greatly outshines the German theatre.

This evolution has, of course, not remained unnoticed, and, pushed by a Nationalist German association, the Prussian Government has for about twenty years tried to counteract the relative decline of the German population by buying up Polish estates and settling German farmers there. But it was for a long time the work of the famous Mrs. Partington. The many millions devoted to the purpose did much to relieve the indebted Polish squirearchy. They sold their encumbered estates at a good price to the Prussische Ansiedlungskommission, and bought through their agents German estates at a cheaper price. This led to a policy of out-bidding, and prices were finally screwed up to quite ridiculous rates. To-day land is, in the two provinces, the object of reckless and most dishonest speculation, the costs of which the nation at large has hitherto had to pay.

The Expropriation Bill is meant to remove this evil and would in so far be justified. From a Socialist point of view a Radical inroad into the privileges of property is naturally welcomed. In fact, on the day when the Socialists want to expropriate in favour of the Socialist State, some clauses of the Government Bill would serve their purpose admirably. But the Bill, besides being revolutionary in regard to property, is at the same time a wanton violation of the principle of equal rights. It aims at Polish landholders alone. They are to be singled out, although they are citizens of the State, like their German fellow-landholders, and fulfil in the same way all their civic duties. Nay, they have, in conjunction with their German neighbours, consistently supported the policy of agrarian protection, and they were their good allies in the campaign for high duties on corn, cattle, and meat. Thus they have been in conflict with a great section of the Prussian Poles themselves. But, in face of the Government Bill, these questions will be forgotten. As it aims at the Polish landholders, not in their capacity as land monopolists, but as Poles, it cannot but weld the Poles together irrespective of class differences.

The measure is doomed to failure. In its three eastern Provinces together, viz., Posen, Westpreussen, and Silesia, Prussia has from three to four million subjects of Polish nationality, and they are not to be demoralised by the settlement of some ten thousand German farmers between them. They will all the more throng into the towns, and if they make good their threat to have a boycott proclaimed in Russian Poland and Galicia amongst the agricultural labourers against German land-holders, they may cause the latter rather serious damage. Agriculture on the larger estates in all the eastern provinces of Prussia is to-day in a high degree dependent upon a supply of labour from the neighbouring Slavish states, particularly for season work, such as harvesting and the like. The relations of the Prussian Poles to the Prussian State can in several respects be compared to the relations that exist in the United Kingdom between the Irish and Great Britain. But the German Irishman need not cross the ocean to meet countrymen outside the pale of the Government he fights. Passing the south-eastern frontier of the Prussian State he is in Galicia, where the Poles are the ruling nation, and immediately beyond the eastern frontier from eight to nine million Poles live under Russian rule. Formerly most tyrannous, this rule has begun to loosen, and with the progress of constitutional life in Russia, the laws that keep the Russian Poles in a state of subjection must and will fall. How can the Prussian Government in the face of all this hope to achieve anything against its Polish population by such provocative measures as the Expropriation Bill? At all times it would have been a most doubtful enterprise to denationalise a people, about 16 millions of whom live on a territory which, though politically divided, forms a great compact entity. In our era of facilitated traffic, it is a sheer impossibility. That Prince Bülow is capable of resorting to such a policy, the very opposite of the policy of a Gladstone, nay, even of Mr. Chamberlain, shows how much, with all his pretended modernity, he is steeped in the prejudices of the Prussian Junker. He pleases himself now, in the part of the strong man; but his strong measures are far from constituting a strong policy. They are not suited to solve the great problem of making the Prussian Poles true citizens of the Prussian State and the German Empire. They are, on the contrary, of the kind to aggravate all the evils that exist in the two provinces, in the nature of constant strife between Germany's Irishmen and the Germans, led by a type of politicians—the "Makatists"—who reproduce all the bad features of the Ulstermen in England's Poland.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Poetry.

ON A RAILWAY PLATFORM.

I.

A DRIZZLE of drifting rain
And a blurred white lamp o'erhead,
That shines as my love will shine again,
In the world of the dead.

II.

Round me the wet black night,
And, afar in the limitless gloom,
Crimson and green, two blossoms of light,
Two stars of doom.

III.

But the night of death is a-flare
With a torch of back-blown fire,
And the coal-black deeps of the quivering air
Rend for my soul's desire.

IV.

Leap, heart, for the pulse and the roar
And the lights of the streaming train
That leaps with the heart of thy love once more
Out of the mist and the rain;

V.

For the thousand panes of light
And the faces veiled with mist,
Streaming out of the desolate night
In ruby and amethyst.

VI.

Out of the desolate years
The thundering pageant flows;
But I see no more than a window of tears
Which her face has turned to a rose.

ALFRED NOYES.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON will shortly need a shelf in the library all to himself. Messrs. Arrowsmith, of Bristol, have in the press a novel by him with the whimsical title, "The Man who was Thursday." It seems that Mr. Chesterton intended the book to be a farce, but, in process of writing, it became an allegory representing the struggle which is apparent in the universe and attempting to reconcile the existence of evil with a belief in God. So that although written in the fantastic style of "The Napoleon of Notting Hill," there is, as in that volume, an undercurrent of serious meaning. Other books upon which Mr. Chesterton is intermittently engaged are a biography of Mr. Bernard Shaw in "The Stars of the Stage" series, a Life of Charles Kingsley for the "English Men of Letters" series, a fairy tale to be called "St. George and the Dragon," and a companion volume to "Heretics," which will be published by Mr. John Lane. This latter volume is called "Orthodoxy," and is a reply to the critics—in particular, Mr. G. S. Street—who have objected to what they regard as the destructive character of a great deal of Mr. Chesterton's writing and have challenged him to produce a statement of his own position. It will be interesting to read Mr. Chesterton's dialectics in defence of orthodoxy.

* * *

THE collection of drawings by old masters in the Oxford University Galleries and the Library of Christ Church has in some respects more interest for students than those preserved at the British Museum and at Windsor. A number of these drawings have been issued during the past five years in six parts. These reproductions have now been collected and will be published almost immediately by the Clarendon Press together with a general introduction and critical descriptions by Mr. Sidney Colvin. The first of the Oxford collections, Mr. Colvin says, was bequeathed to Christ Church by General John Guise in 1765 and is chiefly made up of relatively commonplace and monotonous Italian drawings of the decadence. Then came the bequest made to the Bodleian Library by the eccentric, irritable, admirable bibliophile and antiquary, Francis Douce, the "Prospero" of Dibdin's "Bibliomania." The next considerable acquisition of drawings by the University was that of the examples by Michelangelo and Raphael from the Lawrence collection. Lastly, Mr. Chambers Hall presented the chief part of his magnificent collections to the University of Oxford in 1855. These include drawings by Rembrandt, Claude, Leonardo, Correggio, Dürer, Van Dyck, Rubens, and others, while English artists are represented by Wilson and Gainsborough. It will be a great gain to have this fine set of reproductions in a form in which the different schools are separated and arranged in regular order for study.

* * *

MOST English readers are unacquainted with even the names of those American writers whose work appeared before the time of Poe and Emerson. A book which Mr. Fisher Unwin has in preparation, "Heralds of American Literature," by Miss Annie Russell Marble, may possibly do something to dispel this ignorance. Following an introductory chapter, it gives biographical and critical studies of Francis Hopkinson, Philip Frenau, John Trumbull and his friends among the "Harvard wits," Joseph Dennie, William Dunlap, and other early American playwrights and novelists. The authoress believes that, though the work of these writers is often crude, still it reveals the customs and aspirations of their age and announces the dawn of a national literature.

* * *

EARLY next season Mr. Murray will publish "The Latins in the Levant: A History of Frankish Greece (1204-1566)," by Mr. William Miller. No complete history of the Latin States of Medieval Greece has appeared for over thirty years, and as Mr. Miller has made use of documents from the archives of Venice, Naples, Palermo, and Barcelona, his book should add considerably to our knowledge of the Fourth Crusade and of the States which were at that period carved out of the fragments of the Byzantine Empire by Western adventurers.

* * *

ONE of the last letters written by the composer, Edward Grieg, contains an interesting judgment passed upon two of the greatest men of letters whom Norway has produced. "In spite," he says, "of the profound difference in the way in which they understood the Norwegian character, Bjørnson and Ibsen are complimentary to one another. The former is an optimist and glorifies his fellow-countrymen; the latter is a pessimist and scourges them." In another letter he explains that his refusal to write a cantata for the accession of Haakon VII. was made upon principle. Art, he thought, should never be placed at the service of politics. He also states that his refusal to write a coronation march for King Edward VII. was dictated by the same reason.

* * *

THE interest taken by French critics in English literature to which we have frequently drawn attention in THE NATION, shows no sign of lessening. Among its latest fruits are two books of distinct value—a capital biographical and critical study of Coleridge by M. Joseph Aynard, which has just been published by Messrs. Hachette, and a very full account of the life and work of Emerson by M. M. Dugard, of which Armand Colin et Cie. are the publishers. Emerson, it might have been thought, would have been one of the last writers in English to attract a French critic, but M. Dugard's volume shows the contrary.

* * *

"THE JEWISH LITERARY ANNUAL," which has just appeared, contains a number of articles of general interest. Among them is a reprint of the able presidential address on "The Hebrew Note in Literature," delivered by Mr. Laurie Magnus. Mr. Magnus combats the opinion that Hebraism represents law, and Hellenism intellect in human life. We are far too apt, he holds, when we contemplate the elaborate code bequeathed by the Hebrew legislators, to forget the goal of perfection that was aimed at by that code, and he inclines to the view that the distinction between Hebraism and Hellenism as sources of inspiration in modern life have been too much emphasised by the critics, especially of the nineteenth century.

"The idea of righteousness as the sum of the Hebrew contribution to the thought of the world is not complete if it means—as it is commonly taken to mean—that the Jews taught morality to the nations, and that their teaching stopped at that point. They taught the far higher and the very much more difficult lesson that the capacities of the human intellect never achieve the full powers of their opportunities unless and until it is recognised that the sanction of the moral law resides in the reason of man, and that in this sense reason and faith are not logical contraries, but are identified in complete wisdom. . . . One of the chief signs of the Hebrew note in literature is a luminous simplicity and directness in the expression of transcendental thought. The Hebrew mind crossed the boundary of human experience with singular boldness. The Hebrew sent out scouts into the territory beyond, and left them, as it were, to their own devices. He neither affected the folly of furnishing the scouts of his imagination with an elaborate equipment for an expedition, the conditions of which were unknown, nor did he take refuge in the cowardice of counting the unknown as unimaginable."

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"England in the Seven Years' War." By Julian S. Corbett. (Longmans, 2 vols., 21s. net.)

"Ancient Britain and the Invasion of Julius Caesar." By T. Rice Holmes. (Clarendon Press, 21s. net.)

"Queen Mary's Book." Edited by Mrs. P. S. Mackenzie Arbuthnot. (Bell, 10s. 6d. net.)

"The King over the Water." By A. Shield and Andrew Lang. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

"Quaker and Courtier. The Life and Work of William Penn." By Mrs. Colquhoun Grant. (Murray, 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Social Fetish." By Lady Grove. (Smith, Elder, 5s. net.)

"The North Italian Painters of the Renaissance." By Bernard Berenson. (Putnam, 6s. net.)

"Cities of Italy." By Arthur Symons. (Dent, 4s. 6d. net.)

"Forty Singing Seamen, and Other Verses." By Alfred Noyes. (Blackwood, 5s. net.)

"The Doings of Berengaria." By Shellard Bradley. (Bell, 6s.)

"The Glade in the Forest." By Stephen Gwynn. (Maunsel, 6s.)

"Taine, Historien de la Révolution Française. Par A. Aulard. (Paris: Colin, 3 fr. 50.)

"Camille Desmoulins." Par Jules Claretie. (Paris: Hachette, 12 fr.)

"Les Charmier." Roman. Par Paul Renaudin. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit, 3 fr. 50.)

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW & STANDARD WORKS.

READY ON THURSDAY. With 8 Portraits in Photogravure. Large 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.: A Memoir. By his WIFE.

A Book for Children and their Elders.

With 28 Illustrations by E. T. REED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE UNLUCKY FAMILY.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

The Westminster Gazette says:—"One of the most amusing of the children's books issued this season."

THROUGH THE MAGIC DOOR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE. With 16 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s.

The British Weekly says:—"A frank, pleasant, hearty little book."

A HOLIDAY in the HAPPY VALLEY WITH PEN AND PENCIL.

By T. R. SWINBURNE, Major (late R.M.A.). With 24 Full-Page Illustrations in Colour, and a Map, demy 8vo, 16s. net.

. Wherein is set forth how a pair of novices fared for six months in the fair land of Kashmir, and how they extended their tour to certain interesting cities of India.

NATURE'S MOODS AND TENSES.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. With Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF CAVOUR.

By the Hon. EDWARD CADOGAN. With a Frontispiece. 7s. 6d. net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Cadogan has managed to give us not only a third picture of the man, but has also contributed a valuable addition to our historical shelves."

THE ALTAR FIRE.

By A. C. BENSON. Second Impression. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

PROSE IDYLS of the WEST RIDING.

By Lady CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

JOHN HARVARD AND HIS TIMES.

By HENRY C. SHELLEY. With 24 Full-Page Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

A HISTORY OF THE MINORIES.

By the Rev. E. M. TOMLINSON. With 4 Portraits in Photogravure and 9 Half-tone Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 18s. net. [December 12.]

THE SOCIAL FETICH.

By LADY GROVE. With a Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

THE TALE of the GREAT MUTINY.

NEW AND CONSIDERABLY ENLARGED EDITION. By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. Revised and cheaper Edition, considerably enlarged. With 16 Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 6s.

HUMAN JUSTICE FOR THOSE AT THE BOTTOM: An Appeal to Those at the Top.

By C. C. COTTERILL. 2s. 6d. net.

SPRING IN LONDON: A Poem on the Nature of Things.

By E. A. 2s. net.

THE VOYAGE of the 'DISCOVERY.'

By Captain ROBERT F. SCOTT, G.V.O., R.N. New and Cheaper Edition, in 2 vols., each with Coloured Frontispiece, 12 Illustrations, and Map, large post 8vo, 10s. net.

. Copies of the LIBRARY EDITION in 2 vols, royal 8vo, 42s. net, are still to be had.

POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE BROKEN ROAD. By A. E. W. MASON

LAI'D UP IN LAVENDER. By STANLEY WEYMAN.

MY MERRY ROCKHURST. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.

HER LADYSHIP. By KATHARINE TYNAN.

THE AWAKENING OF BITTLESHAM. By G. F. BRADBY.

W. M. THACKERAY'S WORKS.

The BIOGRAPHICAL EDITION. In 13 vols., large crown 8vo, cloth gilt top, 6s. each. The 13 vols. are also supplied in Set cloth binding, gilt top, £3 18s.

MRS. GASKELL'S WORKS.

The "KNUTSFORD" EDITION. In 8 vols., crown 8vo, cut edges, cloth, gilt top, 4s. 6d. each net

LIFE AND WORKS of CHARLOTTE, EMILY, AND ANNIE BRONTE.

The "HAWORTH" EDITION. In 7 vols., large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. each; or in Set cloth binding, gilt top, £2 2s. the Set.

MISS THACKERAY'S WORKS.

UNIFORM EDITION. Each volume illustrated by a Vignette Title-page. 10 vols., large crown 8vo, 6s. each.

ROBERT BROWNING'S COMPLETE WORKS.

CHEAPER EDITION. Edited and Annotated by the Rt. Hon. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, K.C., M.P., and FREDERIC G. KENYON 2 vols. large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, with Portrait Frontispiece to each volume. 7s. 6d. per vol.

. Also the UNIFORM EDITION and the POCKET EDITION in 8 vols. Particulars upon application.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING'S POETICAL WORKS.

CHEAPER EDITION, complete in 1 vol. with Portrait, large crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

. Also the UNIFORM EDITION in 6 vols. and the POCKET EDITION in 3 vols. Particulars upon application.

A LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

By SIDNEY LEE, Editor of "The Dictionary of National Biography." Fifth and thoroughly Revised Edition. With a Portrait of Shakespeare, a Portrait of the Earl of Southampton, and Facsimiles of Shakespeare's known Signatures. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

. Also the ILLUSTRATED LIBRARY EDITION, in 1 vol. medium 8vo, profusely illustrated with Photogravures, Topographical Views, &c., 16s.; and the Student's Edition, with a Photogravure Plate and 4 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

QUEEN VICTORIA: a Biography.

NEW, REVISED, and CHEAPER EDITION. With Portraits, Map, and Facsimile Letter, large crown 8vo, 6s.

. Also the FOURTH IMPRESSION (SECOND EDITION) of the Original. Edition, with Portraits, Map, and Facsimile Letter, crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

A VISION OF INDIA.

By SIDNEY LOW. SECOND IMPRESSION. With 32 Full-page Illustrations. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

SHAKESPEARE COMMENTARIES.

By Dr. G. G. GERVINUS, Professor of Heidelberg. Translated, under the Author's superintendence, by F. E. BUNNETT. With a Preface by F. J. FURNIVAL. SEVENTH EDITION, 8vo, 14s.

THE ROLL-CALL OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

By Mrs. A. MURRAY SMITH (E. T. Bradley), Author of "Annals of Westminster Abbey," &c. FOURTH EDITION. With 25 Full-Page Illustrations and 5 Plans. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

WESLEY AND HIS CENTURY: A Study in Spiritual Forces.

With a Photogravure Frontispiece from the Portrait of John Wesley by GEORGE ROMNEY, and Four Facsimiles of Letters, &c. SECOND IMPRESSION. Small demy 8vo, 6s. net.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS: A Record of Secret Service Recently Achieved.

By ERSKINE CHILDERS. With 2 Maps and 2 Charts. SIXTH IMPRESSION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Athenæum.—"We can conceive no volume of reference more indispensable to the scholar, the literary man, the historian, and the journalist."

In 1 vol. of 1,464 pp. royal 8vo, 25s. net in cloth; or 2s. net in half-morocco.

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY INDEX and EPITOME.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

NOTE.—Copies of the "INDEX and EPITOME" in the alternative bindings can be seen at the Principal Booksellers in London and in the country. A Prospectus of the "DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY" and of the "INDEX and EPITOME" will be sent post free on application.

Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. will be happy to send an Illustrated Catalogue of their Books suitable for Presents post free on application.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Letters to the Editor.

THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I trust you will take it as the candid phrase of a friend if I tell you that the strange irritation which always attracts you to the discussion of Catholic philosophy will strike us rather as a tribute to its strength than as any evidence of its decline. We know very well that if the English Catholic Movement were really dying, you would be glad to let it die in peace. The truth happens to be exactly the other way. The controversy has declined, not because the Oxford Movement has ceased, but because the English people have largely ceased to object to the Oxford Movement. Of any ten objections to it raised in the time of Pusey, at least six have been silently dropped by the time of Dr. Gore. Who, except the quite ignorant, now says that prayers for the dead are shocking, or that ritual is wrong, or that the Middle Ages were barbaric? If you really want to know how far the Catholic Movement has faded, the test is quite simple. Most of us, I suppose, had Protestant fathers and grandfathers and great-grandfathers, reaching back perhaps to the time of the Puritans. Take all the objections that your Puritan ancestor had to Rome, and compare them with those which you have, and you will find that you have whittled them down to one or two. You do not think—as your Puritan ancestor did—that Rome is anti-Christ because it is opposed to predestination. You do not think—as your great-grandfather did—that Rome is wrong because she believes in Purgatory and a progress for the soul. You do not think—as your grandfather did—that Rome is wrong because she insults the Deity with art and music and symbolism. You do not think—as your father did—that Rome is wrong because Catholic countries do not encourage the complete industrial freedom of the manufacturing countries. Of all the converging objections to Catholicism which once rent Europe to its roots, you have only managed to retain one objection; the objection to a collective authority in religion. But the more pathetically you cling to this one last Protestant doctrine, the more we shall be reminded that you have openly abandoned all the others.

I understand that your objection to Dr. Gore can be summarised in three sections.

First, you say that the Oxford Movement was a part of the Romantic Movement; and was (as far as I can understand you) indifferent to historical fact. Seeing that no English religion ever cared a dump about history until the Oxford Movement, this is rather a lark; but I pass on. Secondly, you say that Christianity is, or ought to be, not a Creed but a devotion to a person. Thirdly, you say that the best thing about Creeds is that they gradually change their meaning; a thought much too precious to be commented on until we get to it.

Your two first and chief points are that Anglo-Catholicism was Romantic; and that Christianity ought to be devotion to a person. Now if there is one idea in the world which I think might fairly be called Romantic and nothing else, it is the idea of being devoted to a person, quite apart from what he is or he means or he tells you to believe. But the moment you introduce what he is or he means or tells you to believe, you introduce a Creed; something that can be stated in clear philosophical terms. I will take the most obvious of the hundred opportunities you give me of testing your case. You say that the Christian must be devoted to a person, but free apparently in all matters touching belief. I will ask you a simple question, and I will specially ask you to answer it. Does the freedom of belief include freedom to doubt the historical existence of the person? Is the True Christian (a very different person from the Christian) free to doubt that Christ ever lived? If he is not free to dispute this fair point, of what value is his freedom? If he is free to deny it, to what sort of Person is he devoted?

Surely the whole point is almost tiresomely plain. You may be devoted to your mother; but that very devotion implies certain assertions about your mother, which are a Creed. It implies (1) that she exists; (2) that she is, in reality, your mother; (3) that your admiration for her is for her motherly qualities, not at least for her unmotherly ones, for feeding you, not for poisoning you; (4) that your devotion to her must take certain definite forms, the optimistic form of helping her to life with money, not the pessimistic form of helping her to death with a hatchet. All these things are implied in devotion to a person; and if Christianity had been founded on devotion to an old apple woman, it would still have produced a Creed, because it is a necessity of human thought. Suppose I started at this moment, inspired by your advice, to be devoted to the Person. I should want, out of my mere devotion, to know certain things about Him; notably whether He now exists. Could you answer that last question without beginning to make a Creed?

Lastly, I have looked at your last statement, that Creeds are valuable because they can change their meaning, and I give it up in despair. I cannot imagine what can be the fun of having a set of words which means one thing at one time and one thing at another. If you have a new meaning, why not get a new set of words? It would save a great deal of confusion. Suppose I say on Sunday (as I do), "I like beer." Suppose on Monday that means "Land's End is in Cornwall," and on Tuesday, "Napoleon was a Corsican," and on Wednesday, "twenty shillings make a pound," and on Thursday, "God is truth"; I really cannot see the pleasure or profit of the process. The Christian Creeds may have been right or wrong; but they were set down in black and white simply in order to clear the human intellect. It has been reserved for you to propose that they should be used solely in order to cloud and confuse it.—Yours, &c.,

G. K. CHESTERTON.

December 4th, 1907.

[Mr. Chesterton asks us a great many questions—we will retort by asking him another. Is he a member of the Roman Catholic Church? If he is, his argument is intelligible; if not, it is merely an attack on Protestantism by a disputant deprived of the right of appeal to the authority that can alone establish and maintain the set of dogmatic, invariable formulæ which is his idea of the Christian religion. In practice, indeed, Mr. Chesterton is more obscurantist even than the most distinguished professors of the Church to which he does or does not belong. The belief that humanity continually plays on the personality and the ideas of Christ, and extracts fresh light from them, is held by all but the scholastic theologians. Has Mr. Chesterton ever heard of Newman?—ED., THE NATION.]

"THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I had not attempted to reply to Mr. Newbould's criticisms: firstly because there would appear to be in our knowledge no common ground of meeting, partly because those criticisms are strictly (to the main point at issue) irrelevant. But perhaps a word of explanation may be a courtesy demanded towards so staunch a champion of Eastern Liberation. We have no common ground of meeting because he has visited Greece ten years ago and I have visited Macedonia to-day. If I were limited to his first-hand information I have no doubt that I should think as he thinks. If he had taken the tour from which I have just returned, I am entirely convinced that, with his fair and unprejudiced mind, he would have come back with the same reading of the situation as my own. It is not indeed mine, but the unanimous opinion of every British official, every gendarmierie officer of whatever nationality (including those who had been branded as Phil-Hellenes) and every disinterested and impartial resident with whom I conversed. In face of such evidence, fragments of disjointed invective announcing that "the Bulgarians have not the quality of a ruling race" (unlike, we are to suppose, the Greeks) or that their history is in the main one of executions and assassinations sound a little absurd.

And it is irrelevant, because it is entirely disconnected from my main contention. I declared that Greek bands recruited in Athens, aliens to the country, were devastating Central Macedonia, and murdering men, women, and children. I talked in the prisons with Greeks from Crete, from America, from the University of Athens, who had been captured on this chivalrous enterprise. They are not killing rival Bands: that would be intelligible at least: they are killing the unarmed population of the villages. I asked, as I still ask, for some active policy of suppression, to render human life tolerable to the unfortunate peasants who are the victims. Mr. Newbould appears to object to this suppression, because (in his view) Macedonia is rightly Greek, and because the Bulgarians began it first. If Macedonia is rightly Greek, it would seem to be all the more deplorable that the Greeks should devastate their own land, substituting the crime of suicide for that of murder. And if the Bulgarians began it first, is that any good reason why to-day we should tolerate the continuance of outrage and devastation, except on the monstrous theory that equality of suffering should be inflicted upon all?

Macedonia is not going to be divided between Greeks and Bulgarians. Even if such division were to be possible, its boundaries would not be decided by strangers like ourselves from England, nor by Odysseus and the Blue Books. But the most we can hope for at the present is European Executive Control, or an autonomous State. No one (in England at least) desires any other solution but that of "the wishes and aspirations of the people themselves." Those "wishes and aspirations" to-day embrace nothing so fervently as protection from alien marauders and Turkish misrule.—Yours, &c., CHARLES F. G. MASTERMAN.

December 4th, 1907.

THE WEST HULL ELECTION AND ELECTORAL REFORM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The West Hull election has emphasised the fact that the next General Election will be contested by at least three organised parties, and, as the issues to be decided are of far-reaching importance, it is imperative that the result of the polls shall not be left to the chance working of present defective electoral methods.

Two reforms have been suggested—the second ballot and proportional representation. Each of these suggestions has been tested by experience, and, whilst the second ballot is falling into disfavour in those countries in which it is in use, proportional representation has given satisfaction to all parties, and its story is one of steady and increasing progress.

The object of our electoral system is to return a House of Commons which shall be representative of the national will, but the results of the Austrian and German General Elections demonstrated unmistakably that the second ballot only emphasises the defects inherent in a system of single member constituencies. In Germany the Social Democrats, who won a third of the votes, obtained one-ninth of the seats; in Austria the Christian Socialists polled half as many votes as the Social Democrats, and yet obtained more seats than the latter.

In the Report, issued this year to the Chamber of Deputies by the Commission du Suffrage Universel, it is stated that "the abolition of the second ballots, with the bargainings to which they give rise, will not be the least of the advantages of the new system (proportional representation)." M. Yves Guyot states that "the second ballot results in detestable bargainings, which obliterate all political sense in the electors. It fosters in the Chamber of Deputies incoherence, both in policy and vote, the greater part of the deputies being pre-occupied in giving satisfaction, both to the electors they represent truly, and to the minorities which have been indispensable to their success, but which have only accepted them as their representatives for want of better." The Report presented to the Belgian Senate in 1899, relative to the Government's proposals for proportional representation, condemned in unmitigated terms the working of the second ballot, and it was in large measure due to this unanimous condemnation by all parties that the second ballot was abandoned for a more rational electoral system.

Contrast this record of failure with the astonishing tale of progress of proportional representation made during the present year. The first elections under the new proportional representation laws took place early in the year, both in Finland and Wurtemberg, and were in each case attended with complete success. The Swedish Parliament has passed Bills applying proportional representation to all parliamentary and municipal elections. A new electoral Bill applying proportional representation throughout the Colony, which is, for the purpose, to be divided into five districts, has passed through both Houses of the Tasmanian Legislature, whilst the Canton of Schwyz has extended the application of the proportional principle already in force.

These are accomplished facts, but the new proposals are no less striking. In accordance with the recommendations of a constitutional commission, the Dutch Government has introduced a Bill to amend the fundamental law so as to render possible the adoption of proportional representation, whilst the Danish Government has embodied the reform in a new municipal elections Bill. The Report by the Commission du Suffrage Universel in favour of proportional representation marks a notable advance in the French movement and an important deputation was recently appointed to wait upon M. Clemenceau to urge early legislation. Moreover, a committee of the Paris Municipal Council has issued a report in favour of its introduction into the municipal elections; the People's Power League has formulated an amendment to the Constitution of the State of Oregon providing for proportional representation in all legislative and municipal elections and, indeed, the demand for a true electoral method is increasing in all democratic countries.

This steady growth of proportional representation is due to the fact that it is based on the simple principle that parties should be represented in proportion to their strength. The second ballot, on the other hand, fails to give satisfaction because it does not yield a representative chamber which is a true expression of the national will.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN H. HUMPHREYS,

Hon. Sec., The Proportional Representation Society.
107, Algernon Road, Lewisham, London, S.E.
December 4th, 1907.

"WHO ARE MEMBERS OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND?"

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I quoted in your columns the case in which the House of Lords decided that Nonconformists are not members of the Church of England. I do not think that "J.F.W." knows more law than Lord Selborne, and if he did, the decision of the Final Court of Appeal would still remain the law of the land. Until an Act is passed in a sense contrary to that decision a large part of the arguments which have appeared in this correspondence and do duty in Liberationist speeches have less than the value of the Ptolemaic astronomy. That astronomy was at least based upon a study of the relevant facts.

Lord Selborne's censor not only ignores the decision of the Law Courts on the point which he discusses, he has fallen into several other inaccuracies which are worth noting: (1) He asserts that only Jews and Romanists are debarred from the office of warden. On the contrary in new parishes the wardens must be "members of the Church of England." (2) He asserts that the vestry can vote "on questions of vital importance to the Church." On the contrary they can only elect a warden who cannot act apart from the warden appointed by the vicar in the exercise of his few and very secular legal rights. (3) Parliament is not a "statutable body," neither is the vestry. The latter is as old as English history. (4) I think that "J.F.W." will find that Lord Selborne relies not so much upon the Acts which he quotes as upon Baker v. Lee. But here "J.F.W." surrenders his case. He says that these Acts which make membership of the Church of England the condition of a legal right "go no further than to require an additional test." But if they go so far as this, there is such a thing in law as membership of the Church of England. The phrase "Member of the Church of England" connotes more than citizenship and denotes less than the whole body of citizens. Like the Wesleyans, churchmen are a section of the community.

England is not a church state and the Church of England is not a State church.

One of your correspondents enquired when the legal narrowing of the Church took place. It took place at the moment when the relations of the State to the Church were more profoundly modified than at any moment since the conversion of Constantine. The Toleration Act was pregnant with vast consequences and revolutionised the status not only of Nonconformity but of Anglicanism. According to an important judgment of Lord Mansfield (Chamberlain of London v. Allen Edwards) it "established the Dissenters' way of worship," a result which was foreseen by Parliament in 1663, when it petitioned Charles II. against the principle of toleration on the ground that it involved "the establishment of schism." According to Lord Selborne, Nonconformists have since that date not been members of the Church of England. This result, so far as I can discover, first appeared on the Statute book in an early Factory Act (42 George III., c. 73). Nonconformists would not have received their denominational rights if reasonable Churchmen had not supported their claim. Reasonable Nonconformists are under a moral obligation to see that their rights do not become our wrongs. They cannot have it both ways. When they became by law "established," their moral right to intervene in the affairs of the Church of England disappeared.

But I must return to the subject of this correspondence. Church reformers agree with "J.F.W." in regarding Church law as largely out of date. They hold that the responsibilities which the law vests in a small class, the clergy, should be shared by a large class, the laity of the Church. My point is that the law is not too wide but too narrow. We would extend, not reduce, the area of enfranchisement. "J.F.W." suggests that "disestablishment," by which he means disendowment, should be the "price." Personally, I regard the suggestion as blackmail and immoral. If our endowments are not rightly ours, let them be taken away from us. But, in the meantime, we have a moral right to use them to the best advantage and to make the Church more efficient for her work in behalf of the common cause.—Yours, &c.,

H. J. BARDSLEY.

Barton St. Lawrence, Preston,
December 2nd, 1907.

THE CRITICS AND "WASTE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The writer of your article on Mr. Granville Barker's "Waste" is much astonished "that the body of English dramatic critics should think such a work fitted for the destroying hand of Mr. Redford." I think "M" has not understood the position at all. What most of the dramatic critics feel, if I may make a deduction from my own attitude, is that while a dramatic censor is in existence he cannot be expected to license such a play as Mr. Granville Barker's "Waste." To my mind the seduction scene is the most suggestive thing of its kind that has ever been put on the stage. I must refer you to "Sappho" or "Le Marquis de Priola" for anything that can be compared with it. On an audience not accustomed to peer at passion with detached eyes such a scene could not but have an inflammatory effect.

The question of shirking maternity is one of grave import to the modern world and is, therefore, a matter which cannot be kept out of modern vital drama. At the same time it is not a question which should be discussed before an audience of mixed intellectual attainments, and the Censor justified his office in this respect. He is apparently not hidebound in his desire to preserve the conventions, for in "Votes for Women" he passed a reference to the same kind of thing. Moreover, Mr. Barker has dwelt on the matter ad nauseam. The humorous side of the matter is that although "M." has rejected the indecency of "Waste," he has given Mr. Barker an object-lesson in how such subjects may be treated without indecency. After all, one has instincts, and for myself I must confess that Mr. Barker's discussions gave me a most uncomfortable half-an-hour in the Imperial Theatre.

Moreover, the author of "Waste," who has been publicly informed by a friend that he has written "a great play," has dragged in his seduction scene and his illegal operation. His play is bad art because it does not hold together and its psychology is weak. In the first place, the seduction scene is quite unnecessary. It need not have taken place on the stage at all, for the drama does not begin until three months afterwards. A great dramatist, such as Ibsen, would have understood that a realistic prologue of that kind upsets the drama from its centre. In the second place, the illegal operation has no real bearing on the drama. For the best part of a very long act—by far the best in the play—it looks as if Trebell's career will be wrecked by a scandal. That would be waste, if Trebell had been drawn as a man from whom good work might be expected. In the end the Cabinet-committee patch up the scandal with the help of the husband. The real catastrophe to Trebell is brought about by himself. Lord Horsham's colleagues find it impossible to work with him, on consideration. This has nothing to do with the averted scandal, but seems to have been brought about chiefly by an important member of the possible Cabinet sending a curt refusal of financial help for Trebell's scheme.

Mr. Barker seems to have modified his original conception. At one time he probably meant to waste his hero through a scandal, the result, as "M." puts it, of "one minute" of passion. This seemed rather obvious, I have no doubt, and so, in the last act, we have the development of a psychological "motif" already expressed. Trebell's mind is unhinged, because his inner nature, over which logic has no control, rebels against the loss of his unborn child. "M." feels some doubt of Mr. Barker's entire success on this point of psychology. I have no doubt at all: it is a complete failure. Men don't feel like that about their children when they hate the mother, as Trebell has come to hate and despise Mrs. O'Connell. Trebell looks back on the intrigue as he would on a fit of drunkenness. The existence of the child would have been the heaviest retribution.

How can "Waste," with its faltering psychology, and bad dramatic construction in the higher and unmechanical sense, be "one of the half-dozen dramas, which during the last dozen years, it has been worth the while of serious men and women to go and see?" Is it because Trebell's character is finely drawn? He is a mere wind-bag egoist, with no real strength of will or character, and is absolutely inconsistent. If the cold-blooded, deliberate scoundrel of the seduction scene is the real Trebell, then the logical idealist of the political part of the play is not the same man, or is merely a poseur. If it be true that he would shoot himself because he had lost a child of a woman he hates, Trebell must be suffering from some subtle hysterical mania, and would be the last man to lead a political forlorn hope. If he shoots himself partly because Lord Horsham has refused to include him in the Conservative Cabinet, then he is both a political and a human weakling. Where is the waste in the death of such a man?

Is the play great because of its political ideas? "M." does not seem to think so; but, perhaps, Mr. Archer does. I am a political tyro, but really I cannot seriously be interested in a man who has so little grasp of the reality of religious feeling in this country that he proposes, gaily and flippantly, to convert the Church into a new educational machinery, and when asked what he means to do about the teaching of religious dogma solves the whole difficult question with the flippant admission that "a little dogma is a good thing." I am afraid Trebell's politics are no more real than his character.

Is "Waste" great because of its deep sayings and witty epigrams? I admit that it is extremely clever, but at the expense of dramatic truth, and if Mr. Barker has shot several arrows of strength and swiftness he has also let fly from his bow-string a number which drift aimlessly here and there on the wind of rhetoric.

Finally, all who know Mr. Barker and are sure that he has more than a facile talent should not conspire to make him think he has written a great play. The only promising points in "Waste" are the conduct of the Committee meeting, nearly as admirable in its way as the family council in "The Voysey Inheritance," and the real, deep human touch of the rebellion of Trebell's sister against her loveless life and her waste as the handmaiden of her brother's egotism.—Yours, &c.,

E. A. BAUGHAN.

London, December 2nd, 1907.

ALLITERATION'S ARTFUL AID.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In his notes on my book, "A Bachelor Girl in Burma," your reviewer says: "there is no reason for her [my] being a bachelor, beyond the fact that with Burma the word makes a halting alliteration."

This is a very interesting suggestion. In these days of the overplus of women, and the difficulty of getting a whole man to oneself (vide Mr. Bernard Shaw) any additional "reason" for a state of singleness must be accepted with gratitude. In future, when I am asked why I am not married, I can always reply, "because bachelor and Burma begin with a 'B'!"—Yours, &c.,

G. E. MITTON.

Lyceum Club, 128, Piccadilly, W.,
December 3rd, 1907.

"WILLIAM ALLINGHAM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Referring to your review of "William Allingham: A Diary," you give a stanza of "his delightful song of the fairies." The first four lines of this stanza, and certainly the best, are a direct plagiarism of the stanza quoted by Ruskin in his "Fors Clavigera," Vol. II., p. 189, and Mr. Allingham, in taking them, has altered them very much for the worse. I have never read the ballad of Hardikunti, and only know it from this reference to it, and quotation from it by Ruskin.—Yours, &c.,

Broompark, Duffield, Derby.

H. M. GRAY.

December 2nd, 1907.

METAPHOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The American Press still holds its own for the manufacture of striking and vigorous phrases. A recent specimen may interest some of your readers. The writer of an article on the question of prohibition, pointing out the close connection between crime and drink among the negroes, describes the whisky sold in a certain district as "the sort of stuff that would make a rabbit spit in the face of a bull-dog." This calls up a picture of reckless audacity which it would be hard to beat.—Yours, &c.,

IRISH-AMERICAN.

London, Dec. 4th, 1907.

"TROUBLE AMONG THE TROUT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to a very able article in your issue of November 30th, headed "Trouble Among the Trout," and commenting on an article of mine which appeared in the "Scotsman" a short time ago, I should like to be allowed to make one or two points clear which might otherwise be wrongly construed:—

Your correspondent says: "The old trout, though good fighters, are not good fathers. Their progeny, besides being female in excessive proportion, tend to be weaklings." I had no intention of implying that aged male trout produce an excessive number of female progeny. I do not know that that is the case, but it has been ascertained beyond all doubt that they do not produce such healthy offspring as younger fish—up to, say, six years of age.

Large, well-nourished female trout, whose eggs are fertilised by a male in prime condition do undoubtedly produce a larger percentage of female offspring than male. This was very noticeable in the case of large Irish trout running up to 12 lb. in weight. On the other hand, in our mountain burns, where the trout run small—about eight to the pound—there is a very much larger percentage of males than females. These trout are badly nourished, owing to the barren nature of the water in most mountain streams. Here, again, the geological formation has to be considered, as the conditions prevailing in a stream running through limestone are entirely different from those in a stream on the granite.

The statement that "Lake trout rise freely to the fly only when they are young or adolescent" is rather too sweeping, but it may safely be said that each year after lake trout have attained maturity, they are less inclined to rise to the fly. Fly fishing undoubtedly means the capture of precisely those fish which are of most value to the water and scarcely touches those which are past their prime and are useless as breeders, and owing to their more fully developed cannibal tendencies have become a menace to small fish. Worm fishing, inasmuch as it means the capture of ancient pirates, lurking in holes and under tree roots, is beneficial to any water, but I should hesitate to advocate the indiscriminate use of bait in preserved waters. It is rather a matter for those who have the care of the fish. The haunts of the old cannibal fish are well known to a good keeper, and when one is removed it will not be long before his empty abode has another tenant.—Yours, &c.,

WILSON H. ARMISTEAD.

The Scaur, Dalbeattie.

LORD ROBERTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—You do Lord Roberts an injustice when you say in your "Diary of the Week" that "Lord Roberts chose to hold him (i.e., General Colville) responsible for the surprise at Sanna's Post." Lord Roberts did nothing so absurd, and neither he nor anyone else has ever suggested that General Colville had anything whatever to do with the "surprise" of General Broadwood's force. General Colville was condemned, rightly or wrongly, for his action (or inaction) after the Boers had won their victory by means of the surprise.—Yours, &c.,

IAN MACALISTER.

Royal Societies Club,

St. James's Street, S.W.,

November 30th, 1907.

["Consequences of the surprise" would have been more accurate.—ED., THE NATION.]

MR. GALSWORTHY AND WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I make a criticism on a criticism à propos of Mr. Galsworthy's article, "The Mother"?

The drunken labourer's question to his sainted wife is, "What have you done to deserve a vote?" Now, considering that the drunken labourer possesses a vote and that his way of putting the question implies that possession means desert, we may safely assume that Mr. Galsworthy, with his consummate knowledge of a certain portion of mankind, has more than once heard that question asked, with delusive self-complacency, by those who have themselves done nothing to deserve a vote, but everything to forfeit it.

The sainted wife's reply, that she had brought six sons into the world, should form some claim of merit, if we are to accept the great Napoleon's view. When asked by Mme. de Stael whom he considered the greatest woman in France, he curtly replied, "Madame, the one who has given the most sons to the nation." I do not regard this as an argument; for those sons might be perfectly worthless, or even mischievous members of society. I merely wish to call attention to the misconception in the mind of your correspondent, who, without any foundation for such an assertion, supposes Mr. Galsworthy to argue that because the husband is a drunkard therefore the wife has a right to a vote.

In the name of Justice and Expediency we demand "Votes for Women."—Yours, &c.,

EMILY TOMLINSON,

M.B., Lond., C.S. Girton Coll.

December 4th, 1907.

Reviews.

THE PARADISE OF THE FATHERS.*

THIS book is a translation of a manuscript in the possession of the Chaldean Patriarch at Mōsul, containing five separate works on the history of early Eastern monasticism, the longest being the Paradisus, or Garden, of the Fathers of the Desert, who flourished between 250 and 400, compiled by Palladius, Bishop of Helenopolis about the year 420. The collection is of exceptional interest and importance; and historical students are indebted to Mr. Wallis Budge for making public a translation which was printed for private circulation in 1904. The Paradisus—the authenticity of which has been doubted, but on insufficient grounds—is the great storehouse from which the history and sayings of the “anchorites, recluses, monks, cœnobites, and ascetic fathers of the deserts of Egypt” current in religious literature are taken. Historical, if by historical be meant a record of events, it is not; but a witness, and a true witness, to the mind of the time it emphatically is. If we want to know how Paul, Antony, and the rest thought, here is the record of their thinking: it is as if a phonograph had preserved the spoken word.

Palladius (364-430), a friend of St. John Chrysostom, shared that great man's Origenistic tendencies. He was, as we should now put it, something of a Modernist. Tolerant, observing, critical, his leaning to asceticism was moderated by common sense and sound judgment. He was no respecter of persons; so great a figure as that of Jerome fares indifferently at his hands. This Doctor of the Church, he tells us, possessed “the vices of envy and evil-eyedness” to such an extent that none of the holy men would live in his neighbourhood: his account of the monasticism of his time, by which he was influenced, and with which he was in substantial sympathy, is discriminating and sincere.

In the East asceticism is endemic. The poverty of the nomadic population of Upper Egypt was not far removed from that of the monks and hermits, who, from an early time, had lived side by side with them; Christianity changed rather the spirit than the outward form of what was in those regions a traditional life. Pachomius is said to have been originally a monk of Serapis: in Christian, as in pre-Christian days, we have monks who went unwashed and even naked, who ate grass, and led as nearly as possible the existence of brutes. “His soul was diminished to such an extent that he could not bear the smell of men,” we read of one; and of another, “when it was evening I saw a number of beasts which are called buffaloes, and the servant of God was in their midst, naked, and his hair had been made a covering for his shame.”

The solitaries rivalled one another in feats of endurance. Macarius could not endure that another should go beyond him in these matters. Hearing that the monks of Tabenna ate no cooked food during Lent, he refrained from such food for seven years; being told that a certain hermit restricted himself to a pound of bread a day, he reduced his own portion to four ounces. Once he allowed himself to crush a gnat that had bitten him. The act made him despise himself: he went, accordingly, into the inner desert, and there sat naked for six months:—

“For there were many great gnats there, and they were so savage that they could pierce the skin of pigs, and they resembled wasps. And his body was so eaten and swollen that a man would have thought that he had the hide of an elephant. And when he came back to his cell they could only recognise by his voice that he was Macarius.”

Melania, called the Great, rebuked Jovinian for washing his hands and feet after a journey in the dust and heat of an Egyptian summer:—

“Dost thou not perceive the injurious effects that will be produced in thee by this washing? Believe me, for I am this day a woman sixty years old, from the time when I first took upon myself this garb, water hath never touched more of my body than the tips of my fingers, and I have never washed my feet, or my face, or any one of my members. And although I have fallen into many sicknesses, and have been urged by the physicians, I have never consented nor submitted myself to the habit of applying water to any part of my body.”

* “The Paradise of the Fathers.” Translated out of the Syriac with Notes and Introduction by Ernest A. Wallis Budge, M.A., Litt.D. Chatto & Windus. 2 vols. 15s.

But there was another side. The movement was not merely pathological. The goodness and sound sense inherent in human nature were unmistakable in it; Christianity moulded and refined the matter which had taken shape under the influence of race tendencies and popular paganism. “Unless a man say in his heart, ‘only God and myself exist in this world,’ he will not find rest,” said Abbâ Alônīs. “Moderate use of wine is better than immoderate water drinking,” was a current maxim: the virtue of temperance was not without, but within. The rule of Pachomius permitted the monks to eat when and, with certain restrictions, what they pleased. And there was “a more excellent way.” “If thou holdest thyself in thine own eyes to be of no account, thou mayest dwell where thou pleasest, and find rest.” “I eat only bread and salt,” exclaimed a brother, when meat was offered him at the common meal. An elder rebuked him, “It were better to eat flesh than to proclaim thy abstinence aloud.” The solitary life was not for all. “Certain of the fathers used to say, ‘God bringeth not young men to monasteries, but Satan,’” Censoriousness, the besetting sin of the godly, was checked rigorously: “It is better for a man to put himself to death than his neighbour, and he should not condemn him in anything.” And where is the “Wesen des Christentums” more manifest than in such a saying as this?—

“An old man was asked by one who toiled, ‘Is the repentance of sinners accepted by God?’ And he said, ‘Tell me, O my beloved one; if thy cloak were to be torn in rags, wouldst thou throw it away?’ And he answered, ‘No, but I would sew up the rents, and then I could use it again.’ And the old man said unto him, ‘If thou wouldst show pity upon thy garment which hath no feeling, shall not God show pity on that which He hath fashioned, and which is His work?’”

The theology, conscious or unconscious, of these ascetics was of a type which it would be difficult to parallel in later times. The Augustinian doctrines of predestination and grace, which underlie modern Christianity, Protestant and Catholic, were unfamiliar to them: they knew little or nothing of original sin, and regarded actual transgressions with a leniency which was foreign to the standards of their, as of our, age. The monastic movement seems originally to have lain alongside ecclesiasticism without much vital contact. Those of the hermits who lived in common met for the Divine mysteries only on Saturday and Sunday. Some attended public worship but once in three or four months. One priest sufficed for the needs of several thousand solitaries; Macarius lived thirty-two miles from a church. Sacerdotalism, the sacramental system, the whole temper and religious observance which we associate with Catholicism were absent: the lines on which their life moved were moral rather than directly religious. In so far as they carried on a tradition, it was that of the Apologists of the second century rather than that of Ignatius and Irenæus; a certain dryness makes itself felt. In dogma, as such, they took little interest. They became a force in the theologico-political controversies of the age; but they were a material force only, used by politicians, ecclesiastical or secular, as pawns in the game. The assimilative power of the Church comes out strikingly in the history of the movement. The leaders of the official hierarchy, an Athanasius, a Chrysostom, threw themselves into it: it was organised, administered, sterilised; stragglers were discouraged or brought into line. By the middle of the fifth century the great monastic establishments had their staff of priests; monks occupied the first episcopal sees. Monasticism, which had threatened the unity of the Christian body, had itself become an integral part of its content; the regular clergy had their place beside the secular, and the rivalry between the two had become, as it remains to-day, the key to much of the history of Christianity and of the Church.

A FRIEND OF RUSKIN.*

“THE best and truest friend of all my life; best for me, because he was of my father's race and native town; truest, because he knew always how to help us both, and never

* Letters of Dr. John Brown, with letters from Ruskin, Thackeray, and others, edited by his son and D. W. Forrest, D.D., with biographical introductions by Elizabeth T. M'Laren. Black. 10s. 6d. net.

DAVID NUTT,

57-59, Long Acre, London.

NEW NOVELS.A SOUL FROM THE PIT. By WALTER GALLICHAN. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6s.ATHENÆUM: "Told with much realistic skill. . . . Gaynor Hughes is depicted with much insight and sympathy."THE READER: "Vividly realistic and strictly true to certain phases of life in latter-day London."COUNTRY LIFE: "A beautiful story. . . . The author is obviously a keen observer and writes about what he knows. . . . There is some very clever character-drawing in the book, and Clara Holder, the journalist, is a particularly able study."A BRUMMAGEM BUTTON. By EMILY FINNEMORE, author of "The Marrying of Sarah Garland," "A Man's Mirror," "A King of Shreds and Patches," &c. Crown 8vo. 6s.

* * A West-Country Idyll—a most suitable present for those possessed of any sympathy with children and their development into manhood and womanhood.

NEW GIFT AND CHILDREN'S BOOKS."Here we have the artist at his very best!"
—The Queen."Be sure to get it for your bairns!"
—The Christian World."Combines to an unusual degree instruction with amusement!"—The Tribune.GOOD QUEEN BESS. By JOHN HASSALL. Twenty-three plates in colours. 5s."A rich mine of romance."—The Scotsman.THE YOUNG NORSEMAN. By W. B. RANDS. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.* * "A capital Christmas book for boys, and cleverly illustrated."—Scotsman.THE ENCHANTED DOLL. A reprint of MARK LEMON'S classic Fairy tale. Finely printed on art paper. With new Illustrations in Colour by May Gladwin. Small 4to, in a Pictorial Cover, 1s. net.*The following will make excellent substitutes for Christmas Cards:—PEARL: A NEW METRICAL RENDERING. By G. G. COULTON. Square 16mo. White buckram. 1s. net (1s. 1d. post free).

* * "Pearl" is not only one of the masterpieces of English mediæval literature, but in its way one of the most beautiful and affecting poems in the whole range of English letters.

QUEIROZ (Ega de) The SWEET MIRACLE. Translated from the Portuguese by EDGAR PRESTAGE. Square 18mo. 1904. With photogravure frontispiece from a drawing by the King of Portugal. 1s. net.FROM MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST.*TWO BEAUTIFUL COLOUR BOOKS.
BELOW THE CATARACTS.

By WALTER TYNDALE.

With 60 Water-Colour Drawings by the Author.

Demy 8vo, 16s. net.*

"At once a guide, a history, and a brilliant pictorial record."—Pall Mall Gazette.CATHEDRAL CITIES OF FRANCE.By HERBERT MARSHALL, R.W.S., and HESTER MARSHALL.

With 60 Water-Colour Drawings by HERBERT MARSHALL, R.W.S.

1 vol. demy 8vo, 16s. net.*

"The most pleasing of gift books."—Guardian.TWO NOTABLE BIOGRAPHIES.SARAH BERNHARDT.With many Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White, 1 vol. demy 8vo, 15s. net."Sarah Bernhardt all over."—Times.THE COMTESSE DE BOIGNE.

VOL. II. (1815-1819).

Is even more fascinating than vol. I., 10s. net.*

FATHER AND SON.

With Frontispiece, 1 vol., 8s. 6d. net.

"Singular, significant, and most fascinating."—Daily Telegraph.FROM THE HILLS OF DREAM.

THRENODIES, SONGS, AND LATER POEMS.

By FIONA MACLEOD. 1 vol., 6s. net.

FOR YOUNG AND OLD.*Mr. Rackham's New Pictures.ALICE IN WONDERLAND.

By LEWIS CARROLL.

Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by ARTHUR RACKHAM. 1 vol., 6s. net.*

"Simply wonderful."—Daily Chronicle.THE CHILDREN AND THE PICTURES.

By LADY TENNANT.

Illustrated from the famous Tennant Collection, 6s.

"Most fascinating: To an imaginative child it would be a treasure-house."—Outlook.THE PLAYMATE.

By CHARLES TURLEY.

Author of "Godfrey Marten." Illustrated by H. R. Millar, 5s.

"Will be popular at once with every boy and girl."—World.Six-Shilling Novels.Mr. Heinemann has pleasure in announcing that he will publish a New Novel by Mr. Somerset Maugham on Tuesday:—THE EXPLORER.

By W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM.

(Author of "The Merry-go-round," etc.)

THE SHUTTLE.

By MR. HODGSON BURNETT.

THE WEAVERS.

By Sir GILBERT PARKER.

THE ORCHARD THIEF.

By MR. HENRY DUDENEY.

SCARS.

By C. R. STONE.

* Prospectus Post Free.

LONDON: W. HEINEMANN, 21, BEDFORD ST., W.C.

made any mistakes in doing so." Such was Ruskin's character of the author of "Rab and his Friends." Dr. John Brown's admiration of Ruskin, if reciprocal, ran on other lines. "He is odd and wilful, and not to be gainsaid; but he is pure and good, and an amazing genius." It was foolish "to be very angry at that strange man," and, when he is to be corrected, it must be with "the wrong end of the tawse." In these letters the stranger can piece together the elements which made Brown a model of friendship. We find him first as assistant to a surgeon at Chatham, fearful of spending money, and eager to cling to literature. It is almost a disappointment to reflect that when he writes "I will find time for a little reading," he means only "I shall." It cost him eighteenpence to borrow "Count Robert of Paris." The cholera came, and Brown's zeal and skill made a deep impression on the young Charles Dickens. The training of that Secession Manse was bearing its fruit, and Brown's letters at this time will seem, according to the reader's bias, either apostolic or priggish in their virtue. On his return to Edinburgh, he soon rose to distinction, both in his profession, and in the pursuit of literature. His life was somewhat clouded by fits of depression, but he was eminently worthy of the affection which he inspired. It is as a picture of the man that his letters may deserve perusal. In his time the art of letter-writing was already in decay, and he was not the man to revive it. His editors might have been more severe in their excisions, for the letters are often sadly commonplace. We do not want to know that Brown hoped his son had not taken cold, hoped he would some day go up the Alps, which are so wonderfully grand and beautiful. We cannot complain that Brown had not, as Cowper had, the leisure and the skill to pen fascinating epistles all about nothing; but we may claim that the reader should have been spared the trouble of making his own selection. The editors have failed to perceive that a good many of these letters might have been written by any body.

Scattered throughout the letters are divers critical judgments, often rapid, and perhaps not often right. Brown's view of George Eliot anticipated some later critics, but, while it hits the less pleasing side of the novelist's powers, it hardly does justice to her extraordinary insight. After denouncing her "gratuitous nastiness," he adds that her "views of life, of God, of all that is deepest and truest in man, are low, miserable, hopeless, and she seems always wishing to drag her readers down to her dead level." This criticism is more true than his averment that Mrs. Poyser is "born of Dickens," for that vigorous dame was certainly drawn from life, and has none of the abstraction which reduces like characters in Dickens to mere traits. Brown told Sir Theodore Martin that Matthew Arnold's "Ode on Stanley" was "pretentious, thin, and heartless," his sole reason, it would seem, being that a man standing at his friend's grave would not use such words as "cecily" and "externe." In fact, no word but the latter would exactly express what Arnold rightly wished to say, and Brown being unacquainted with Hooker, failed to see the line of meditation which led to the use of the former. Brown's epithets are sadly astray if applied to such lines as:—

"In some chance battle on Cithaeron side
The nursling of the Mighty Mother died
And went where all his fathers went before."

On the other hand, Brown says admirably of Byron, that "when he is a poet—which very often he is not, though always eloquent—he is the poet of passion, of the heart tumult; but he would have been a greater poet had he had the deep feeling, the quiet, steady, human-heartedness of Wordsworth." Here Brown shows none of that lack of the sense of proportion, which sometimes sounds oddly in other matters than literature. The Doctor must refuse an invitation to Lady Minto's, because he cannot leave the sick Lord Barcaple, whose death "would be the greatest loss to the Scotch Bench, and through that to the nation, that could at present be." Doubtless the Bar will approve that leech's point of view. The lack of proportion is a fault which Brown is ready enough to condemn in others. Thus he calls Colenso "a conceited, silly writer, unable to see the proportions of truths, or even to know truth when he sees it, unless it be the barest numerical truth." At the same time he was generous enough to see that Colenso did not deserve all the shafts which the ecclesiastics discharged at him. When Dr. Peter Davidson attacked the Bishop's sincerity, Brown protested that this was not a matter on which the writer could fairly judge, and added, wisely enough, that you always gain by giving your opponent all that you honestly can. Colenso may not have been a wise writer, but he was the first of his cloth with the courage to claim what is now generally conceded.

Brown had a Scotsman's eye for a story, but does not tell many. Here is one:—

"A parish fool was crossing an upland moor, and was observed by a shepherd going and kneeling behind a fail-dyke. The shepherd crept up to the other side and heard Jock Gray howling out a desperate confession of his depravity, ending with, 'And, O Lord if ye were to gar this fail-dyke fa' this very moment and smoor me, it wad be nae mair than I deserve,'—upon which the shepherd sent it over upon him. He got up in a fury all over stour, and yelled out, 'A gey-like world this, whan a body canna say a thing in joke, but it's ta'en up in earnest.'"

CHEERFUL AND WHIMSICAL.*

THESE are not auspicious times for essayists. Circulation means money, the public is eager for novels, not for essays, and the writer of belles lettres must usually be content with the appreciation of the few, and the sale of hundreds, not of thousands. But the wise essayist first issues his meditations in journals, sends the honorarium cheque to his bankers, then amends and polishes the articles, and gathers them into a little book such as this—Mr. Lucas's latest—"Character and Comedy."

This slim volume, the reading of which will be a delight to all quiet souls, falls into two parts. The essays are the Lucasian subjective commentary on life—humorous, quietly sentimental, gently scornful, prankish and personal. The other section issues from the author's "Listeners Lure" spring, taking, as in that "oblique narrative," the form of a series of letters, under the general title of "Life's Little Difficulties." Those who followed the course of these skilful and witty flicks at the cuticle of Philistia in the pages of "Punch" will be glad to have them in a collected form. Here is sound satire in the polite form that the twentieth century approves. The reader is amused; the objects of the satire, even if they recognised themselves and their foibles, could hardly be annoyed. It is all very deft and neat, and one wishes that there were a Du Maurier alive to express in pictures Mr. Lucas's mental agility and satirical sensitiveness with the pen.

The essays vary in interest and in humour, but they are all the most readable kind of essay, i.e., the narration of the adventures of the author's, no, not his soul! his intelligence in the bye-ways of life. His themes are the lowly humanities: he prefers talking with a gardener, or watching a conjuror, to any "burning" subject discussed in leading articles. In Ghent he remembers

"with most vividness not its paintings or its churches, not its canals or its Hôtel de Ville, not its streets or its ruined castle, but Sister Lucie Vinken of the Convent of St. Joseph, in the Petit Beguinage Notre Dame."

We remember most vividly the essay in this book called "A Philosopher That Failed," a theme that exactly suits Mr. Lucas's temperament. He disinters from the past one Oliver Edwards, a contemporary of Dr. Johnson's, plays with the meeting between the two, and drops on the last page of the essay the single remark by which Edwards is known, on which his fame rests:—

"You are a philosopher, Dr. Johnson," said Edwards. "I have tried, too, in my time, to be a philosopher; but I don't know how; cheerfulness was always breaking in."

In reading the pages of "Character and Comedy" cheerfulness is always breaking in. That is something for an author to achieve. We tuck the little book on our shelf alongside the "Life and Works of Charles Lamb," and murmur: "Continue to be cheerful and whimsical, friend, and interested in the things that the big bow-wows ignore."

* "Character and Comedy." By E. V. Lucas. Methuen, 5s.

Christmas Gift Books.

I.
HUBERT AND JOHN VAN EYCK: Their Life and Work. By W. H. JAMES WEALE. With upwards of 60 Illustrations. Quarto, 84s. net. The price will be raised to 105s. net on Jan. 1st. [Just out.]

II.
COKE OF NORFOLK AND HIS FRIENDS. The Life of Thomas William Coke, First Earl of Leicester of Holkham. By A. M. W. STIRLING. With 20 Photogravures and upwards of 40 other Illustrations reproduced from Contemporary Portraits, Prints, &c. Two vols., demy 8vo, 32s. net.

TIMES.—"Mr. Stirling has given us one of the most interesting memoirs of recent years."

III.
DEVONSHIRE CHARACTERS & STRANGE EVENTS. By S. BARING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Yorkshire Oddities," "Mehalah," "Tragedy of the Cæsars," &c. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 21s. net. [Just out.]

IV.
THE LOVE LETTERS OF GAMBETTA. Translated from the French of FRANCIS LAUR by V. M. MONTAGU. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"It is Gambetta pouring out his soul to Leonie Leon, the strange, passionate, masterful demagogue, who wielded the most persuasive oratory of modern times, acknowledging his idol, his inspiration, his Egeria."

V.
CHAMPIONS OF THE FLEET: Captains and Men-of-War in the Days that Helped to Make the Empire. By EDWARD FRASER. With 20 Illustrations. Crown, 8vo, 6s. OUTLOOK.—"The author excels in relating these stories of past days. The volume is even more fascinating than those which preceded it."

VI.
THE TRUE STORY OF BEAUTY AND THE BEAST: Translated from the French by ERNEST DOWSON. With Plates in Colour by CHARLES CONDOR. Crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.—"Lends itself with peculiar aptness to the art of Mr. Charles Condor. Those points, usually omitted in translation, of a fantastic and seductive gallantry, reflecting the refined frivolity of contemporary Court life, give the illustrator's brilliant revival of the note of Boucher and Fragonard a special fitness."

VII.
THE ENGLISH STAGE OF TO-DAY.

By Dr. MARIO BORSA. Translated from the Italian, and Edited, with Preface, by SELWYN BRINTON, M.A. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A picture of the London theatre of to-day unequalled in vividness, critical power, and completeness, in any other single volume of which we have any knowledge. One could quote scores of passages packed with interest and suggestion."

VIII.
NEW POEMS. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

TIMES.—"The old qualities are here with a finer feeling than before for the point where enough has been said. Mr. Phillips has mastered his materials, he can do almost as he pleases with words."

IX.
A NEW ILLUSTRATOR. POEMS OF COLERIDGE.

Edited with an Introduction by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE, and over 100 Illustrations by GERALD METCALFE. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

DAILY MAIL.—"These beautiful drawings. The artist seems to have got right inside the mind of the poet, and to have interpreted his visions in line and colour, for the drawings are full of colour, although they are in black ink on white paper, in the most wonderful way."

X.
FAIRIES I HAVE MET.

By Mrs. RUDOLPH STAWELL, with 8 Full-page Designs in Colour by EDMOND DULAC.

LITERARY WORLD.—"Mr. Dulac's really beautiful pictures in colour."

XI.
WILD NATURE IN PICTURES, RHYMES, and REASONS. A Series of Reproductions in colour of Original Drawings by Sir FRANCIS CARRUTHERS GOULD. Oblong 4to, 5s. WORLD.—"A remarkable picture book displaying a lavish share of 'F. C. G.'s' humour and skill."

THE SPANISH SERIES.

Edited by ALBERT F. CALVERT. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net each vol.

Toledo: An Historical and Descriptive Account of the "City of Generations." With 510 Illustrations. [Now Ready.]

Murillo. Illustrated by over 165 reproductions. [Now Ready.]

Seville. With 243 Illustrations. [Now Ready.]

Cordova. With 120 Illustrations. [Now Ready.]

The Prado. A Guide and Handbook to the Royal Picture Gallery of Madrid. Illustrated with 220 reproductions from photographs of Old Masters. [Now Ready.]

The Escorial. Illustrated with plans and 278 reproductions from Pictures and Photographs. [Now Ready.]

Spanish Arms and Armour. Illustrated with over 300 reproductions from Photographs. [Now Ready.]

Granada and the Alhambra. A Brief History of the Moslem Rule in Spain, together with a Particular Account of the Construction, the Architecture, and the Decoration of the Moorish Palace. With 460 Illustrations. [Now Ready.]

FORTHCOMING VOLUMES READY SHORTLY.

Velasquez.	El Greco.	Oviedo.	Leon.
Madrid.	Royal Palaces	Segovia, etc.	Burgos, and
Goya.	of Spain.	Avila, and	Salamanca.
Leon.	Valladolid.	Zaragoza.

JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, London and New York.

"A BRILLIANT HISTORICAL ESSAY."—Spectator.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

By PROFESSOR BOUSSET. With an Introduction. Second Impression, 5s.

The Spectator says:—"The name of Professor Bousset is familiar to all readers of Biblical criticism. All the critics quote him—from Professor Jülicher to Professor Sanday—to confirm or to refute. Like Professor Harnack, his books are well known in England, for he writes with a charm which the technicalities of his subject cannot impair. In 'What is Religion?' he draws a picture which even those who find fault with his method must admit to be grandly conceived."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

LETTERS OF EDWARD LEAR

(Author of "The Book of Nonsense")

To CHICHESTER FORTESCUE (Lord Carlingford) and FRANCES, COUNTESS WALDEGRAVE (1848 to 1864). Edited by Lady STRACHEY (of Sutton Court). Profusely Illustrated, 15s. net.

The Westminster Gazette says:—"Every page of the Letters is enthralling."

The Daily Telegraph says:—"These Letters are welcome, not only as providing heartily entertaining reading, but also as showing us what manner of man Lear was."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

THE PALACES OF CRETE AND THEIR BUILDERS.

By ANGELO MOSSO. Illustrated, 21s.

The Daily News says.—The illustrations are both numerous and excellently reproduced, and add greatly to the value of an already valuable book."

T. FISHER UNWIN.

Studies of the Eighteenth Century in ITALY. By VERNON LEE. New Edition, with a New Preface, a Photogravure Frontispiece, and 40 other Illustrations selected by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. Super-royal 8vo, half-bound, 21s. net.

Before and After Waterloo. By EDWARD STANLEY, sometime Bishop of Norwich. Edited by J. H. ADEANE and MAUD GRENFELL. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 14s. net.

A Literary History of the Arabs. By R. A. NICHOLSON, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Library of Literary History.]

A Literary History of France. By EMILE FAGUET. With Photogravure Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Library of Literary History.]

Bonaparte in Egypt and the Egyptians OF TO DAY. By HAJI A. BROWNE. With Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

The Matterhorn. By GUIDO REY. Illustrated by EDOARDO RUBINO. With a Preface by EDMONDO DE AMICIS. With 14 Coloured Plates, 23 Pen Drawings, and 11 Photographs, super-royal 8vo, 21s. net.

Fine-Paper Edition (limited to 15 copies). Price on application.

The Andes and the Amazon. Life and Travel in Peru. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With a Map and numerous Illustrations, medium 8vo, 21s.

The Brahmans, Theists, and Muslims of INDIA. By JOHN CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Litt., Author of "The Mystics, Ascetics, and Saints of India," "Indian Life: Religious and Social," &c. Illustrated, medium 8vo, 14s. net.

Mirabeau the Demi-God. Being the True and Romantic Story of his Life and Adventures. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE, Author of "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall," &c. Illustrated, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

MRS. EDITH WHARTON is generally recognised as the subtlest practitioner in the school of introspective analytic fiction, which, created and developed by Henry James and Howells, is the fine flower of the American intellect. Both in its psychological strength and in its artistic shortcomings "The Fruit of the Tree" is absolutely typical of the school's style and method.

The theme that Mrs. Wharton dissects for us with the nervous acumen of an expert operator is a study of the disharmony between husband and wife which arises so often from the woman's intentness on the personal issue clashing with the man's devotion to the claims of his life work. Amherst, the handsome, energetic and enthusiastic student of social reforms, an assistant manager of the Westmore mills, in Hanaford, meets his future wife when she is paying a flying visit to the property of her late husband, Mr. Westmore. Despite the strenuous opposition of her relatives and her social circle, Bessie Westmore falls in love with and marries Amherst, entering, apparently, into all his schemes for humanising the grim, mean, and ugly lives of the mill hands, which have been stunted remorselessly to build up the Westmore fortune. Amherst, in love with his wife's soft and gracious beauty and winning tenderness, is man enough to believe that his plans will be her plans, his aims her aims after marriage as before; but he is soon disillusioned. Bessie does not wish to be second in his thoughts, to be subsidiary to his main interest, the social and economic reforms at Westmore. She is a fluid and adaptable creature, living only for love and social pleasures, and, bored by "business," with no real interest or enthusiasm in his plans, she allows herself to be made a battle-ground between the two contending forces of her husband's aims and her relatives' management of her "money interests." For every dollar spent on industrial reforms means a dollar less for Bessie's luxurious ways of life. When Amherst discovers that his wife only theoretically sides with him, that he has no real hold on her except through her emotional craving, that she wants him to be one of her own idle and pleasure-loving set, at her country house, Lynbrook, he is alienated, drifts little by little away, and turns to hard practical work at Westmore, as his refuge and safety valve.

So far, indeed for the first half of the story, there is nothing specially remarkable in the matter or manner of "The Fruit of the Tree." We are conscious that the loose impressionistic style of telling is fundamentally associated with a lack of grip in the characterisation. The fluid indeterminateness of Bessie's and Amherst's characters, so characteristic of the psychological explorations of Mr. Henry James, though very convenient for the author's purpose of springing on us subtle dramatic surprises, is scarcely compensated for by the sharply etched minor figures, Mr. Langhope, the hard and clever father, Mr. Tredegar, the family lawyer, Mrs. Ansell, the observant woman of the world. The author lays herself open to the charge of drawing Bessie as the generic type of feminine irresponsibility and in consequence, and we often lose patience with Amherst's density and woodenness in contact with his wife. The art is often defective, and the interminable introspective method, rarely relieved by conversations, exhausts our patience. But in the last half of the novel Mrs. Wharton sinks a deep shaft into the obscure subterranean region of our human impulses.

Justine Brent, who has come into Amherst's life, first as a nurse in charge of a maimed mill-hand in the Hanaford Hospital, is an old school friend of Bessie's, and, later on, she accepts a post as her "companion" at Lynbrook. Everything about Justine is "quick and fine and subtle, and the muscles of character lay close to the surface of feeling." She is really the woman that Amherst should have married, and there is considerable subtlety shown us in this buried truth working up through the surface of their daily contact, till only the thin film of surviving moral ties and duties keeps the man from recognising what the unhappy wife, Bessie, has obscurely divined. Justine, to thwart the efforts of Bessie's "smart set" to entangle her, and arrange her divorce, writes to the absent Amherst, urging him to return and draw his wife nearer to him. But Amherst replies to Justine that, though he will not come back, he "has made no binding arrangement here, solely because you ask it." This fatal phrase, read by Bessie, renders unendurable all Justine's loving compassion and ardent sympathy. There is a fine scene between the women, in which Bessie's bitter mortification takes a feminine revenge on Justine's sweetness. She taunts her with this "tribute to her influence," and, in bitter defiance of her husband's postscript, "don't let my wife ride Impulse," the ill-tempered mare, Bessie dashes away for her last ill-fated ride, for she is brought back, three hours later, a huddled and writhing figure, with an injury to the spine.

Now come a hundred pages of brilliant analysis of a terrible position, which would do credit to the chief European masters of the realistic school. We have met scarcely anything in modern English fiction to equal the poignant and horribly true picture of the sufferings of the patient kept alive to serve the implacable scientific passion of the doctors, who prolong the infernal physical agonies of the shattered body for the triumph of keeping up the spark of useless life. Society, science, religion, in the persons of the relatives, the doctors, and the clergyman, all decree this fearful insensitiveness to the patient's cry, "I want to die," dumbly and hideously expressed in the eyes of the sufferer, when all expression by speech has failed her. "Horrible!" our readers may say, "such things should not be written of." On the contrary, these things have to be faced and understood in reality, and that is the justification of their treatment by art. If Mrs. Wharton's terribly suggestive yet restrained picture of the callousness of the human imagination face to face with human agony, should result only in ten readers out of ten thousand facing reality, instead of shutting their ears and eyes to human suffering, she will have reaped a rich reward. Wyant, the local doctor in charge, has a double motive for prolonging Bessie's agony and keeping up the flickering spark of life. He is in love with, and has been rejected by Justine a year before, on account of his habits of secret drug-taking. He wishes to rehabilitate himself in his profession, and by winning the encomiums of the great specialists in his struggle with death, to attain a position which will give him an opportunity of winning back the trust of the woman he loves. But Justine cannot face indefinitely the agonies of her friend. She seizes an opportunity given her, when Wyant's back is turned, to administer the wrong stimulant, and Bessie is at length at peace. Wyant guesses what she has done, but everybody else remains in ignorance, and Amherst, who is in South America, does not return till a week after his wife's death.

Now comes the justification of the title, "The Fruit of the Tree." Two years after Bessie's death, Amherst and Justine marry, but the woman conceals from the man the act prompted by pity. Woman's instinctive fear of the unexpected in man is subtly indicated. Justine's conscience is clear, and one feels the wisdom of her discretion. But when Wyant turns up later, a moral wreck, and blackmails Justine, she, unable to explain her previous silence to her husband, is too femininely apprehensive, and she prevents Wyant and Amherst meeting. When the truth has to come out, Justine finds that her reserve has clouded their relations. Her husband's mind is full of dim doubts. Mrs. Wharton's analytical skill here has a rich field for its exercise. One feels that her novel is truly a national product, in the sense that all these introspective Americans are saturated with a self mistrust. So the apprehension of guilt, the sense of moral expiation, finally work out in this story to Justine's sacrifice of her happiness.

* "The Fruit of the Tree." By Edith Wharton. Macmillan & Co. 6s.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTIONAL DEVELOPMENT.

Shown by Selected Speeches and Despatches, with Introductions and Explanatory Notes. By H. E. EGERTON, M.A., and W. L. Grant, M.A. With Maps, demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

QUAKER AND COURTIER.

Life and Work of William Penn, the Founder of Pennsylvania. By Mrs. COLQUHOUN GRANT. Illustrated. 10s. 6d. net.

WITH THE BORDER RUFFIANS.

Memories of the Far West, 1852-1868. By R. H. WILLIAMS. Edited by E. W. WILLIAMS. Illustrated. 12s. net.

THE IVORY GOD, AND OTHER STORIES.

J. S. Fletcher's New Book. 6s.

HIS OWN PEOPLE.

A New Novel by Booth Tarkington. 2s. 6d. net.

ANCESTORS.

Gertrude Atherton's New Novel. 6s.

"A book of considerable power . . . full, even sensationally so, of matter of absorbing interest."—Morning Post.

"'Ancestors,' with its keen insight into motive and character, and its subtle close analysis must be written down an excellent piece of work."—Pall Mall Gazette.

TOWARD THE DAWN.

Halliwell Sutcliffe's New Novel. 6s.

"Mr. Sutcliffe writes with the boldness of one who has looked life in the face and profited in knowledge. Certainly a book not to be missed."—Yorkshire Post.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & Co., Ltd.

"A DELIGHTFUL COMPILATION." ANOTHER BOOK OF VERSES FOR CHILDREN Mr. E. V. Lucas's New Volume for Children. Selected and Edited by E. V. LUCAS. With Coloured Frontispiece and Title page, besides numerous Black-and-White Illustrations, by FRANCIS D. BEDFORD. Large crown 8vo, cloth boards, gilt, 6s. Athenaeum.

A WONDER BOOK OF OLD ROMANCE.

By F. J. HARVEY DARTON. Illustrated by A. G. WALKER, Sculptor. Cloth boards, gilt top, 8½ by 5½, price 6s.

"A very beautiful book . . . deeply interesting to any intelligent child, and the beauty of the old romances will appeal strongly to any imaginative mind."—The World

A New and Original Book for Children by the Author of "Mrs. Green," &c.

OTHER-LAND. By EVELYNE E. RYND, Author of "Mrs. Green." With numerous Illustrations by DOROTHY FURNISS. Demy 8vo, printed on superfine paper, Fancy Art Linen Boards, 3s. 6d.

THE MERRY TALES OF THE WISE MEN OF GOTHAM.

By F. J. HARVEY DARTON. With Illustrations by GORDON BROWNE. Fancy cloth boards, gilt edges, 3s. 6d.

This new version of a most amusing jest book universally popular with our forefathers has been slightly expanded and entirely rewritten. Mr. Gordon Browne has thoroughly entered into the spirit of the jests, many of which have become proverbial. The Illustrations are printed in Colours in the best style.

TALES OF MIRTH AND MARVEL FROM THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. The new volume in DARTON'S 3s net FINE ART SERIES. Crown 8vo, art linen.

This is a selection from the best and most popular of the Ingoldsby Legends, and they are here most humorously illustrated by Gordon Browne.

Send to WELLS GARDNER, DARTON & CO., Ltd., 3, Paternoster-buildings, London, E.C., for their LARGE ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE, containing particulars of hundreds of copyright books for presents and prizes, also for the latest Catalogue (PRINTED IN COLOURS) of Darton's Fine Art Series, published at 6s.

Mr. Edward Arnold's New Books

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES.

A Great Work of Travel.

FROM THE NIGER TO THE NILE

By BOYD ALEXANDER, Lieutenant Rifle Brigade. 2 vols. demy 8vo, with Illustrations and Maps, 36s. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"An entrancing book of travel"

DAILY NEWS.—"An expedition which, it is hardly too much to say, is likely to be reckoned among the most important which have hitherto been made in Africa, and has afforded the material for a most interesting book."

MEXICO OF THE TWENTIETH CENTURY.

By PERCY F. MARTIN, F.R.G.S. 2 vols., demy 8vo, with Illustrations and Map, 30s. net.

NATION.—"Much the fullest account we have of modern Mexico."

MY ROCK GARDEN.

By REGINALD FARRER. Large crown 8vo, with Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"The book will delight the 'born gardener.' It is packed with first-hand observations from cover to cover, and every page of it is interesting."

THE LIFE OF THE SALMON.

With reference more especially to the Fish in Scotland.

By W. L. CALDERWOOD, F.R.S.E., Inspector of Salmon Fisheries for Scotland. Illustrated. 7s. 6d. net.

A Charming Book for Boys and Girls.

THE GOLDEN PORCH.

By W. M. L. HUTCHINSON. With Illustrations. 5s.

A book of Greek Fairy Tales on the lines of Hawthorne's "Wonder Book."

24 SUPERB PLATES FOR 25s.

A GALLERY OF PORTRAITS.

By HELLEU.

Containing 24 Plates beautifully printed and mounted on Art Paper in a handsome binding 20 by 15 inches. 25s. net.

London: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 and 43, Maddox-street, W.

BOOKS OF LIBERAL RELIGION.

THE SOUL OF THE BIBLE. Being Selections from the Old and New Testaments and the Apocrypha. Arranged as Synthetic Readings. By ULYSSES G. B. PIERCE. Introduction by EDWARD EVERETT HALE. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 3s. net; Thin Paper, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

PAUL. By Prof. Dr. W. WREDE. With Preface by J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., D.Litt. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

RABBI, MESSIAH, MARTYR. A Modern Picture of the Story of Jesus. By HERBERT RIX, B.A. Feap. 8vo cloth 1s. net.

THE SOURCES OF OUR KNOWLEDGE OF THE LIFE OF JESUS. By PAUL WERNLE, D.Theol. Translated by E. W. LUMMIS, M.A. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

DAUGHTERS OF THE PURITANS. Brief Biographies of Catherine Sedgwick, Mary Ware, Lydia Child, Dorothea Lynde Dix, Margaret Fuller, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and Louisa Alcott. By S. COURTIS BEACH. Cr. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

FOUR AMERICAN LEADERS. Essays on Franklin, Washington, Channing, and Emerson. By CHARLES W. ELIOT. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

THE UNDERSTANDING HEART. Chapters showing the need of readjustment, intellectually and spiritually, if religion is to hold its own. By S. M. CROTHERS, D.D. Cr. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

FATHER TAYLOR. A Biography of the Founder of the Seamen's Bethel, Boston, U.S.A. By ROBERT COLLYER. Feap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE addresses "delivered at the request of various literary societies and commemorative committees" contained in Mr. Clement Shorter's "Immortal Memories" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.) make excellent reading. Mr. Shorter declares in a modest prefatory note that they are not intended for his "brother journalists nor for the judicious men of letters," and he expresses the hope that those who will not buy his book for its seven other essays may do so because it contains Lord Acton's list of what he considered to be the hundred best books. The book needs no such apology. Mr. Shorter possesses the art—not common in England, but one which seems natural to every French man of letters—of writing literary essays in a pleasantly discursive style, free from pretence and pedantry, and free also from any attempt to "show off." Two of these essays are upon Dr. Johnson, for whom Mr. Shorter has a whole-hearted admiration pleasant to meet with in these days when Johnson's position as one of the really great names in our literature seems in some danger of being forgotten. The "Prayers and Meditations" comes in for warm praise from Mr. Shorter. He thinks it one of the most helpful books he ever read, and describes it with sound judgment as "a valuable inspiration to men to keep up their spirits under adverse conditions, to conquer the weaknesses of their natures; not in the stifling manner of Thomas à Kempis, but in a breezy, robust way." In the essay on Cowper, Mr. Shorter combats the absurd notion that Cowper's poetry lacked the true "lyric cry," and he instances the "Lines on the Receipt of My Mother's Picture," the two sets of verses to Mrs. Unwin, and the sonnet to Wilberforce, as proofs to the contrary. Mr. Shorter might have called in Tennyson in support of his estimate of at least two of those poems. In the "Personal Recollections" added to Tennyson's "Life," Palgrave wrote: "Presently we reached the same poet's stanzas 'To Mary Unwin.' He read them, yet could barely read them, so deeply touched was he by their tender, their almost agonising pathos. And once when I asked him for the 'Lines on My Mother's Portrait,' his voice faltered as he said he would if I wished it; but he knew he should break down." The other essays are on Crabbe, Borrow, the literary associations of East Anglia, Ferdinand Lassalle, and Lord Acton's surprising list of the hundred best books, to which Mr. Shorter has added notes on the authors and editions. Everyone who cares for books will enjoy these essays while the information Mr. Shorter gives concerning the best or most accessible editions of his favourite authors should prove most useful.

* * *

"ACROSS PERSIA," by Mr. E. Crawshay Williams (Arnold, 12s. 6d. net), is one of the best books of travel we have read for some time. The country is a fascinating one, Mr. Williams has a gift of keen observation which is denied to the majority of travellers, and he writes of what he has seen in a vivacious and agreeable style. He resigned his commission in the Royal Field Artillery in 1903, and, wishing to avoid the monotony of a long sea-voyage, he determined to return to England from India by way of the Persian Gulf, Persia itself, the Caspian Sea, Russia, and thence, overland, to England. His account of the journey is highly interesting. The places of historic interest, the scenery, the character of the people and their social condition, supply him with a rich fund of material which he deals with in the happiest manner. One of the best chapters in the book is that in which Mr. Williams describes the ruined city of Shahpur, with its great stalactite cave, at the mouth of which lies the gigantic statue of King Shahpur. Mr. Williams made a detailed examination of the interior of the cave as well as of the ruins of the city, and he is of opinion that if excavations were carried on in the city and its surroundings the trouble would be well repaid. Bendemeer he found to be very different from Moere's description. "There certainly is no 'bower of roses by Bendemeer's stream' to-day, and the nightingale would find it a sorry business to eke out a living in the barren desert which lies around. . . . Through a desert plain, barren alike of verdure and of population, varied here and there by some grey marsh, from which at the approach of the traveller, rise countless thousand ducks with a great whirring of wings to swish away overhead and circle ever lower again into settling-places in the soft sedgy recesses; through such a land there winds a sluggish little river between ugly mud banks. That is my Bendemeer; a sad contrast to the picture drawn by the poet." Want of space does not permit us to draw attention to several interesting features in Mr. Williams's book. It can be recommended as a useful contribution to our knowledge about Persia and an entertaining description of travel in that country.

* * *

A NEW series of selections, called the Elzevir Library, and published by Messrs. Seeley, begins with three volumes, "Fancy and Humour of Charles Lamb," "Wit and Imagination of Benjamin Disraeli," and "Vignettes from Oliver Goldsmith" (1s. 6d. each volume), each with a short introduction by Mr. George Sampson. In each case the selection has been made with judgment, and as the little books are prettily produced, they will probably be welcomed by those who wish to have their reading presented to them in this tabloid form.

* * *

MR. JAMES MORGAN describes his book, "Theodore Roosevelt, the Boy and the Man" (Macmillan, 6s.), as "a simple, straightforward, yet complete biography of the most interesting personality of our time." With the qualification that our time may have produced other personalities at least as interesting as the President of the United States, we may accept this description as accurate. The book neither advocates nor criticises President Roosevelt's political policies, but gives an impartial account of the varied activities of his strenuous career. Although a host of writers have given us books about President Roosevelt, we believe that Mr. Morgan is the first to write a complete biography. Such a book could hardly fail to be interesting, and Mr. Morgan shows considerable skill in presenting striking episodes in a dramatic manner.

* * *

"WITH SHELLEY IN ITALY," edited by Anna B. McMahan (Fisher Unwin, 5s. net), contains a selection from Shelley's Italian poems and letters, together with short introductions to the work of each year that Shelley spent in Italy, and sixty-four illustrations from photographs, the whole intended "to set the poems in their original environment and to conduct the reader himself into that very Italian atmosphere where they were born." We doubt whether such an attempt can be successful, but Miss McMahan's introductions are informing, and the illustrations possess great interest.

* * *

No anthology of English verse has won such general favour as Palgrave's "Golden Treasury," and many readers will be glad to have the fine illustrated edition issued by Messrs. Dent (10s. 6d. net), both for the sake of Mr. Anning Bell's pictures and for the excellent type in which the book is printed. Messrs. Dent also issue Jane Austen's "Northanger Abbey" and "Pride and Prejudice" in their series of "English Idylls" (5s. net). Both volumes are beautifully illustrated in colour by Mr. C. E. Brock. Messrs. Greening have just added "The Battle of the Books" and "Miscellanea" (2s. net each) to the cheap edition of Swift's works which they have in process. Mr. Andrew Lang's charming "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France," 2s. net, has been added to Messrs. Longmans' "Pocket Library"—a series deserving of high praise for its type, binding, and the choice of books included. From Messrs. Macmillan come delightful copies of George Eliot's "Silas Marner" and Mrs. Gaskell's "Cranford" (5s. net), both containing charming pictures by Mr. Hugh Thomson. Mr. Froude publishes a capital edition of "The Poems of William Collins," with an introduction by Mr. Christopher Stone, and to the series of "The World's Classics" issued by the same publisher there have been added Smollett's translation of "Gil Blas," with an introduction and notes by Mr. James Fitzmaurice-Kelly; Trollope's "The Three Clerks," with an introduction by Mr. W. Teignmouth Shore; Carlyle's "Life of John Sterling," with an introduction by Mr. W. Hale White; and Coleridge's "Poems," with an introduction by Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch.

24th JANUARY to 11th FEBRUARY.
LONDON to the RIVIERA
 BY SEA.

A Winter Cruise

OF EIGHTEEN DAYS by

P. & O. CRUISING "VECTIS"
 YACHT

6,000 TONS. 6,000 H.P.

Vai GIBRALTAR, MADEIRA, the CANARY
 ISLES, MOROCCO, ALGIERS, PORT MAHON (Minorca), and MARSEILLES.

From London by Mail Steamer January 24th, connecting with S.Y. "Vectis" at Gibraltar; or by "Vectis" from Marseilles January 25th.

Fares from 18 Guineas.

13th February—A Cruise of 27 days—Marseilles to Greece, Syria, Palestine, Egypt & Naples.

Fares from 30 Guineas.

THREE SERVICES WEEKLY to EGYPT

By P. & O. Mail Steamers from London, Marseilles and Brindisi.

For Passage, Illustrated Programme, &c., apply to the Local Agents, or at the Company's Offices,
NORTHUMBERLAND AVENUE, W.C. 122, LEADENHALL ST., E.C.
 LONDON.

A beverage and a food

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
 allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION

OF YOUR

GAS ENGINE

GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE
 & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate
 (Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

VISIT CALIFORNIA

THE LAND OF SUNSHINE, FRUIT, AND FLOWERS,

And Travel
 by the Southern Pacific Company's Routes.

Luxurious trains leave New York and New Orleans daily, provided with Dining, Sleeping, Observation Cars, etc.

MAGNIFICENT NEW PASSENGER STEAMSHIPS, 10,000 tons, leave New York for New Orleans weekly, offering a delightful route between those Cities. THROUGH TICKETS issued.

Apply, RUD FALCK, General European Agent, Southern Pacific Co.

LONDON: 49, Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 22, Cockspur Street, S.W.

LIVERPOOL: 25 Water Street

Insurance.

OWN CASE AGENCY COMMISSION.

THIS subject must be tackled, before long, by the insurance offices or it will develop into a veritable disease. If the offices are prepared to adopt a universal discount, without hardening present rates of premium, well and good. If not, a remedy must very shortly be found. The Insurance Brokers' Association, under the auspices of Sir John J. Runtz, has recently been formed, in self-defence, to stem the hurrying progress of universal commission, and it is manifestly clear that their apprehensions are not groundless. The insurance offices, some quarter of a century ago, only recognised as deserving remuneration by commission two classes—the agent and the broker. The agent lived by insurance, and in most cases represented but one office. The broker was concerned in such matters on the wholesale principle, dealing in large amounts, preparing plans and specifications, and parcelling them out amongst the offices in certain proportions.

To the lay mind, perhaps, this is "a distinction without a difference." In a recent ruling, the late Mr. Justice Kekewich has defined a professional insurance broker as one who "saw what the risk was, and he reported on special circumstances to the insurance offices, and in other ways he protected the offices. Therefore, the offices, as well as the person effecting the insurance, had a business interest in seeing that the insurance passed through the hands of a proper agent. It was important that expert agents should be employed rather than that persons should conduct their own insurances; and it was perfectly fair and businesslike to maintain, as far as they could, that intermediary." The offices, in the days referred to, only sought business through its agents. Their agents did the fetch-and-carry part of the work; and with respect to an ordinary agent, it was not even an essential that he should be versed in other than the rudiments of the business. But with regard to a broker, as previously explained, some real expert assistance was expected. The remuneration was identical, as the broker, although rendering more important service, had the additional advantage of being recognised by all the offices, whilst the agent, pure and simple, dealt with only one. In those days the employment of canvassers, euphemistically styled inspectors, was a thing of naught, and this material expense was saved.

The alteration in methods has come about through the indiscriminate appointment of men as agents for the sole purpose of securing, or maintaining, "own case" business. This function has practically elbowed out many an hard-working agent, who has seen his living vanish by the process, and it has forced the Insurance Brokers' Association into existence. In the ruling already mentioned, Mr. Justice Kekewich has further upset the equilibrium of the agent by stating that "it was perfectly plain that if one instructed an agent to effect an insurance for him, and that agent received a commission—without an agreement, express or implied, that the commission should be for his own benefit—the commission belonged to the person whose property was being insured, and not to the agent." It must not be supposed that this judgment has been the warrant for the disregard by the Offices of proper protection for their agent. They have no such justification. Let us imagine ourselves one of a family who combine to make their father's agency prosper. The wife does not deal where there is no quid pro quo in the shape of insurance for her husband; the daughters canvass their own employers, and the clothes and boots of the sons represent so much insurance purchased of their father. In the evening counsel is taken together, and joint methods are strategically devised for the assault. It can be imagined the feeling of disgust which would be engendered in the family when the father had to announce that the insurance on the large drapery establishment where his daughter worked, which she had secured at so much sacrifice, was to be transferred by his office, on account of the firm having become their own agents. The canker of discontent would have begun its work, and a sense of uneasiness set up. The last words of the agent to his wife that night would be that he must be on the look-out for some other employment than the agency, as it was evident, by that day's experience, that there was no security or permanence in the business they had scraped together. The agent would look for competition from without, for it is the law of nature; but when it comes from within, it shakes his faith in the integrity of his office.

The broker has himself to thank for some of his troubles in this connection. He invariably considers the fact of the party desiring insurance having favoured him with the business to distribute amongst the offices, makes him the servant of the proposer, and that it is his bounden duty to protect his interests alone by offering cut rates and harassing conditions. He approaches the offices in this spirit, losing sight of the important fact that his remuneration really comes from the Insurance Offices. They not improperly consider that, as they pay the piper, the tune should be theirs. Their Association may bring about some change in this respect, and not all to their advantage. Their discussions, which, it may be assumed, form part of the routine of the Association, may lead to a little ventilation of a matter which, it is thought, has not hitherto received due attention. As a further argument against the indiscriminate bestowal of agency commission, it would be well to hear the words of Sir Edward Fry, who, on the death of Lord Russell of Killowen, fathered the Prevention of Corruption Act. He strongly reprobates the payment of commissions to persons who are primarily the confidential agents of their employers, such as solicitors, estate agents, clerks to public bodies, secretaries, and cashiers, as they are paid on account of the influence of these agents over their principals, and are retained by the recipient, although they belong in equity to their principals. He adds: "Every solicitor has, when a pupil, learned what is needful before a fiduciary agent can lawfully retain a benefit against his principal. The principal must know the existence of the benefit, the extent of it, his right to recover it. He should receive full and genuine advice from his agent; he must—to use an expressive phrase—'be at arm's length' from his adviser; and when, with all this knowledge, and in this position of independence, he thinks fit to make a present, then, and then only, has he a right to keep the benefit. Furthermore, it must be borne in mind that in the common case of trust property, the trustees have no right and no power to give to the solicitor what really belongs to the persons interested in the estate."

If one looks at commission as remuneration for something done, the absurdity of paying it to the insured must be glaringly apparent. In the old days, already mentioned, the insured was content with thanks, and even these, in those independent times, he did not always get.

THE POLITICAL ENCYCLOPÆDIA.†

EVERY student of French history knows that an Encyclopædia may influence a revolution, and the "Political Encyclopædia," a second edition of which is now appearing in Russia in twelve parts (three of which are to hand) bears marks in almost every article of the spirit which actuates it; a spirit of irreconcilable hostility to the old bureaucratic and absolutist methods of government from which the Russian people are struggling to free themselves.

The Encyclopædia professes to deal with the political matters not of Russia only, but of the whole world; still, naturally, much the greater part of its space is occupied with Russian questions; on which it furnishes a mine of information which should make it indispensable as a work of reference. In the first part (letter A), the Agrarian question receives specially full treatment under the headings: Agrarians, the Agrarian Movement of 1905, Agrarian Relations in Russia, and Agrarian Programmes, and good maps, as well as graphic tables, are given, illustrating these articles.

That this remarkable storehouse of information on political matters should be produced, and that there should be a demand for it, is a sign of the amount of study which, in spite of all rebuffs and discouragement, the Russian "intelligents" are applying to political subjects.

† "The Political Encyclopædia." Edited by Slominsky, St. Petersburg. Price, including postage to England, 28 fr. unbound, or 34r. bound in three large volumes. Published at No. 88, Nevsky Prospekt, St. Petersburg.

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW.

London & County Banking Company, Limited

REGISTERED UNDER "THE COMPANIES ACTS."

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, $1,550,000.

Directors.

JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P. SIR THOMAS JACKSON, BART.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq. WM. MCKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq. Director).
VISCOUNT GOSCHEN. OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq. WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq. CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVETIE.
Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE
Country Manager—WILLIAM GEORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—HEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—ELGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

THE LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

Opens DRAWING ACCOUNTS with Commercial Houses and Private Individuals, upon the plan usually adopted by Bankers.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Deposit Receipts are issued for sums of Money placed upon these Accounts, and Interest is allowed at such rates as advertised, reference being had to the state of the Money Market.

CIRCULAR NOTES AND LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued payable in the principal Cities and Towns of the Continent. Letters of Credit are also issued payable in Australia, Canada, India, China, the United States, and elsewhere.

The Agency of Foreign and Country Banks is undertaken. The Purchase and Sale of Government and other Stocks, also of English and Foreign Shares, are effected. Dividends, Annuities, &c., are received for Customers of the Bank.

Great facilities are afforded to the Customers of the Bank for the receipt of Money both from and in the Towns where the Company has Branches.

The following Banks will receive and transmit, free of charge, credits for customers of this Bank:—Barclay and Co., Ltd.; Capital and Counties Bank, Ltd.; Lloyds Bank, Ltd.; London City and Midland Bank, Ltd.; and National Provincial Bank of England, Ltd.

The Officers of the Bank are bound not to disclose the transactions of any of its Customers. By Order of the Directors,
E. F. ROBINSON, Secretary.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY AND CHRISTMAS PARCELS TRAFFIC.

THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY has made special and complete arrangements for the collection, quick transit, and prompt delivery of CHRISTMAS PARCELS TRAFFIC to and from all towns on their system.

Through vans will be attached to many of the express trains. Special parcels trains will also be run to meet the additional demands made upon the Company at this period of the year.

Reduced rates are in operation for the conveyance of Parcels traffic by passenger train.

Special frequent collections of parcels will be made from Receiving Offices in London and the Provinces by the Company's vans, and the traffic will be dispatched by first trains after receipt.

Full particulars as to charges, which will in no case exceed those in force by any other route, can be obtained on application at any Great Northern Station or Receiving Office.

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

GUNN SECTIONAL BOOKCASE

IN the smallest Sitting room or the Most Extensive Library, there is no "book-nest" so Useful as the "GUNN." Built up in sections, it Expands as your Books Increase. It is Always Complete, yet permits of unlimited Extension.

The "Gunn" is the Best

Handsome in Appearance, Excellently
Made and Enduring in Wear.

Write for Descriptive Booklet
No. 16, giving illustrations of the Various Styles with Full Particulars and Prices, sent Post Free on Request.

Wm. ANGUS & Co., Ltd.,
53, Paul St., Finsbury, London, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Tel. phone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE S.S. 1/6 PRIZE BIBLE.

With 29 beautifully coloured Photographic Views and Pictures from the Old Masters. Maps. Handsomely bound in crimson grained cloth, red under gold edges, 1/6, post free; 6 copies for 8/6 post free. Also in crimson morocco at 2/6, post free; 6 copies for 11/6, post free. Also with References and 59 Pictures 2/6, post free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOKS.—A Catalogue of finely printed modern Books, choice editions, limited issues and large paper copies, post free on receipt of p.c.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each). Saint Jude's Depot, Birmingham.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

APPOINTMENT.

Darlington Training College.

LECTURER IN ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Wanted in January a RESIDENT GOVERNOR to teach English Literature. Salary, according to qualifications, from £80 to £110, with lodgings, board and washing. Application forms, which should be returned on or before December 12th, may be obtained from "The Principal."

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mng'r.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of a WOMAN PRINCIPAL of Avery Hill Residential and Day Training College for Women, Eltham.

Applicants must possess a University degree or its equivalent.

The salary attaching to the post is £500 a year, together with board, residence, washing, and medical attendance.

The candidate appointed will be required to commence work after the Easter holidays, or, if possible, earlier.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Thursday, January 9th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of the Council's requirements as to appointments vacant are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W. Price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,

Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,

Victoria Embankment, W.C.

November 23rd, 1907.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—Entries close December 3rd.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

EDUCATIONAL.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.), Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.

Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.

Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER, B.A., Camb.

YOUR CHRISTMAS BOOKS!

CONSULT THE DECEMBER "BOOK MONTHLY," NOW ON SALE, 6d. NET, FOR SELECTED LISTS OF THE CHRISTMAS GIFT-BOOKS. IT ALSO CONTAINS AN APPRECIATION OF THACKERAY, BY MR. WHITELAW REID, THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR, ALL THE TALKS OF THE BOOK WORLD AND BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS.

Begin the New Year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly."

Write for a Specimen Copy to the Publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column.
				½ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 ,,	6d. ,,

Some of Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS'S publications especially suitable for Christmas presents. Both Prints (framed and unframed) and Books can be seen at The Bruton Galleries, Bruton St., W., as well as at all Booksellers.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND.

By LEWIS CARROLL. From the latest copyright text. With 12 coloured and many line illustrations by Millicent Sowerby. 5s. net.

The only reprint of "Alice" issued by arrangement with the owners of the copyright and Messrs. Macmillan and Co., Ltd. Ladies' Field: "Fortunate the children of to-day who are to make her acquaintance for the first time in this radiant garb!" Birmingham Post: "Adorned by the graceful talent of Miss Sowerby, whose conceptions are both novel and appropriate to the spirit of the story."

THE BED-TIME BOOK.

By HELEN H. WHITNEY, with many illustrations in colour by JESSIE W. SMITH. Royal 4to, art canvas back. 5s. net. Birmingham Post: "The Bed-Time Book" is certainly not conducive to somnolence; on the contrary, any child who took it to bed would probably remain wakeful, turning over the pages again and again."

Westminster Gazette: "Once more Miss Willcox Smith gives us children as they are. . . . Miss Whitney knows a great deal about children and their attitude towards their elders."

CHILDHOOD: Being Twelve Days from our Youth.

Pictured in colours by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and written in verse by GITHA SOWERBY. The text printed in two colours, and with some 30 illustrations in the text. 7½ by 9½ in. 5s. 6d. net. Morning Leader: "Recalls Kate Greenaway's best work. The pictures are delightful." Manchester Courier: "The pictures are works of the daintiest artistry. One of the prettiest child's books we have recently seen."

BUMBLETOES: Being their Adventures with Belinda and the Buttons Boy.

Pictured in 12 scenes by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and written in verse by GITHA SOWERBY. The 12 scenes in colour, and 18 further illustrations in the text. 5½ by 7 in. 1s. 6d. net. The Crown: "Some of the freshest and most charming examples of creative water-colour drawings. The coloured illustrations are, in fact, quite a feature of an altogether neat and delightful little volume, exceptionally well printed and finished."

THE CHILD-LOVERS' CALENDAR, 1908.

With 12 illustrations in colours by Amelia Bauerlé. Small 8vo, 1s. net. Pall Mall Gazette: "In the Greenaway manner, except that the artist is more vigorous in her lines and less straitened in her types."

THE STORY OF SCRAGGLES, A SPARROW.

By G. W. JAMES. With 6 illustrations, after drawings and photographs. Small crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. Field: "Will certainly please lovers of animals." Scotsman: "Has an engaging natural freshness that is sure to make it a favourite with young readers."

THE DUMPY BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

36 Titles to select from. Royal 32mo. Bound in decorated washable cloth, 1s. net each. Over 250,000 Copies of these Books have been sold. Evening Standard: "Tiny books which very small people will find most fascinating."

Nottingham Guardian: "They have everything to recommend them to their readers."

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

The Burlington Magazine says: "Nothing of the kind so good or so cheap has ever before been offered to the public." The Connoisseur says: "A degree of perfection has been reached, which, up to now, seemed beyond the scope of mechanical processes; in short, the nearest approach to perfection that has been achieved."

V. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA.

PORTRAIT OF AN UNKNOWN LADY. Museo Poldi Pezzoli, Milan. Colour surface, 15½ by 11½ in. 10s. 6d. net.

VI. LORENZO DI CREDI.

THE ANNUNCIATION, after the painting in tempera on wooden panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence. Colour surface, 17½ by 12 in. 15s. net.

Occasional Plate.—I.

LIPPI-FILIPPO. The Virgin.

After the painting in tempera on wooden panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin, Child, St. John, and an Angel. Coloured Surface, 15½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in. 10s. 6d. net. Inland postage (Great Britain), 6d. per plate, except Nos. IV. and VIII., which are 9d. Foreign postages double these amounts. [See Prospectus.]

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.

By E. L. SEELEY. With 8 Four-Colour Plates, and 24 in half-tone, gilt top. 7s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari." Also a Special Edition, with 4 extra Four-Colour Plates, the Half-Tones printed in Two Tints and a Special Coloured Frontispiece, after Raphael. Small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; vellum, 20s. net; red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS FROM VASARI.

Collected and arranged by E. L. SEELEY. Red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. Special Edition, small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net. Uniform with "Artists of the Italian Renaissance."

WOMEN OF FLORENCE: A Study of their Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento.

By PROF. ISIDORO DEL LUNGO, with an Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. With 2 Plates in Four-Colour and 24 in Half-Tone. Buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; parchment 10s. 6d. net. Burlington Magazine: "An extremely human, agreeable, and interesting book, which the care of the publishers in the illustration and decoration has rendered doubly attractive." Scotsman: "The volume forms a worthy addition to an important department of historical research." T.P.'s Weekly: "A fascinating study. The book abounds in picturesque passages."

TUSCAN FEASTS AND TUSCAN FRIENDS.

By DOROTHY NEVILLE LEES. With 12 Reproductions, after Photographs of typical Tuscan Scenes. Cloth. Special Binding Design. 5s. net. Standard: "In her company we are taken to fairs and festivals which throw into relief all that is most typical in the life of the peasantry."

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS: Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans.

By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully Illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. Tyrwhitt, R.B.A., and Reginald Barratt, A.R.W.S. Large foolscap 4to, cloth, gilt top, 20s. net. Also 105 Large Paper Copies, crown 4to, full parchment, the Plates mounted, 42s. net. Glasgow Herald: "One of those comparatively few works that are both learned and readable. . . . The colour treatment is particularly masterly. . . . his reproduction of the very atmosphere of the East is a very distinct artistic triumph."

LISBON AND CINTRA.

With some Account of other Cities and Historic Sites in Portugal. By A. C. INCHBOLD. With 30 illustrations in Colour, after Water-Colour Drawings by Stanley Inchbold. Large foolscap 4to, cloth, 10s. 6d. net. Times: "The writer is an intelligent and careful guide who does not waste space with rhetoric or with personalia." Outlook: "The book describes the country and its inhabitants with great thoroughness. . . . Mr. Stanley Inchbold has caught the light of the Southern sun."

THE COLOUR OF LONDON.

By W. J. LOFTIE, F.S.A. With 60 illustrations in Colour, and an Essay by the Japanese Artist, Yoshio Markino. Large foolscap 4to, gilt top, 20s. net. Also the few remaining special copies on large paper, the plates mounted, and the binding in whole parchment, 42s. net. Athenaeum: "The artist, Yoshio Markino, has given us a London which is new. . . . the picture of a beautiful capital, which he reveals to its astounded inhabitants. In many of his pictures he seems, as it were, to reveal London to Londoners themselves." Nation: "This is an unique book. Many of the sixty pictures in this book might have been produced by a clever student of Whistler's work; others could have been done by no one but a Japanese."

SWITZERLAND AND ITS PEOPLE.

By CLARENCE ROOK, Fcap. 4to, gilt top, with 56 illustrations in Colour by Mrs. Jardine, and 24 in Half-Tone on tint. 20s. net. Also a limited number of special copies on large paper, with the plates mounted, bound in whole parchment, 42s. net. County Gentleman: "A current of the true St. Moritz air invigorates the pages of this capital all-round book." Spectator: "This is a good book to look at and to read. . . . a volume which is bound both to please and to profit."

VENICE.

By BERYL DE SELINCOURT and MAY STURGE-HENDERSON. Fcap. 4to, gilt top. With 30 illustrations in Colour by Reginald Barratt, A.R.W.S. 10s. 6d. net. Also a Limited Number of Copies on Large Paper, the Plates mounted, and the binding in whole parchment. 21s. net. Scotsman: "One of those composite books with coloured pictures in which the illustrations count for no less than the literature. . . . they (the illustrations) grace a book which must both please and instruct any one who either knows or wishes to know the lovely city it describes."

THE PARADISE OR GARDEN OF THE HOLY FATHERS.

Being Histories of the Anchorites, Recluses, Coenobites, Monks, and Ascetic Fathers of the Deserts of Egypt between A.D. CCL. and A.D. CCCC. circiter. Compiled by ATHANASIUS, Archbishop of Alexandria; PALLADIUS, Bishop of Helenopolis; SAINT JEROME, and others. Now Translated out of the Syriac, with Notes and Introduction by E. A. WALLIS BUDGE, M.A., Litt.D., Keeper of the Assyrian and Egyptian Antiquities in the British Museum. 2 vols., extra crown 8vo, with Frontispiece Reproductions from the Syriac MS. 15s. net. These volumes for the first time make available for the general English reader the famous "Book of Paradise," by Palladius, Hieronymus, and others; "The Sayings of the Fathers" of the Egyptian Desert, by various hands; and the "Life of St. Anthony the Great," by Anastasius—works of the greatest intrinsic value as a record of manners and of the social dispensations of the Eremites and Ascetics of the Egyptian Desert, even apart from their equally strong religious and historical interest as a light upon early Alexandrian Christianity.

Daily Chronicle: "The general reader will be pleased by these tales, with their quaintly concrete notions of religious abstractions, their elemental simplicity, and their glimpses of the depths and heights. Here are human documents indeed."

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

The Nation

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1907.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

A HISTORY OF SEALS. By W. DE GRAY BIRCH, LL.D., F.S.A., late of the Department of MSS. in the British Museum, &c. With 52 Plates in Collotype and a Frontispiece in Photogravure, wide royal 8vo, 25s. net.
[The Connoisseur's Library.]

A BOOK OF CARICATURES. By MAX BEERBOHM. Demy 4to, 21s. net.

The latest of Mr. Beerbohm's exhibitions was held at the Carfax Gallery last spring; and "A Book of Caricatures" is composed chiefly of reproductions of those drawings. The book contains over 40 caricatures, including a Coloured Frontispiece.

THE BUILDERS OF FLORENCE. By J. WOOD BROWN. With 74 Illustrations by HERBERT RAILTON. Demy 4to, 18s. net.

This fine book treats of the history and associations of the more important of the historic buildings of Florence. In the case of each building, an exact account is given of its architectural development. It is sumptuously produced and admirably illustrated. An Illustrated Prospectus will be sent free on application.

READINGS ON THE PURGATORIO OF DANTE, chiefly based on the Commentary of BENVENUTO DA IMOLA. By the Hon. WILLIAM WARREN-VERNON, M.A. With an Introduction by the late DEAN CHURCH. In 2 volumes. 3rd edition. Crown 8vo, 15s. net.

AN ARTIST'S REMINISCENCES. By WALTER CRANE. With 123 Illustrations by the Author. Second Edition. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

"We meet all the great figures of the last half-century."—Daily News.

A WOMAN'S TREK FROM THE CAPE TO CAIRO. By MARY HALL. With 64 Illustrations and 2 Maps, demy 8vo., 16s. net.

THE COMPLETE MOUNTAINEER. By G. D. ABRAHAM. With over 70 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"The title of this book is no exaggeration. To climbers of all kinds and conditions it will be all but indispensable."—Morning Leader.

"Mountaineers have looked out for this book, the work of a most excellent rock-climber, a competent man on ice and snow, and one of the most successful of mountain photographers."—Manchester Guardian.

THE COMPLETE MOTORIST. By FILSON YOUNG. With 136 Illustrations. Seventh Edition. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. A completely new edition, rewritten, of this popular book.

ASWAN AND HER FRIENDS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. A narrative of literary Lichfield in the great days of Anna Seward.

"In this book we have the essence of a generation, the fluttering aroma of sentiments and aspirations, long since scattered to the winds."—Daily Telegraph.

A PRINCESS OF THE OLD WORLD. By ELEANOR C. PRICE. With 21 Illustrations, 12s. 6d. net. This volume deals with the life and surroundings of Anne Marie Louise D'Orléans, known as La Grande Mademoiselle.

PETRARCH AND HIS TIMES. By H. C. HOLLWAY-CALTHORP. With 24 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

WORDSWORTH AND HIS CIRCLE. By D. W. RANNIE. With 20 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. A study, biographical and critical, drawn from original sources, of the man and poet in his relations to his chief friends and compeers.

THE QUEEN OF LETTER WRITERS. By JANET ALDIS. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. A Life of Madame de Sévigné, abounding in bright and vivid interest.

A HISTORY OF MILAN UNDER THE SFORZA. By CECILIA M. ADY. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. This is the first volume of a new series of histories of the Italian States. All the volumes are based on original research.

ENGLISH CHILDREN IN THE OLDEN TIME. By ELIZABETH GODFREY. With 32 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"It is scientific enough to command confidence, and not too scientific to be readable. It is a thoroughly engaging inquiry into the bringing-up of English children in the past."—Spectator.

INDIA IMPRESSIONS: with some Notes of Ceylon during a Winter Tour, 1906-7. By WALTER CRANE. With 84 Illustrations by the Author, of which one is in Colour, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FROM MIDSHIPMAN TO FIELD-MARSHAL. By Field-Marshal Sir EVELYN WOOD, V.C., G.C.B. With 3 Portraits, 12 Illustrations, and 14 Maps. A New and Cheaper Edition. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This book in its expensive two-volume form had an enormous success in 1906, and the present edition in one volume is unabridged and contains all the original illustrations.

AN ENGLISH PROSE MISCELLANY. Selected, with an Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD. Crown 8vo, 6s. Specimens from representative British writers from 1485 to 1800.

NINETEENTH CENTURY PROSE. Selected, with an Introduction by Mrs. LAURENCE BINYON. Crown 8vo, 6s. A selection of prose, 1800-1900, the primary object of the book being to illustrate the range and development of English prose style during that period.

FLORENCE AND NORTHERN TUSCANY. By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of "The Cities of Umbria." With 32 Illustrations, of which 16 are in Colour by WILLIAM PARKINSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GEORGE MEREDITH: NOVELIST, POET, REFORMER. By MAY STURGE HENDERSON. With a portrait, crown 8vo, 6s. A careful study of the novels in chronological order, and of the consistent ideas underlying Meredith's work as novelist, poet, critic, and essayist.

DRAMA AND LIFE. By A. B. WALKLEY. Crown 8vo, 6s. The volume includes articles on the contemporary stage in London and Paris, together with reviews of plays by the foremost dramatists of the day.

MY MEMOIRS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Translated by E. M. WALLER. With Portraits, in 6 vols., with Frontispieces in Photogravure, crown 8vo, 6s. each. Vols. I and II.

THE SOUTH-BOUND CAR. By OWEN LLEWELLYN and L. RAVEN-HILL. With 85 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s. A vivacious narrative of the events of a tour by motor in Spain. Mr. Raven-Hill's sketches fully illustrate the incidents, humorous and otherwise.

TWO LEGS. By CARL EWALD. Translated by A. T. DE MATOS. Illustrated, large crown 8vo, 6s.

"Two Legs" is almost beyond criticism.... The story is in some ways the most remarkable addition to imaginative folk-lore of our time, and we recommend its addition to the library of all thoughtful children, no matter how young. It will enlarge and enrich the world for every one of them."—Times.

"A feast of wit and fancy unusual even in these days of 'Jungle' books. All the stories show a wonderful power of imagination. Here is an Andersen who changed poetry for science."—Athenaeum.

THE GENTLEST ART. An Anthology of Entertaining Letters. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

"The 'Gentlest Art' is, of course, the art of letter-writing. Mr. Lucas is himself an expert in this branch of letters, and he has the true spirit of the anthologist, a good eye for colour, a delicate palate for taste, a good nose for perfume, and, above all, a keen sense of quiet humour. A charming, graceful book."—Daily Telegraph.

CHARACTER AND COMEDY. By E. V. LUCAS. Second Edition. Fcap 8vo, 5s.

"As full as all his other works of humour and of observation."—Spectator.

IN THE FOOTPRINTS OF DANTE. Arranged by PAGET TOYNBEE, M.A., D.Litt. Small crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. "In the Footprints of Dante" is a collection of some of the most beautiful and most striking passages from the works, of Dante. Prose is included as well as verse.

Messrs. METHUEN'S New Illustrated Catalogue is now ready, and will be sent with their Bulletin to any applicant. They have prepared Prospectuses of all their important books, and these, too, can be had.

METHUEN and CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

THE MAN-EATERS OF TSAVO.

By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O.
With numerous Illustrations, 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

PHILOSOPHY of COMMON SENSE.

By FREDERIC HARRISON.
Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE BRUSHWOOD BOY.

By RUDYARD KIPLING.
With Illustrations in Colour by F. H. TOWNSEND.
8vo, 6s.

THE POCKET KIPLING.

Scarlet limp leather, 5s. net per vol.
Vol. 7.—CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS. Illus.

SILAS MARNER.

By GEORGE ELIOT.
With Illustrations in Colour and Black-and-White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with gilt edges, 6s. Cranford Series.

CRANFORD.

With Coloured Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON.
Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

HIGHWAYS & BYWAYS IN KENT.

By WALTER JERROLD.
Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

IS MARS HABITABLE?

A critical examination of Professor PERCIVAL LOWELL'S book, "Mars and its Canals," with an alternative explanation.

By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S., &c.
With Map. Extra crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Tuesday.]

THE WORKS OF TENNYSON.

Complete in One Volume. Cloth, 7s. 6d.; on India paper, limp leather, 10s. 6d. net.

POCKET EDITION. Five Vols. Cloth, 2s. net each; leather, 3s. net each.

POETICAL WORKS. Twelve Vols. 1s. net.
each; or in cloth box, 14s. net.

GLOBE EDITION. Cloth, 3s. 6d.; extra gilt,
4s. 6d.; limp leather, 5s. net.

IN MEMORIAM. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather,
3s. 6d. net.

LYRICAL POEMS. 2s. 6d. net.

THE PRINCESS. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather,
3s. 6d. net.

IDYLLS OF THE KING. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

IN MEMORIAM. With Notes by the Author.
Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. 5s. net.

ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON: a Memoir.
By his Son, HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON.
With Portrait and Facsimiles. 6s.

New 6s. Novels.

THE FRUIT OF THE TREE.

By EDITH WHARTON.

ARETHUSA.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

THE STOOPING LADY.

By MAURICE HEWLETT.

THE ANGEL OF FORGIVENESS.

By ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

By the late LORD ACTON.

THE HISTORY OF FREEDOM,

And other Essays. By the late Lord ACTON.
Edited, with an introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE
FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE,
M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

HISTORICAL ESSAYS & STUDIES.

By the late Lord ACTON. Edited, with an Introduction, by the same. 8vo, 10s. net.

LEAVES FROM THE NOTE-BOOKS OF

LADY DOROTHY NEVILL.

Edited by RALPH NEVILL.
With Portraits, 8vo, 15s. net.

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM.

A Diary Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and
D. RADFORD.
With Portraits in Photogravure, 8vo, 12s. net.

LIFE OF GLADSTONE.

By JOHN MORLEY.
In 2 vols., 10s. net.

OLD SPANISH MASTERS.

Engraved by TIMOTHY COLE. With Historical Notes by CHARLES H. CAFFIN, and Comments by the Engraver. Imperial 8vo, 31s. 6d. net.

EDITION DE LUXE. £10 10s. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Volume.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS

FROM THE WORKS OF T. H. HUXLEY.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY.
Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net; cloth elegant, 2s. 6d. net;
limp leather, 3s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

MR. F. MARION CRAWFORD'S

Christmas Carol.

THE LITTLE CITY OF HOPE.

Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The MORNING POST.—"Christmas is a period of license to indulge in sweet things, and 'The Little City of Hope' is a bon-bon that pleases us."

The STANDARD.—"Mr. Marion Crawford has done a really delightful Christmas story for old and young alike—a story that tugs heavily at your heart strings, and will not let you put it down until you have read its last page."

MRS. MOLESWORTH'S NEW BOOK.

THE LITTLE GUEST.

A Story for Children. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

MABEL OSGOOD WRIGHT'S NEW BOOK.

GRAY LADY AND THE BIRDS.

Stories of the Bird Year from Home and School.
Illustrated. Extra Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

The Boy and the Man.

By JAMES MORGAN. Illustrated crown 8vo, 6s.

THE MUSE IN MOTLEY. Poems.

By HARTLEY CARRICK, M.A. With a Foreword
by A. T. QUILLER COUCH. Fcap, 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MALARIA.

A NEGLECTED FACTOR IN THE HIS- TORY OF GREECE AND ROME.

By W. H. S. JONES, M.A.

With an Introduction by Major RONALD ROSS, F.R.S.,
C.B., and concluding Chapter by G. G. ELLETT, M.B.
Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

* * Macmillan's Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

SUPPLEMENT.
CHRISTMAS GIFT BOOKS.

The Nation

INDEX.

	PAGE
THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS. By Mrs. Frederic Harrison	363
LOUISA ALCOTT. By G. K. Chesterton - - - -	364
FAIRY TALES NEW AND OLD - - - - -	365
SCIENCE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE. By G. M. M. - - -	366
BOUTET DE MONVEL - - - - -	368
FOR THE REAL CHILD. By Evelyn Sharp - - -	370
BOOKS FOR BOYS. By John Masefield - - -	372
THE GIFT BOOK - - - - -	374
NATURAL HISTORY - - - - -	376
FOR THE BABY'S STOCKING - - - - -	378

THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

THE approach of the Christmas season brings to the minds of most of us the claims of certain little ones for new toys and children's books, while every year the search for the appropriate toy and book becomes more arduous to the fastidious giver. Dr. Axel Munthe, in his charming essay on toys and children's books, complains that modern toys do not stimulate the imagination. They are things to look at, to wonder at, things to weary of, but they are not things to play with. "Where," he asks, "are the simple toys that contented our fathers and mothers?" The ball, the hoop, the box of bricks, the doll à treize sous, made of rags or wood—the pauper doll—who never grows old, but dies young beloved of the gods. "She dies young, and wends her way to the strange Elysian Fields, where all that survives of broken toys sleeps under the shade of withered Christmas trees." "Tom Thumb is left to take care of himself in the trackless forest, and poor Robinson Crusoe, with whom we kept such faithful company, is feeling more and more lonely on his desert island, with our common friend Friday, and the patient goat, whose neck we have often patted in our dreams. Our children to-day have no time for dreams."

Most people, it would seem, imagine that, provided the child is amused, it does not much signify what he gets in the way of reading. "There's no harm in the book," is a common saying; but surely our children deserve a better mental diet than something which is only "not harmful." What of the beautiful, the stimulating, the helpful, the nourishing? It is difficult for adult readers who are case-hardened by much reading to realise the extraordinary effect a book may have on a child of parts and imagination. Let any grown-up person try to recall the impression of his first visit to the theatre; that, at a long distance, may enable him to appreciate something of what a book may mean to a young child. How many boys and girls have played at "Robinson Crusoe," or the "Children of the New Forest," or "Holiday House" for weeks together, impersonating the characters, adding fresh adventures, bringing in their favourite animals, and adapting the daily events of life to the story. In the days of fewer books, children read their "Pilgrim's Progress," delighted in the second part of "Robinson Crusoe," were held in amaze by the philosophical discussions with man Friday, and shed tears over the death of Mrs. Crusoe, which desolated the poor wanderer's home and drove him forth a second time to the island.

French people are filled with astonishment at the number and variety of books found in English nurseries and schoolrooms. French children do not have many books, but when they can read, there is a whole library of classical juvenile literature awaiting them. It is, moreover, literature in a true sense. Fables, ancient and modern, Æsop's, Fénelon's, La Fontaine's; fairy tales from many lands; the books of the Bibliothèque Rose, beginning with the "Misfortunes of the Immortal Sophie"; these books, with "Robinson Crusoe," some historical tales, some books of travel, of science, of natural history, leading up to a selection of Walter Scott's novels, would form the staple of every child's library. They are all books excellent of their kind, all have stood the test of generations of eager young readers, many of them belong to the great literature of the world, some of them are models of literary style. There is nothing morbid or vapid about any of them; they neither preach nor moralise, but are all books which may fitly lay the foundations of a good education. There are naturally a few modern children's books amongst them, noticeable for their clever and often really beautiful illustrations. There are also some translations from the English, the Italian, and German; but there is an idea as to the sequence in which children should read books, an idea as to the best books for their juvenile digestion.

Compare this carefully selected literary diet with the sawdust we too often offer our children, under various attractive disguises. I was once given for my own children a handsome illustrated volume of fables with "up-to-date" applications, which were so odious that there was nothing for it but to consign the gift to the flames. The modern child's book seems to me to be written with an eye always to the "grown ups"; how else can we account for the clever but often vulgar illustrations, the allusions to a world in which children have no part. A child's book should be written in singleness of purpose, with love and reverence; that in the first place, while for a really good book there must be gifts of imagination, humour, sympathy, and understanding. But how few good children's books are there in the world. Probably most people would put "Alice in Wonderland" at the head of any list of children's books. I have, however, known many children who did not care for the immortal "Alice," and as a model she would not serve. I suggest that Sir Walter Scott's favourite tale of "Susan and her Lamb" is a safer and more normal type. Sir Walter said of it, "that where the little boy brings back the lamb to Susan, there is nothing for it but to put down the book and cry." Unfortunately, Miss Edgeworth has given her book of tales a terrible name, "The Parents' Assistant," which frightens parents and children alike in these days; but I know of no such delicious children's stories. "Sandford and Merton" is still enjoyed by children, but if we can, let us get it in the unexpurgated edition. The superfine taste of to-day objects to Harry Sandford's admirable reply to Mrs. Merton. "Mr. Barlow says, M'm, we should not drink unless we are dry." A modern little girl was heard to wish that Mr. Barlow took girls, "she thought there must be real fun in going to school with him." "Evenings at Home" might very well be written up to modern standards, as might Peter Parley's histories, which were dear to children, in their little square covers filled inside with wonderful woodcuts. There were other books beloved by children sixty years ago, which we are glad to know would not be tolerated to-day. We may hope that no children now are allowed into the torture chambers of "Laneton Parsonage," or are exposed to the morbid influences of such books as the "Old Helmet," "Queechy," "Home Influence," and "Ministering Children." Charles Kingsley did his best to discredit these. The "Fairchild Family" belongs to the same class of book, and has had a recent succès d'estime for its unconscious display of human nature. A little party of distinguished men and women, who had been brought up on the "Fairchild Family," recently acted a little play of the principal characters in a London drawing-room, to revenge themselves on the book.

There is no doubt, however, that children read these pernicious books again and again, and thoroughly enjoyed them. The child is a very serious little creature, occupied with the exploration of the world and all things in it; he likes to be taken seriously, he likes tales of other children—their joys, sorrows, and difficulties. It does not follow that all that he enjoys is wholesome for him, any more than a diet of unripe gooseberries. Some of the books we have mentioned thrilled and tortured him, but at least there was some stuff in them, something to think of, to remember, something real and tangible. We find nothing in many children's books of to-day. They are quite colourless and inane, they have no vitality, no spring of human character; there is no really good story-telling in them; no attempt, of course, at information of any kind. Modern literature for children seems to us, to use a characteristic French phrase, an immense nullité!

And yet, how important to a child's mind and character are those first books he reads—what impressions he may get from them, what interest they may excite, what curiosity they might rouse in Natural History and Science! It is in those very early days, and in the home, that a love and respect for books is fostered; we may add that a lasting distaste for reading may also be easily acquired. The old practice of reading aloud helped many children in days gone by to understand books which else would have been too hard for them, and greatly stimulated the desire of an intelligent child to help himself out of that dish. A child of ten, coming from a cultivated home, should have heard of the great masterpieces of the world in prose and rhyme. He might know his Lamb's "Tales from Shakespeare," a child's edition of "Don Quixote," and the "Arabian Nights." He might have had read to him in Pope's verse "The Tale of Troy," and the wanderings of Odysseus, might know "Tales from the Norse," and "Grimm's Fairy Tales," and the "Scandinavian Legends." These, with a carefully selected store of books of adventure, and children's books, "Treasure Island," "The Jungle Books," "Miss Edgeworth's Short Stories," "Alice," "Holiday House," "The Water Babies," "The Little Duke," the "Lances of Lynwood," &c., &c., would give him sufficient mental food and a love for books, and start him at school fairly—at all events he would not answer in class that "Mr. Sedgwick wrote the Odyssey!"

We have said nothing about style in books. But it is certain that children enjoy the lilt of Ballad form in verse, and will sing in recitative the lines that please them over and over again, and they will often correct the teller or reader of a tale who changes the words at a critical period of a story. Certain words seem to them appropriate, to "belong," and they will allow no others.

If it be objected that children will find such a course too hard and dry, the answer is that children have read, and do read, all these books with real love and joy—if you give a child rubbish, he will one day toss aside books in general as having no interest for him; if you give him a diet of lobster claw and yellow pickles, you will have destroyed his appetite for plain wholesome food. If, however, the child has the right book given him at the right time, he will read and enjoy it, supposing always you have not given him the taste for the wrong book. It comes then to this:—

- (1) What are the right books to give a young child, and in what sequence?
- (2) What are the results, if any, to be aimed at in the choice of books for his reading?
- (3) What books should a normal child of ten years of age have read?

In the answers to these questions should surely be found some satisfactory scientific basis for a good child's library. We imagine all would agree that imagination, admiration, observation, and reflection, need to be fostered and directed. Poor, thin, watery intellectual food cannot assist development. Fewer books, we say, but all of the best quality; and let us remember that it takes a genius to write a good child's book.

ETHELBERTHA HARRISON.

LOUISA ALCOTT.*

It is very good for a man to talk about what he does not understand; as long as he understands that he does not understand it. Agnosticism (which has, I am sorry to say, almost entirely disappeared from the modern world) is always an admirable thing, so long as it admits that the thing which it does not understand may be much superior to the mind which does not understand it. Thus if you say that the cosmos is incomprehensible, and really mean (as most moderns do) that it is not worth comprehending; then it would be much better for your Greek agnosticism if it were called by its Latin name of ignorance. But there is one thing that any man can fairly consider incomprehensible, and yet in some ways superior. There is one thing that any man may worry about, and still respect; I mean any woman. The deadly and divine cleavage between the sexes has compelled every woman and every man, age after age, to believe without understanding; to have faith without any knowledge.

Upon the same principle it is a good thing for any man to have to review a book which he cannot review. It is a good thing for his agnosticism and his humility to consider a book which may be much better than he can ever understand. It is good for a man who has seen many books which he could not review because they were so silly, to review one book which he cannot review because it is so wise. For wisdom, first and last, is the characteristic of women. They are often silly, they are always wise. Common sense is uncommon among men; but common sense is really and literally a common sense among women. And the sagacity of women, like the sagacity of saints, or that of donkeys, is something outside all questions of ordinary cleverness and ambition. The whole truth of the matter was revealed to Mr. Rudyard Kipling when the spirit of truth suddenly descended on him for the first and the last time, and he said: "Any woman can manage a clever man; but it requires a rather clever woman to manage a fool."

The wisdom of women is different; and this alone makes the review of such books by a man difficult. But the case is stronger. I for one will willingly confess that the only thing on earth I am frightfully afraid of is a little girl. Female children, she babies, girls up to the age of five are perfectly reasonable; but then all babies are reasonable. Grown girls and women give us at least glimpses of their meaning. But the whole of the period between a girl who is six years old and a girl who is sixteen is to me an abyss not only of mystery, but of terror. If the Prussians were invading England, and I were holding a solitary outpost, the best thing they could do would be to send a long rank or regiment of Prussian girls of twelve, from which I should fly, screaming.

Now these famous books of Miss Alcott are all about little girls. Therefore, my first impulse was to fly screaming. But I resisted this impulse, and I read the books; and I discovered to my immeasurable astonishment, that they were extremely good. "Little Women" was written by a woman for women—for little women. Consequently it anticipated realism by twenty or thirty years; just as Jane Austen anticipated it by at least a hundred years. For women are the only realists; their whole object in life is to pit their realism against the extravagant, excessive, and occasionally drunken idealism of men. I do not hesitate. I am not ashamed to name Miss Alcott and Miss Austen. There is, indeed, a vast division in the matter of literature (an unimportant matter), but there is the same silent and unexplained assumption of the feminine point of view. There is no pretence, as most unfortunately occurred in the case of other women of genius, like Georges Sand and George Eliot, that the writer is anything else but a woman, writing to amuse other women, with her awful womanly irony. Jane Austen did not call herself George Austen; nor Louisa Alcott call herself George Alcott. These women refrained from that abject submission to the male sex which we have since been distressed to see; the weak demand for masculine names and for a part in merely masculine frivolities; parliaments, for instance. These were strong women; they classed parliament with the public-house. But for another and better reason, I do not hesitate to name Miss Alcott by the side of Jane Austen; because her talent, though doubtless inferior, was of exactly the same kind. There is an unmistakable material truth about the thing; if that material truth were not the chief female characteristic, we should most of us find our houses burnt down when we went back to them. To take but one instance out of many, and an instance that a man can understand, because a man was involved, the account of the quite sudden and quite blundering proposal, acceptance, and engagement between Jod and the German professor under the umbrella, with parcels falling off them, so to speak, every minute, is one of the really human things in human literature; when you read it you feel sure that human beings have experienced it often; you almost feel that you have experienced it yourself. There is something true to all our own private diaries in the fact that our happiest moments have happened in the rain, or under some absurd impediment of absurd luggage. The same is true of a hundred other elements in the story. The whole affair of the children acting the different parts in Pickwick, forming a childish club under strict restrictions, in order to do so; all that is really life, even where it is not literature. And as a final touch of human truth, nothing could be better than the way in which Miss Alcott suggests the borders and the sensitive privacy of such an experiment. All the little girls have become interested, as they would in real life, in the lonely little boy next door; but when one of them introduces him into their private club in imitation of Pickwick, there is a general stir of resistance; these family fictions do not endure being considered from the outside.

* "The Works of Louisa Alcott." Sampson Low. New Edition. 6s. each volume.

All that is profoundly true; and something more than that is profoundly true. For just as the boy was an intruder in that club of girls, so any masculine reader is really an intruder among this pile of books. There runs through the whole series a certain moral philosophy, which a man can never really get the hang of. For instance, the girls are always doing something, pleasant or unpleasant. In fact, when they have not to do something unpleasant, they deliberately do something else. A great part, perhaps the more godlike part, of a boy's life, is passed in doing nothing at all. Real selfishness, which is the simplest thing in the world to a boy or man, is practically left out of the calculation. The girls may conceivably oppress and torture each other; but they will not indulge or even enjoy themselves—not, at least, as men understand indulgence or enjoyment. The strangest things are taken for granted; as that it is wrong in itself to drink champagne. But two things are quite certain; first, that even from a masculine standpoint, the books are very good; and second, that from a feminine standpoint they are so good that their admirers have really lost sight even of their goodness. I have never known, or hardly ever known, a really admirable woman who did not confess to having read these books. Haughty ladies of the Fabian Society confessed (under torture) that they liked them still. Stately Suffragettes rose rustling from the sofa and dropped "Little Women" on the floor, covering them with public shame. At learned ladies' colleges, it is, I firmly believe, handed about secretly, like a dangerous drug. I cannot understand this strange and simple world, in which unselfishness is natural, in which spite is easier than self-indulgence. I am the male intruder, like poor Mr. Lawrence and I withdraw. I back out hastily, bowing. But I am sure that I leave a very interesting world behind me.

G. K. CHESTERTON.

FAIRY TALES NEW AND OLD.*

THE law of change affects the fairy tale like other things, and perhaps it is not surprising to find Mr. Carl Ewald's "Two Legs and Other Stories" coming from the country

* "Two-Legs, and other Stories." By Carl Ewald. Methuen.
"Hans Andersen's Fairy Tales." With illustrations by Helen Stratton. Blackie and Son. 5s.

"Fairy Tales from the Arabian Nights." Edited and arranged by E. Dixon. Illustrated by John D. Batten. Dent. 5s. net.

"The Olive Fairy Book." Edited by Andrew Lang. Longmans, Green. 6s.

"On a Pincushion, and other Fairy Tales." By Mary de Morgan. Alexander Moring. 3s. 6d. net.

"The Welsh Fairy-Book." By W. Jenkyn Thomas. Fisher Unwin. 6s. net.

"Fairies I Have Met." By Mrs. Rodolph Stawell. Illustrated by Edmund Dulac. John Lane. 3s. 6d.

"The Enchanted Castle." By E. Nesbit. Fisher Unwin. 6s.

which produced Hans Andersen. Andersen's tales stand mid-way between the books that entirely delight children and those which, written for and about children, chiefly delight their elders. Most of his stories are pure playfulness; others conceal a gently ironic treatment of life in the guise of tales for children. "The Snow Queen," "The Goloshes of Fortune," "The Ugly Duckling," and "The Red Shoes," are all stories with morals which children may half perceive or not perceive at all. Mr. Ewald's stories are all morals. Their meaning, concealed from the child, like the meaning of "Gulliver's Travels," is patent to the grown-up reader. The theme of these remarkably clever tales is an ironic presentment of what the scientist conceives to be the true facts about natural life, that is the impartial and universal egotism of living things, and, most of all, of the supreme animal, man. This is specially the intention of "Two Legs," the most important tale of the series. Into the immense congregation of animal life enter the man and woman, walking erect, hand in hand, their foreheads high, their eyes steady. None of the congregation like their looks. But, as only man can combine with his fellows, the beasts, much as they would like to destroy the intruders, have to leave them alone. They soon have a taste of man's quality. For all his gentle looks, dragons of the prime prove to be "mellow music matched with him." He trains the dog to war with the wolf. He drives the otter out of the river, the monkey from the apple tree, and when his child is cold, tears the sheep's skin from his back to clothe it and himself, and devours the flesh. Calculation betters and overpowers impulse. The lower beasts kill when they are hungry; man stores and even pets his victims till he has need of them. And so, in turn, all the wild animals come to bemoan their dependence on this new and ruthless lord of life.

"He took away my wife and planted her in his garden," said the hop-vine.

"And he throws me out if I show the least, tiny green shoot," said the gout-weed.

"He shuts us up in hives," said the bee.

"He hunts us by clapping his hands and hitting us with cloths," said the moth.

"He locks us up and fattens us and eats us," grunted the pig.

"He sets traps for us if we try to get a morsel of food," said the mouse.

Mr. Ewald illustrates this egoism of all natural things in a number of briefer stories. The beeches out-grow the old oak and cut his path to the sun away from him. The female spider marries her mate in the evening and kills him in the morning. The wind at once fructifies and destroys, carelessly strewing thistle and dandelion seeds over the farmer's rye fields. Each being satisfies its needs in turn; the caterpillar at the gardener's expense; the parasitic fly at the caterpillar's; the swallow at the cost of the parasitic fly. Mr. Ewald's art is delicately conceived, and we suspect that children, whose imaginations are ruthless, will read him with delight. But his book is better food for their elders.

Meanwhile, we have a reprint of Hans Andersen, with pleasantly coloured illustrations by Miss Helen Stratton, and we cannot imagine a generation of children that will not delight in him. The same might be said of the collection of "Fairy Tales from the Arabian Nights," adorned with very delicately drawn and truly imaginative illustrations by Mr. John D. Batten, and produced by Mr. Dent with great care. Mr. Andrew Lang, in "The Olive Fairy Book," has drawn yet another volume from the immense French store of legends and contes, known as "Le Cabinet des Fées," first brought together in 1697, which the care of Messrs. Longmans provided for him. The tales in "The Olive Fairy Book" are largely Indian, and several of them are of Armenian origin. One of the prettiest is a translation of Anatole France's "Little King Loc."

Of truly original quality is the series called "On a Pincushion and Other Fairy Tales," by the late Miss de Morgan, with illustrations by her brother, the author of "Alice-for-Short." "Siegfrid and Handa" and "The Seeds of Love" have a certain suggestion of Andersen, but the setting is original and quite charming. In these tales the appeal is to the gentler side of children's nature, their sense of pity and their love of happy endings to their books, and the style is remarkable for its delicate simplicity. "The Welsh Fairy Book" is a collection of Welsh fairy stories by a Welsh schoolmaster, who has been given access to "Celtic Folklore: Welsh and Manx," and has drawn some very charming stories from these and other sources. In all these Celtic tales, the fairy visitant is not, as in the Oriental story, a rather theatrical portent and deus ex machina. He, or she, is woven closely and tenderly into the home life of the farming people, suffers with and by them, and leaves them only when the two schemes of existence cease to run together. Mr. Willy Pogany's illustrations are singularly fresh. We note one striking feature, and that is a charming revival of the decorative title and initial letter. The art of colour illustration advances indeed in astonishing fashion, as the purchasers of "Fairies I Have Met" can see for themselves. The text is by Mrs. Rodolph Stawell, a trifle precious for child readers. Mr. Dulac's experiments in colour and the fresh types of fairies, gnomes, wizards, and elves, to whom he introduces us, furnish the main distinction of this pretty book.

It is from Mrs. Nesbit, however, that the most original development of the modern fairy tale proceeds. Her stories are purely English. They take the English schoolboy or girl of to-day, without even idealising them, as Lewis Carroll idealises Alice. On this quite commonplace canvas Mrs. Nesbit paints a brilliantly varied pattern of grotesque adventure in which the real melts into the unreal, and the unreal is made to fade back again to reality, and French governesses, housemaids, policemen, and magic things and beings live together in a world where everything is topsy-turvy one moment and quite normal the next. "The Enchanted Castle" is as successful as most of Mrs. Nesbit's excursions into the under-world of a child's imagination, where the actual and the ideal lie down together in perfect accord.

SCIENCE FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

THE CHILDREN'S BOOK OF STARS. By G. E. Mitton. Adam and Charles Black. 6s.

THE writer of a book on science for children should keep continuously two great objects in view—the one to use very simple language suitable to those addressed, and the other to use terms so strictly in accordance with scientific accuracy that the young pupil will not acquire any erroneous notion which will have to be uprooted from the mind at a later period. The authoress of this very pleasing book succeeds fairly well in maintaining a simple style all through—a difficult matter in such a subject as Astronomy—an occasional lapse into a rather big, or "grown up," expression escaping her vigilance; but as regards the second object, it appears to us that the desire to be very simple has led occasionally to an expression requiring alteration.

We have read every page of the book with pleasure—all the greater because the writer takes that broad-minded view of the universe which refuses to confine the existence of living and intelligent beings to this insignificant little planet of ours, and because we regard the contrary teaching of the young as almost morally disastrous. How delightful it is, for example, to read in the pages dealing with Mars the evident belief in its inhabitants, the difficulties with which they have to contend, and the excitement with which they cry "The Floods are coming!" when their canals begin to be filled in summer with the liquid from their melted polar cap!

As we must be brief in our observations, we offer to the authoress (whose personal friendship with Miss Agnes Clerke is in itself a strong claim to our attention) the following considerations for the next edition. The science at the top of p. 16 is unsound, and that in p. 18 is vague. In p. 54 Mercury should be "he" and not "she." To speak of the earth's axis and those of other planets as "bent" instead of inclined (pp. 56, 76) is misleading. Herschel did not call Uranus the "Georgius," but the "Georgium," Sidus (p. 81). The "rôle" of names (p. 84) should be the "roll." Was it to a "professor of Astronomy at Cambridge" that Adams gave his results (p. 86)? A comet should not be described as "he"; and at the top of p. 118 the use of this expression misleads the reader. It is not the angle (p. 118) at which a comet flies off that determines its return. In p. 149 for "every child" read "all children." Light should not be spoken of as a "force" (p. 161). For "Arcturus" (p. 169) read "Sirius."

THE KING OF THE AIR; OR TO MOROCCO IN AN AIRSHIP. By Herbert Strang. Coloured Illustrations by W. E. Webster. Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton. 2s. 6d.

WITH AIRSHIP AND SUBMARINE. A Tale of Adventure. By Harry Collingwood. Blackie & Son. 6s.

The great advances made in the solution of the problem of aerial navigation bring a rich harvest of practical science and adventure, as well as stimulants to scientific imagination, to modern boys and girls. Mr. Herbert Strang's book releases Sir Harry Maclean before his time, and we trust that diplomacy will, though slow, be as effective as the wonderful power of Mr. Strang's airship. This machine was provided with guiding planes, and horizontal and vertical screw propellers, which enabled it to go forward, to rise or sink, and to alight gently, the energy for driving being derived from a powder manufactured for photographic purposes by a German firm at Düsseldorf, the application of this in the form of a paste to aerial propulsion being, however, unknown to the Germans, and known only to Mr. Strang and the constructors of his airship. No doubt Mr. Strang's little readers (and they will be many) will do their best to find out all about it; and, even if they do not succeed, they will learn a good deal in the attempt, and be entranced by the thrilling adventures of the crew on sea, on land, and in a Moroccan prison, for the release of "Sir Mark Ingleton." We could wish that the enthusiastic, if too commercially minded, German, Herr Schwab, were not so mercilessly caricatured all through the book; and we would plead for more sympathetic treatment of German character in a second edition. The representation is neither just nor conducive to friendly relations with the most scientific and progressive people in Europe. However, apart from this blemish, we can recommend this combination of scientific principles and appliances with thrilling adventures.

In Mr. Collingwood's book a German figures again; but he is of a stamp entirely different from Mr. Strang's Herr Schwab. Professor von Schalckenberg, the inventor of the ship which is, according to requirement, aerial or submarine, is much more like the German whom we know. The ship of this exceedingly exhilarating and scientific story had the shape of an enormous cigar, six hundred feet long and sixty in breadth amidships, fitted with numerous airtight chambers, the exhaustion of the air in which caused the craft to rise thousands of feet above the earth. The solid body was made of a new metal discovered by the Professor and called aethereum, of extraordinary lightness and strength; and the energy was supplied by certain crystals which, when treated in one way, yielded "electricity in enormous volumes" (whatever that may mean), and when treated with a certain acid produced an expansive gas of stupendous potency, by means of which the screw-propellers of the "Flying Fish" (as the ship was called) were driven at a speed of more than a thousand revolutions a minute. The "Flying Fish" could travel through the air at 120 miles an hour. There was, of course, no necessity for guiding planes nor any danger of instability such as that with which aeroplane ships have to contend.

The rescue of an innocent Russian colonel from a convict ship in the Black Sea, carrying a load of poor creatures to Eastern Siberia, is followed by a narrative of adventure in the heart of the great Central African forest, where many tragedies in animal life are witnessed; the habits of elephants, lions, rhinoceroses, okapis, gorillas, and other creatures are observed, and the existence of a real unicorn (not a one-horned rhinoceros) established. Thus we get our natural history in a very interesting form—all true to nature, so far as we know, with the doubtful exception of the unicorn. Here also a wireless telephone is used, and performs wonders. Then follow adventures on and under the sea, including the capture of one of the crew by a huge octopus, who, however, gives up as a bad job any attempt to break through the aethereum diving dress of his intended

THE MOST IMPORTANT THEOLOGICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL BOOKS OF THE SEASON.

Professor Sir W. M. RAMSAY.

THE CITIES OF ST. PAUL. Their Influence on His Life and Thought. By W. M. RAMSAY, Kt., Hon. D.C.L., Professor of Humanity in the Aberdeen University. With Illustrations. Price 12s.

Principal A. E. GARVIE.

STUDIES IN THE INNER LIFE OF JESUS. By ALFRED E. GARVIE, M.A. (Oxon.), D.D. (Glas.), Principal of New College, London. Price 7s. 6d. net.

Professor JAMES ORR.

THE VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST. By JAMES ORR, M.A., D.D., Professor of Apologetics and Systematic Theology in the United Free Church College, Glasgow. Price 6s.

Principal P. T. FORSYTH.

POSITIVE PREACHING AND MODERN MIND. By P. T. FORSYTH, M.A., D.D., Principal of Hackney College, London. Price 7s. 6d. net.

The late Professor JOHN LAIDLAW.

STUDIES IN THE PARABLES, AND OTHER SERMONS. By Professor JOHN LAIDLAW, D.D. With Memoir by Professor H. R. MACRINTOSH, D.Phil. Price 6s.

The late Dr. JOHN WATSON.

GOD'S MESSAGE TO THE HUMAN SOUL. By JOHN WATSON, D.D. Price 5s. net.

Professor B. B. WARFIELD.

THE LORD OF GLORY. A Study of the Designations of our Lord in the New Testament, with especial reference to His Deity. By Professor B. B. WARFIELD, D.D., LL.D. Price 6s. net.

Rev. G. H. MORRISON.

THE WINGS OF THE MORNING. Addresses from a Glasgow Pulpit. By G. H. MORRISON, M.A. Price 5s.

Professor HUGH BLACK.

CHRIST'S SERVICE OF LOVE. By HUGH BLACK, Professor of Practical Theology, Union Theological Seminary, New York. Price 6s.

The Life of Dr. BARNARDO.

MEMOIRS OF THE LATE DR. BARNARDO. By Mrs. BARNARDO and JAMES MARCHANT. With an Introduction by W. ROBERTSON NICOLL. Illustrated. Price 12s.

The Life of Dr. GEORGE MATHESON.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE MATHESON, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E. By D. MACMILLAN, M.A., D.D. With Photogravure Portrait. Price 7s. 6d.

The Life of THOMAS ALVA EDISON.

THOMAS ALVA EDISON. Sixty Years of an Inventor's Life. By FRANCIS ARTHUR JONES. Illustrated. Price 6s. net.

Professor W. H. BENNETT.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST, ACCORDING TO ST. MARK. By W. H. BENNETT, M.A., D.D., Litt.D., Professor, Hackney College and New College, London. Price 6s.

Professor CHARLES FOSTER KENT.

THE STUDENT'S OLD TESTAMENT. Volume IV. Israel's Laws and Legal Precedents. By Professor CHARLES FOSTER KENT, Ph.D. (Complete in Six Volumes.) Price 12s. net each.

[Prospectus on application.]

Dr. ALEXANDER MACLAREN.

EXPOSITIONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. By ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D., D.Litt. Third Series. Six Volumes. 1. Acts, Vol. II. 2. St. John, Vol. I. 3. St. John, Vol. II. 4. St. John, Vol. III. 5. II. Kings, Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah. 6. Esther, Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes. 24s. net the Series. Separate Volumes, 7s. 6d.

Professor G. F. WRIGHT.

SCIENTIFIC CONFIRMATIONS OF OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By Professor G. F. WRIGHT, D.D., LL.D. Price 6s.

Colonel MACKINLAY.

THE MAGI: How They Recognised Christ's Star. By Lieut.-Col. G. MACKINLAY. With a Preface by Prof. Sir W. M. RAMSAY. Price 6s.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, Warwick Square, London, E.C.

victim. Throughout the whole of this narrative of the "Flying Fish" we have a feeling of existing in a region of scientific romance to which, however, from the actual world of reality there seems to be but a short step.

THE ROMANCE OF THE WORLD'S FISHERIES: Interesting Descriptions of the Many and Curious Methods of Fishing in all Parts of the World. By Sidney Wright. Seeley & Co. 5s.

DENIZENS OF THE DEEP. By F. Martin Duncan, F.R.P.S. Cassell & Co. 5s.

We do not see the appropriateness of the term "Romance" as applied in the title of Mr. Sidney Wright's book, which is a very sober record of facts relating to the habits of sailors, the construction of the boats, nets, and fishing gear which they use, and a thousand other things appertaining to their calling. The author seems to have omitted no country and no marine animal which is the object of pursuit; but it is not until we reach the part of the book dealing with the fishing in Eastern countries that we begin to feel the schoolboy's interest. In the early chapters, which deal with our own fisheries, the most interesting will be found to be that describing the habits of the salmon. The account of the Chinese fishing with cormorants is really entertaining, and the description of the shame-faced cormorant who returns empty-handed—or rather empty-billed—to his employer is full of amusement. The story of the north-eastern fisherman who visited London for a few hours and "steered" himself about by means of a compass and the weather-cocks is in the same light vein. The main purpose of the book is, however, not amusement but instruction. The later chapters contain an excellent account of whale, sponge, turtle, and seal fishing, with many illustrations; and the book can be recommended as a very valuable source of information relating to every kind of fishing.

Mr. Duncan's book is concerned chiefly with such marine plants and animals as we may meet along the shores of these islands, more particularly those most interesting of all shores which are to be found round the West and North of Ireland and of Scotland—the shores on which stretches of gravel full of burrowing bivalves alternate with seaweed-covered rocks and great deep pools, in which we expect to find a large variety of marine creatures. We who have visited such coasts know the excitement of trying to overturn some great, scarcely moveable, rock, which forms an almost complete cover to a large pool; and when at last we have heaved it over, what a splashing and a lashing of tails we hear; and when we have waited for the water to clear after this commotion, how many creatures more or less successfully concealed do we see! These form a considerable portion of Mr. Duncan's subject, but he deals with many others besides, all of which are represented by photographs taken by himself.

Perhaps the first chapters dealing with plants are somewhat too technical in their language, and might be curtailed, while some more of the above-mentioned pool dwellers might be introduced. With some simplification of language here and there, the work will be found to be a useful handbook for boys in their rambles along the shore.

G. M. M.

BOUTET DE MONVEL.

ON the cover of a French picture book,* an illustrated story of Jeanne d'Arc intended for young readers, there is a design in line representing a corps of modern French troops, advancing at the double. Leading them is a slight, fair figure, clad in medieval armour and mounted on horseback, whom one has no difficulty in recognising as Jeanne d'Arc herself. Within the book the same design, which is both an historical anachronism and a dainty patriotic symbol, is reproduced in colour as a frontispiece, and the following series of colour pictures illustrates the career of the French heroine. The work is that of M. Boutet de Monvel, painter and illustrator, whose drawings have adorned many books, but none, as it seems to the writer, with the amazing success that these achieve. For here to the accompaniment of a text, which, despite its simple phrasing, vibrates under the intensity of the old romance, the sequence of pictorial ideas sings a wonderfully tuneful melody, swelling at times to dramatic passion, at times sinking to the gentlest modulations, but always well controlled by its central motive and well ordered in its sound technique. A production of this kind which can so readily attract notice and hold admiration tempts one to try and probe the secret of its author's success and if possible divine the sources by which his inspiration is fed.

The technical features of the Jeanne d'Arc drawings are soon done with. M. Monvel works in flat tints and clean, rhythmical line, never losing sight of his decorative intention. Realism he admits partially; the picture of Jeanne pleading before her judges, or that of her beset by a gaping crowd, and beating the church door which has shut out the last consolations of her creed, are cases in point. Perhaps one might say that realism is introduced sufficiently to humanise the triumph, the anguish, or the fear of the characters, with as little expenditure of facial modelling as possible. Of realistic modelling, in the sense we understand it to-day, there is little or no trace; the artist gives the sense of reality by some subtle and elusive process, which it is impossible to analyse. In order to realise how subtle are his means, one may compare him for the moment with two of his accomplished contemporaries, both of whom are illustrators of history. Take M. Leloir, whose "Richelieu" is one of his successes. His elaborate, many-figured compositions are not merely historically accurate expositions of the time, though one may note that the scrupulous fidelity to details is characteristic of this artist, as of so many of his French compeers; they are built upon noble qualities of design, space composition, and dexterity in colour harmony. Yet their realism differs from that of M. Monvel in being unmistakably obvious, and unmistakably French. Modern French illustration, from Daumier to Forain, has, like modern French painting, all tended towards realism—to realism which, we would say, is tinged with caricature. Its quality has been happily suggested by M. de la Sizeranne, in his use of the term caractérisme, denoting something that is less caricature than emphatic characterisation, that steps beyond what we should call portraiture, and stops short of the grotesque. Phil May introduced this emphasis into his character studies, but its real home is France, where it is an emanation, not only of the national art, but of the national character and temperament; to be classed with the emphasis of speech and gesture. M. Leloir's historic characters are typically French in this respect. So are those of "Job," whose well-known personifications appear to have influenced somewhat the style of M. Leloir. But M. Monvel's are not. Like Puvis de Chavannes, he stands a little aloof from the main current of modern French æsthetics, apart by reason of a greater delicacy, a more individual outlook, a more poetic conception.

Puvis de Chavannes has been mentioned, and, in the strength of his decorative feeling and the restraint of his modelling, M. Monvel bears some resemblance to this master, and appears to possess some of his affection for the naïveté of the primitives. But when one comes to the question of colour, it is like exchanging the twilight for the sunlight, for save in one or two cool-toned drawings—such as Jeanne prostrate at the base of the fortress whence she has fallen in trying to escape—M. Monvel is the essence of vivacious gaiety. Reds and purples, mauves and greens, mingle in a dream of barbaric splendour; amethyst is wedded to opal, gold and silver to pink coral; it is the palette of Tintoret, not of Corot. Yet the variety of tints is a demonstration rather than a riot, a clever balance of tones and an arrangement of Japanese orderliness keeping the exuberance within bounds. The art of the East has undoubtedly influenced M. Monvel in no small degree. Though this is not an exclusive quality, since one may safely say that every decorative artist in Europe owes something to the same source, its influence on his talent is worth a moment's attention. He seems to have extracted from Japanese art one of its less obvious and more important secrets, namely, the secret of combining decorative treatment with forceful verisimilitude. In the battle pieces, especially, the sense of movement is overwhelming; yet the treatment is conventionally decorative, when one comes to analyse it, and the

* "Jeanne d'Arc." Paris: Plon-Nourrit.

"Nos Enfants." Par Anatole France. Illustré par Boutet de Monvel. Paris: Hachette. 4fr.

THE CHRIST FACE IN ART.

By the Rev. J. BURNS.

62 Illustrations, cr. 8vo. 6s.

 An ideal volume for presentation.

FOLKLORE OF THE HOLY LAND.

By J. E. HANAUER.

Introduction by MARMADUKE PICKTHALL. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

STOPFORD BROOKE'S NEW VOLUME.

STUDIES IN POETRY.

Cr. 8vo, 6s. net, Photogravure Portrait.

WILLIAM ARCHER AND GRANVILLE BARKER. A NATIONAL THEATRE.

Cr. 4to, 5s. net.

REMBRANDT.

By Prof. BALDWIN BROWN. 46 Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

NATURE IN GREEK ART.

By Prof. EMANUEL LÖWY.

Translated by J. FOTHERGILL. 30 Illustrations, 5s. net.

THOUGHTS OF LEONARDO.

Edited by EDWARD McCURDY.

Uniform with "The Roadmender." 2s. 6d. net.

ETHICS OF REVOLT.

By Dr. GREVILLE MACDONALD. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

HAUNTERS OF THE SILENCES.

By CHARLES G. D. ROBERTS.

50 Illustrations, some coloured, 6s. net.

"Told with all the enthusiasm of a born naturalist. There is not a dull page in the book."—Scotsman.

"Makes a strong appeal to the minds of young people."—Country Life.

THE PRODIGAL NEPHEW.

By JUDSON BOLT. With Illustrations by FRED BENNETT.

336 pages, 3s. 6d.

"Commended to all who care for a hearty laugh. Excellent fooling."—Standard.

PARTNERS OF PROVIDENCE.

By CH. D. STEWART. 100 Quaint Illustrations, 6s.

"Deserves a place very near that pair of immortals, Huckleberry Finn and Tom Sawyer. Altogether one of the best boy's books which have seen light for many a day."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"THE REAL HODGE."

MEMOIRS OF A SURREY LABOURER.

By GEORGE BOURNE. 6s.

A genuine book of the country. The natural, unconscious talk of a type which is getting rare. The "Westminster Gazette" puts this book beside Stevenson's "Memories and Portraits."

"ACT OF GOD."

By ROBERT ELLIOTT. 6s. [Second Impression].

Punch says:—"One of the most remarkable books it has been my good fortune to read for many a year. A fine and powerful piece of work."

VRONINA.

By OWEN VAUGHAN (Owen Rhoscomyl). 6s.

"Keeps the attention eager. Never fails to stimulate. Has an excitement that is without pause. Is more that ordinarily good."—Academy.

THE DANCE OF LOVE.

By DION CLAYTON CALTHROP. 6s.

The Morning Post says it is "characteristic, poetic, full of colour and movement."

The World finds in it "genius and charm which raises it to the lofty region of True Romance."

Messrs. DUCKWORTH wish to call attention to a New Volume of Sea Stories by JAMES B. CONNOLLY,

THE CRESTED SEAS.

JUST OUT. Cr. 8vo, 8 Illustrations. 6s.

DUCKWORTH & CO.,
3, Henrietta Street, W.C.

J. M. DENT & CO.

Just Ready.

Just Ready.

FLOWER GROUPING IN ENGLISH, SCOTCH, AND IRISH GARDENS.

Text by Rose Kingsley, The Hon. Emily Lawless, "E.V.B.," F. Curvey, F. Graham Stirling, S. Wyndham Fitzherbert, F. Galsworthy, W. Richmond Powell, R. P. Brotherston, S. Arnott and Walter P. Wright. Notes and 56 Illustrations in colour by Margaret Waterfield. Quarto. One guinea net. Prospectus post free.

A companion volume to MISS WATERFIELD'S "GARDEN COLOUR" now in its Fourth Edition.

PALGRAVE'S GOLDEN TREASURY.

With 25 Illustrations in Colour and many in Line by

R. ANNING BELL.

Cloth, 10s. 6d. net; watered silk, 12s. 6d. net. Edition de Luxe, bound in full vellum, One Guinea net. Prospectus post free.

"A happy idea, happily carried out."—Daily Chronicle.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

With over 100 Illustrations in Colour, Line, and Half-Tone by ARTHUR RACKHAM.

Uniform in size with "Peter Pan," etc. Buckram, 15s. net. Prospectus post free.

"Likely to take the town by storm."—Athenæum.

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

By EDMUND G. GARDNER, M.A.

Author of "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," "The Story of Florence," etc., etc., with an appendix containing some hitherto unpublished letters of St. Catherine. A study of the Italian Religion, Literature, and History of the XIVth century. Illustrated in Photogravure. Cloth, 16s. net. Prospectus post free.

OLD AND NEW JAPAN.

By CLIVE HOLLAND.

Author of "My Japanese Wife." With 50 Illustrations in Colour by MONTAGUE SMYTH. Cloth 15s. net.

"Mr. Clive Holland is a lover of Japan. He writes with a genuine enthusiasm for his subject."

No one could read this volume without desiring to visit the 'one land which neither disappoints nor palls.'—Daily News.

Prospectus post free.

WEST HAM.

By EDWARD G. HOWARTH and MONA WILSON. A study in social and industrial problems. Cloth, 6s. net. Prospectus post free.

The Old Silver Sacramental Vessels of Foreign Protes- tant Churches in England.

By E. ALFRED JONES, author of "Old English Gold Plate," etc., etc. With 22 Plates in Photogravure and Half-Tone. Royal 4to. One Guinea net. Prospectus post free.

CITIES OF ITALY.

By ARTHUR SYMONS.

A Collection of Essays dealing with Rome, the Improvement of Rome, Venice, the waters of Venice, Naples, Ravenna, Pisa, Siena, Verona, Bologna, Bergamo, Lorenzo Lotto, Brescia, and Roumanino; and "On a Rembrandt in Milan." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

DICKENS' CHRISTMAS STORIES.

Each volume has 8 full-page Coloured Illustrations from Water-Colour Drawings by C. E. BROCK, together with many Line Drawings by the same Artist. Five vols. New ready.

The Battle of Life.

The Haunted Man.

A Christmas Carol.

The Chimes.

The Cricket on the Hearth.

Large fcap. 8vo. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net per vol. Vellum, 5s. net per vol.

The Daily News says:—"Mr. Brock is obviously the artist for the work. The Drawings possess all the high qualities of Mr. Brock's art—the exquisite draughtsmanship, the generous humanity, the fine old crusted eighteenth century atmosphere."

ENGLISH IDYLLS.

Illustrated by C. E. BROCK.
Volumes now ready.

Pride and Prejudice. By JANE AUSTEN.

Northanger Abbey. By JANE AUSTEN.

Christmas at Bracebridge Hall. By WASHINGTON IRVING.

Sir Thomas More. By ANNIE MANNING.

Silas Marner. By GEORGE ELIOT.

Cranford. By MRS. GASKELL.

The Vicar of Wakefield. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

Our Village. By MISS MITFORD.

Each with 24 Illustrations in Colour by C. E. BROCK. Cloth, 5s. net; Vellum, 8s. 6d. net each.

THE OLD VENETIAN PALACES, AND OLD VENETIAN FOLK.

By THOMAS OKEY.

Author of "Venice and its Story," now in its Third Edition; with 50 Illustrations in Colour, and many in Line by TREVOR HADDON, R.E.A. Also reproductions from RUSKIN. Quarto, One Guinea net. Prospectus post free.

"A volume of quite exceptional charm and interest. . . . Mr. Haddon's illustrations are very beautiful; he has caught the true inwardness of Venetian scenery."—Guardian.

Kindly write for a copy of Dent's Illustrated List of Books suitable for Xmas Gifts, post free from repetition of one or more ultra-conventional motives, such as that of the connecting lance, or pike, or halberd, makes one suspect it to be even more conventional than one thinks. But the action, we repeat, is eloquent. By dint of rhythmical and swirling line and curve, he has made the warriors spring forward and the horses charge like impetuous torrents. Their vigour is little less than terrific.

J. M. Dent & Co., 10, Aldine House, Bedford St., W.C.

It is, therefore, the sense of movement, not less than colour, that distinguishes M. Monvel's art from that of Puvis de Chavannes, whose guiding principle is the sense of repose, and brings it nigh to that of the Japanese masters. Yet, once more, it is not as abstract as the Japanese. It is tinged with some of the fullness and richness of Western realism; it even has a trifle of the Greek purity of form. It is a hybrid art, an aggregation of other arts, which a Latin genius has welded into its own individuality, and stamped with its own mark, just as the great French furniture makers assimilated the best of what was Flemish and Italian, and created out of it their own. This power of assimilation and recreation is peculiar to France. It is especially peculiar to M. Monvel, who can thus call up the sentiment and savagery, the peace and strife, of an age long passed in scenes that stir and forms that fascinate by their beauty.

FOR THE REAL CHILD.*

THE nursery never gives reasons for its judgments upon men and books. It likes and it hates, just as grown-up people do; but grown-up people always try to justify their attitude, and the nursery never does. That is one point of difference between children and grown-up people; I am not sure it is not the only difference. For there is no real foundation for the assertion that a children's book cannot be suitable for children if it pleases the grown-up person as well. On the contrary, a children's book that does not please the grown-up person stands a very poor chance of success in the nursery or school-room. Of course, I am referring to the intelligent grown-up person. There are numbers of books that please unintelligent grown-up persons that children would reject with scorn.

Illustrations and binding have nothing to do with it. Children enjoy pictures, just as grown-up people do; but, like grown-up people, they rather prefer to keep these apart from stories. At the same time, with the judicial fairness of the nursery, they do not allow pictures to form an insuperable barrier to affection, if the story they illustrate is of the right sort. In that case, they merely ignore the pictures; and if these drop out as the pages grow loose—a great mark of intimacy as far as the book is concerned—why, so much the better. In saying this I am not in any way depreciating the artistic value of the pictures in the seven books before me, which are all excellent, especially Miss Helen Stratton's in "Heroic Legends," and Mr. H. J. Ford's in "Tales of Troy and Greece." I am merely pointing out that children will prefer a book without pictures, such as "Cradle Tales from Hinduism." In fact, the demand of the child is that of any sane grown-up person. It is a demand for stirring fiction, with real characterisation, real imagination, and the right amount of humour in the right place. And above all, the nursery demands that its books should be seriously written. I have seen a small boy turn with relief to Napier's "History of the Peninsular War," because he preferred something he could barely understand to a so-called children's book that insulted his understanding by ignoring it altogether.

There is a touch of this kind of patronage in "A Wonder Book of Old Romance"; that is, if, as I am supposing, its irritating archaisms are intended as an appeal to the juvenile mind. No one, in the nursery or out of it, supposes that people in the Middle Ages talked exactly as they do to-day; but unless an exact reproduction of medieval language is given, in which case one would obviously choose to read the original stories, everybody wants these to be retold in good literary English, that is neither representative nor unrepresentative of any period. All the people in the book, whatever their nationality, are "fain" to do this and that; "nigh" is always used for "near"; and the result of this compromise between ancient and modern speech is an occasional ugly sentence of this kind: "I fear not even death, so as you be safe." This lack of honesty in style is the more regrettable as the choice of stories shows so much discrimination. Boys and girls alike will respond to the appeal made to their imagination in such stories as "William and the Werewolf"; to their love of adventure in "King Horn," "Guy of Warwick," "Havelok the Dane"; to their love of "scoring off" an enemy, in "Sir Cleges and the Cherries." "Floris and Blanche fleur" is a fairy story, pure and simple, telling of the beautiful slave girl who was sold for "seven times her weight in gold," and of her lover Prince, who went to seek her, equipped with "seven horses of price for his gear, two of them laden with silver and gold, two with money to spend on the way, and three with costly raiment."

In her collection of "Heroic Legends," Miss Herbertson has recognised the importance of good workmanlike English in rendering old-world romance; but she is inclined to overburden her stories with incident that she has not space to elaborate, and which, therefore, fails sometimes to catch the imagination in passing. "The Two Brothers," for instance, possesses all the features that attract lovers of romance, including a beautiful and wronged heroine. But, just at the end, when we expect to read how the villain was killed to slow torture and the heroine reinstated, the whole thing is dismissed in one short paragraph, which, properly expanded, would have made a good story in itself. The same criticism applies to the tales of Robin Hood, Roland, William Tell; that is why "The Knight of the Ill-Shapen Coat," to which it does not apply, is the most effective story in the book—and that should not be so, considering the magnificent material wasted in some of the others.

Greek stories do not seem to tempt their translators to tamper with the English language quite so disastrously as the merely medieval manuscript appears to do. In "The Children's Iliad," Mr. Church is frankly appealing to readers who as yet know no Greek; but he does so seriously and not patronisingly, and consequently maintains the right tone throughout his book. For little children his version of the story of Troy is an admirable one, catching as it does the simple narrative style of the original, so that any part of it would be effective if read aloud—and that is important in the case of people who cannot yet read for themselves. And we gather that Mr. Church's book is intended mainly for small and immature persons of this description, from the significant and interesting dedication, "To Alfred the Third—Across the Sea." There are many Alfreds the Third on this side of the sea, too; and I hope most of them will have "The Children's Iliad" read to them this Christmas. For it may help to give them a high standard of fiction for the rest of their lives.

Older children, by which I mean school girls, school boys, and those of all ages who have never properly grown up, will prefer "Tales of Troy and Greece." Mr. Lang has never done anything better than this scholarly and fascinating rendering of the fine old stories of Ulysses, of the Golden Fleece, and of Theseus and Perseus. Best of them all is the life story of Ulysses, the best adventure story that was ever put together; and every lover of romance will be carried along afresh by the swing of it, right up to the dramatic finish, when the wanderer returns in time to slay

* "A Wonder Book of Old Romance." By F. J. Harvey Darton. Wells, Gardner. 6s. net.

"Heroic Legends." By Agnes Grozier Herbertson. Blackie. 6s. net.

"The Children's Iliad." By the Rev. A. J. Church. Seeley 5s.

"Tales of Troy and Greece." By Andrew Lang. Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.

"The Golden Porch." By W. M. L. Hutchinson. Edward Arnold. 5s.

"The Story of Isis and Osiris." By Lily Schofield. J. M. Dent. 2s. 6d. net.

"Cradle Tales of Hinduism." By Sister Nivedita (Margaret Noble). Longmans. 5s. net.

MESSRS.

BELL'S BOOKSIllustrated List of BOOKS FOR PRESENTS

Sent Post Free on Application.

The Children's Christmas Book.

Second Edition. Crown 4to. 5s. net.

THE PETER PAN PICTURE BOOK

The Story of Peter Pan retold by DANIEL O'CONNOR, from the Play by J. M. Barrie. With 28 full-page Illustrations in Colour by ALICE B. WOODWARD. Also an EDITION DE LUXE, limited to 250 copies, the text on hand-made paper, the Plates mounted. 10s. 6d. net.

"As near the ideal as one could wish. To some children indeed, it will be as good as seeing the play."—Nation.

"Miss Woodward's pictures are really delightful. The whimsical flavour of the fairy play is faithfully reflected, while for rich and harmonious colouring and decorative quality of design they would be difficult to surpass."—Athenæum.

"It would be difficult to imagine anything more dainty. The pictures are exquisitely beautiful, and to follow the story in Mr. Daniel O'Connor's version is almost as fascinating as it was to see Mr. Barrie's quaint creation on the stage."—Glasgow Herald.

Just published. Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT CONTINENTAL CHINA.

By C. H. WYLDE. With 40 Plates, and upwards of 400 Facsimiles of Marks.

Uniform with Mrs. Willoughby Hodgson's popular book on English China and Earthenware.

NOW READY.—Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT POSTAGE-STAMPS.

By BERTRAM T. K. SMITH. With 48 Plates, illustrating upwards of 750 specimens.

"No better guide could be put into the hands of the intending collector, and even the hardened philatelist may learn a great deal from its pages."—Manchester Guardian.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

ART AND THE CAMERA.

By ANTONY GUEST. With 49 illustrations.

"The book cannot be read without realization of the great possibilities of photography. It should be studied by amateurs and professionals alike."—Standard.

THE ENDYMION SERIES.

NEW AND CHEAPER UNIFORM EDITION.

Post 8vo, 3s. 6d. net each.

"It may justly be claimed for the charming Endymion Series that it is the best illustrated edition of the British poets that has yet appeared."—Studio.

POEMS BY JOHN KEATS. Illustrated and Decorated by ROBERT ANNING BELL. With an Introduction by Professor WALTER RALEIGH, M.A. 4th Edition.

POEMS BY ROBERT BROWNING. Illustrated and Decorated by BYAM SHAW. With an Introduction by RICHARD GARNETT, LL.D., C.B. 3rd Edition.

POEMS BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY. Illustrated and Decorated by ROBERT ANNING BELL. With an Introduction by Professor WALTER RALEIGH, M.A.

POEMS BY TENNYSON. Illustrated and Decorated by ELEANOR FORTESCUE BRICKDALE.

ENGLISH LYRICS from Spenser to Milton. Illustrated and Decorated by R. ANNING BELL. With an Introduction by JOHN DENNIS.

THE POEMS OF EDGAR ALLEN POE. Illustrated and Decorated by W. HEATH ROBINSON. With an Introduction by NOEL WILLIAMS.

TWO NEW NOVELS.THE DOINGS OF BERENGARIA.

By SHELLAND BRADLEY, Author of "An American Girl in India." Crown 8vo, 6s.

Like the author's last book, this volume gives, in a series of amusing sketches, a picture, drawn from life, of English Official Society in India.

THE STORY OF AN ALPINE WINTER.

By MRS. AUBREY LE BLOND, Author of "True Tales of Mountain Adventure," "Cities and Sights of Spain." Crown 8vo, 5s.

A tale the scene of which is laid at St. Moritz, and which embodies an account, from an expert's point of view, of the social life and healthy sport which are now so characteristic of Switzerland in winter.

London:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal St., W.C.

CHAMBERS'S XMAS BOOKSFOR
BOYS and GIRLS.

Charmingly Illustrated and Beautifully Bound in special cover design.

L. T. MEADE'S NEW BOOKS FOR GIRLS.A GIRL FROM AMERICA. 6s.

"A most attractive young person."—Truth.

THREE GIRLS FROM SCHOOL. 5s.

"Mrs. Meade has never written a better story . . . will be read and re-read . . . one of the best of the season's gift books."—Schoolmaster.

THE SCAMP FAMILY. 3s. 6d.

"A racy story, in which younger readers will in particular revel."—Glasgow News.

MAY BALDWIN'S NEW SCHOOL STORIESMYISIE; A Highland Lassie. 5s.

"The Macphersons are charming children . . . an exhilarating book, which also abounds with incidents of rarely delicate pathos."—Daily News.

THE FOLLIES OF FIFI. 3s. 6d.

"A French schoolgirl, who, with all her vivacity and frivolity, is really quite charming."—Newcastle Chronicle.

RAYMOND JACBERNS' NEW STORIES FOR GIRLS.THAT IMP MARCELLA. 3s. 6d.

"Marcella is one of the best, kindest romps in the world."—Freeman's Journal.

A DISCONTENTED SCHOOLGIRL. 5s.

"The right ring echoes throughout the whole story, which girls will dub 'first-rate.'"—Schoolmaster.

G. M. FENN'S NEW ADVENTURE STORY.TRAPPED BY MALAYS. 5s.

"There will be a big run on 'Trapped by Malays.'"—Sheffield Independent.

ANDREW HOME'S NEW SCHOOL TALE.WELL PLAYED. 5s.

"One of the really good things of the season in the way of boys' books."—Glasgow Herald.

GORDON STABLES' NEW BOOK.A LITTLE GIPSY LASS. 3s. 6d.

"Bright and original, this story is full of what girls love as much as do boys—adventure."—World.

MABEL QUILLER-COUCH'STROUBLESOME URSULA. 3s. 6d.

"It is written so lightly, so naturally, that its pathos brings pleasant tears to your eyes, and the quiet humour of it makes you laugh sympathetically."—Reader.

JOHN FINNEMORE'S THREE SCHOOL CHUMS. 3s. 6d.

"Lester is the type of boy we all like; spirited and mischievous, but always manly."—Yorkshire Post.

ELIZ. W. GRIERSON'S VIVIAN'S LESSONS. 3s. 6d.

"The hero will be found quite an engaging little chap."—Glasgow News.

ALICE T. CURTIS' LITTLE RUNAWAYS 1s. 6d.

"One of the literary successes of the season. A book to be kept and loved and re-read by little girls and boys alike."—Publisher and Bookseller.

COLOURED PICTURE BOOKS, 3/6 NET.FUNNY BUNNIES.

By B. & N. Parker.

Companion Vol. to "The Browns, a Book of Bears."

"In Funny Bunnies the Burrows family is immortalized in verse and picture."—Athenæum.

BUSTER BROWN'S ANTICS.

"As renowned in the nursery as Mark Twain is in adult society. For uproarious, rollicking fun, 'Buster Brown' is unique, and his dog Tiger would make a cat laugh—when he was not worrying it."—Tribune.

FOXY GRANDPA'S FROLICS.

"Filled with incidents of a farcically humorous character, with just a flavour of wickedness and practical joking, such as no healthy boy can resist."—Edinburgh News.

THE FUN THAT GLUE MADE.

"Quite the most original book we have encountered. It provides such a fund of amusement for the youngsters on wet days that we are certain the donor of this delightful book will earn the heartfelt thanks of many a mother as well as of the young people."—Ladies' Field.

FAVORITE NURSERY RHYMES.

"Some really fine pictorial work within these pages."—Glasgow News.

W. & R. CHAMBERS, LTD., 47, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C. 4.
339, HIGH STREET, EDINBURGH, will be pleased to send an illustrated list on application, and will be glad to forward the names of booksellers where all the Books may be seen.

the woovers, single-handed against the fearful odds beloved of good and bad story-tellers alike. And a few will like best the little human touches scattered about the story, such as the picture of the child Ulysses, who begged for "fruit trees of his very own." So "his father gave him thirteen pear trees and forty fig trees, and promised him fifty rows of vines, all covered with grapes, which he could eat when he liked, without asking leave of the gardener. So he was not tempted to steal fruit, like his grandfather."

I do not know if the "crib" has spoilt these old Greek stories for some boys; but I can answer for it that this is the kind of book that any girl would like.

In "The Golden Porch" Mr. Hutchinson has tried to turn the myths of Pindar into fairy stories, saying in his preface that "nothing in Greek literature, except the stories of Herodotus, is so steeped in the true fairy atmosphere." This free version of them—the writer has occasionally added touches of his own—has been put together with taste and imagination, and would appeal to any girl or boy with the right fairy feeling. "The Pansy Baby" is the story of Apollo and Evadne; "The First Horse" is that of Pegasus, a myth especially attractive to nursery people. "The Isle of the Rose" is the sunken land of the Telchines, where Helios, the Sun God, found the sleeping goddess whom he made his Queen.

"But at first she wept, because all her flowers were drowned; and where her tears fell, they became white roses, and the white roses she kissed turned red."

"The Story of Isis and Osiris" will appeal only to some young people, as Egyptian myth appeals only to some of their elders. Considering the difficulties in the way of making a continuous narrative out of material so fragmentary as the sources of this mystical legend are known to be, Miss Schofield must be admitted to have succeeded in her task. But one doubts rather if her achievement was worth while. The spirit of Egyptian myth is so individual that it necessarily lacks that universality which enables other myths to make their appeal outside their own country and their own time. But children differ, as other people do; and for those whose mystical side predominates Miss Schofield's book has been written, and very well written too.

There are some books, here and there, that are wrongly labelled as children's books, because they are sincere presentments of great truths, and books of this kind, to which belongs "Cradle Tales of Hinduism," make their appeal to young people and old people alike, as long as they are lovers of beauty and sincerity and wit and humour. All these are to be found in the stories of old Hindu gods and goddesses that Sister Nivedita has collected and told with so much regard for the fine simplicity of the original. The story of "Sati, the Perfect Wife," tells how Siva, the greatest god of all, who went about like a beggar, forbore to do homage to the god Duksha.

"His motive was pure kindness. We all know that there is nothing more unlucky for an inferior than to see one greater than himself prostrated before him. It is even said in India that if this occurs to you your head will at once roll off."

Duksha, however, failed to recognise this delicacy of motive, and trouble followed in consequence. One of the wittiest tales tells how Savitri, the Indian Alceste, outwits the god of Death, so that he takes the noose from her husband's neck and restores him to her, with the words: "Thus do the gods love to win defeat at the hands of mortals." Perhaps the most imaginative stories of all are those in the cycle of Krishna, and best of these is that of "Gopala and the Cowherd," the story of the little son of a mother "who was one of those who worshipped the Lord Krishna as a little child." So when Gopala was frightened to go into the dark wood alone, she told him to call upon the child Krishna to come and play with him. But when Gopala's school teacher went with him, the child did not appear. Only a voice came, saying: "Thy master still has long to wait. Few sons indeed are blest with a mother like thine." There is not a child in existence who will not find what he likes in this first-rate collection of stories. There may be some that he will not quite understand, but that does not matter. Besides, the same may be said of many a grown-up person, who, like Gopala's master, "still has long to wait."

EVELYN SHARP.

BOOKS FOR BOYS.

AMONG the boy's books of this season now before us, the book of Australian stories, "The Settlers of Karossa Creek" (Religious Tract Society, 2s. 6d.), by Mr. Louis Becke, is by far the best, whether it is judged as fiction, an invention of the mind, or as literature, a thing written. The writer for boys is often careless of his style, with the result that his incidents, however startling in themselves, have only the momentary effect of drams. The incidents of the careful writer, on the other hand, however mild they may be, become symbolic, as parts of the imagination of the world. We would not claim for Mr. Becke a supreme place among living British writers, but we have only to compare these three stories of Australian life with the half-dozen Christmas books before us, to see that he belongs to the class of careful writers, and that that class alone should be allowed to minister to the imaginations of growing boys. His tales are all, or might well be, "transcripts from (Australian) life," and though the cant of modern criticism condemns the "transcript from life," we think too nobly of the soul to agree with the modern critic. Mr. Becke, at any rate, desires to give us a faithful picture of certain kinds of Australian life, as he knew it years ago. His first story tells of the clash between two early settlers, a retired army officer and an old navy man, whose ranches adjoin. There is a great deal of jealousy between the two men, as no doubt, in such cases, there sometimes was. As time goes on, the cattle-thieves visit the district, and the major, quick to suspect his neighbour, arrests him as the thief, on the sworn deposition of a couple of hoboes. The hoboes quarrel among themselves, and the case is never brought to court. The second story is perhaps better suited to the boyish palate, because it tells of a boy who sets himself to find the cache of some opium-smugglers on the coast of New South Wales. He discovers the cache (a number of ginger jars each containing a pound of opium) and helps the smugglers (all of them dear personal friends) to escape detection. The tale is charmingly written. As in several other stories, Mr. Becke tells us something of the life of a boy in Australia, enough, at any rate, to make an English boy envious. The third story is rather too surgical. It deals with the case of a man who suffers from a knock upon one side of the head. A chance "tulzie" with South Pacific Islanders brings him a knock upon the other side, and this rather crude homeopathy restores his reason, such as it is. Mr. Finemore contributes exciting illustrations to the two first tales.

Most of the other books before us are of that kind which teaches a little crude history by means of much crude sensational writing. Mr. Herbert Strang is now well known as a writer of books for boys. Hitherto his works have been good historical romances, well written, well constructed, and well worth reading. In his new book, "With Drake on the Spanish Main" (Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.), he has evidently written in a hurry, so that the book shows none of his ancient quality. It is full of violent situations, and there is a good deal of bloodshed. But we miss Mr. Strang's old power of character creation, his merry humour, his very real skill as a teller of tales. Anybody might have written this book. It is hard to believe that it is by the author of "Harry Rochester." Another violent marine romance is Mr. Tinsley Pratt's "When Hawkins Sailed the Sea" (E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), which treats of the disastrous voyage to St. John d'Ulloa much as Mr. Strang's book treats of the successful voyage to Nombre de Dios. We prefer Mr. Pratt's story to the other, perhaps because it tells of an English disaster instead of the usual, but unnatural, success which crowns British enterprise in books of the kind. We wish that Mr. Pratt (and all other writers of Elizabethan romances) would abstain from Elizabethan language, with its "Nay, then, minions," its "'Tis cold weather, gentles," and its talk of "my masters" and of "doughty blows." Mr. Pratt's book is illustrated by Mr. Butler Stoney, whose designs, though stiff and awkward, are effective. Mr. Strang's book is illustrated, very handsomely, in colour, by Mr. Archibald Webb.

Another naval book, much more exciting (and of greater value as history) is Mr. Edward Fraser's "The Romance of the King's Navy" (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.), a collection of short essays, each of which tells of some brave deed per-

SEELEY & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

* * A Miniature Illustrated Catalogue will be sent on application.

The New Portfolio Monograph. No. 48.

ENGLISH SOCIETY OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN CONTEMPORARY ART. By RANDALL DAVIES, F.S.A. With 4 Plates in Colour, and 34 Illustrations. Super royal 8vo, sewed 5s. net. Cloth 7s. net.

"A very attractive book which breaks new ground—as pleasantly written as it is well produced."—Burlington Magazine.

"An entertaining and finely illustrated book."—Morning Post.

OF THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS A KEMPIS.

With Illuminated Frontispiece, Title Page, and Sub-titles. Printed in a fine Venetian-faced type on a pure rag paper. White or green cloth, with miniature inlays, 6s. net, in a box; also in classic vellum, ros. 6d. net.

"A beautiful edition. . . Few more attractive gift books could be imagined."—Guardian.

CAMBRIDGE. By J. W. CLARK, M.A. Registry of Cambridge University. New Edition, with Coloured Frontispiece, and many other illustrations. Extra Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A handsome new edition of an excellent book."—Liverpool Courier.

THE RUINED ABBEYS OF YORKSHIRE. By W. CHAMBERS LEFROY, F.S.A. New Edition. Revised. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net, lambskin, 3s. net.

"Excellent written in a most sympathetic spirit."—Spectator.

THE GOLDEN HUMOROUS RECITER.

Edited with a Practical Introduction, by Professor CAIRNS JAMES. Extra crown 8vo, over 700 pages, cloth, 3s. 6d. Thin paper Pocket Edition, cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

"Unquestionably the best collection of modern humorous pieces which has yet been published."—Dundee Advertiser.

The Miniature Portfolio Monographs.

With many Illustrations. 16mo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net. Buffed leather in box, 5s. net.

"The fairest of little books."—Evening Standard.

NEW VOLUMES.

D. G. ROSSETTI. By F. G. STEPHENS.

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD. By A. H. CHURCH, F.R.S.

The Elzevir Library.

SELECTIONS FROM GREAT ENGLISH WRITERS.

Compiled by George Sampson.

With a Frontispiece and Title-page in colour by H. M. BROCK. Half-cloth, gilt top, each 1s. 6d. net; lambskin, 2s. net; buffed leather in a box, 3s. net.

I. FANCY AND HUMOUR OF CHARLES LAMB.

II. WIT AND IMAGINATION OF DISRAELI.

III. VIGNETTES FROM OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

"The beauty of type and of illustration and the careful selection of material make the small volumes very attractive."—Westminster Gazette.

PROFESSOR CHURCH'S NEW BOOK.

THE CHILDREN'S ILIAD. Told from Homer in Simple Language. By A. J. CHURCH, Author of "Stories from Homer," &c. With 12 Illustrations in Colour. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"A delightful gift book."—Athenaeum.

HEROES OF MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE. By the Rev. CLAUD FIELD, M.A. With 16 illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"Full of noble records."—Glasgow News.

HEROES OF PIONEERING. By the Rev. EDGAR SANDERSON, M.A. With 16 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 5s.

"A book of absorbing interest."—Western Daily Press.

The Romance Library—NEW VOLUMES.

With many Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, each 5s.

"This series has won a considerable and well deserved reputation."—Guardian.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN PHOTOGRAPHY. By C. R. GIBSON.

"There is not a dull page throughout."—Country Life.

THE ROMANCE OF SAVAGE LIFE. By Prof. G. F. SCOTT ELLIOT.

"Boys of all ages will delight in this book."—Globe.

THE ROMANCE OF THE WORLD'S FISHERIES. By SIDNEY WRIGHT.

"An excellent addition to an excellent series."—Schoolmaster.

THE ROMANCE OF MODERN SIEGES. By Rev. E. GILLIAT, M.A.

"A delightful book, well written, splendidly illustrated."—Record.

The Library of Adventure—NEW VOLUMES.

With 16 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, each 5s.

"Delightful books of adventure, beautifully printed and tastefully got up."—Educational Times.

ADVENTURES IN THE GREAT FORESTS. By H. G. MYRST.

"The kind of book that a healthy English boy will delight in."—Country Life.

ADVENTURES ON THE HIGH MOUNTAINS. By R. STEAD, B.A., F.R.Hist.S.

"More attractive literature for boys it would be difficult to find."—Outlook.

LONDON: SEELEY & CO., Limited, 38, Great Russell Street

BLACKIE'S LIST

By the AUTHOR OF "IN SEARCH OF EL DORADO."
IN THE LAND OF PEARL AND GOLD:

a Pioneer's Wanderings in the Back-Blocks and Pearl-grounds of Australia and New Guinea. By ALEXANDER MACDONALD, F.R.G.S., Author of "In Search of El Dorado," "The Lost Explorers," &c. Fully Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, ros. 6d. net.

THE LIFE OF HENTY.

GEORGE HENTY: the Story of an Active Life: By G. MANVILLE FENN. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, 7s. 6d. net.

A NEW ANTHOLOGY.

THE CALL OF THE HOMELAND: a Collection of English Verse. Selected and arranged by R. P. SCOTT, LL.D., and KATHARINE T. WALLAS. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net.

NEW BOOKS FOR BOYS.

TWO NEW BOOKS BY CAPTAIN BRERETON.

WITH WOLSELEY TO KUMASI: a Story of the First Ashantee War. Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

JONES OF THE 64th: a Tale of the Battles of Assaye and Laswaree. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

TWO NEW BOOKS BY ALEX. MACDONALD, F.R.G.S.

THE PEARL SEEKERS: a Story of Adventure in the Southern Seas. Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

THE QUEST OF THE BLACK OPALS: A Story of Adventure in the Heart of Australia. Illustrated by W. RAINEY R.I. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

By ROBERT M. MACDONALD.

THE GREAT WHITE CHIEF: a Story of Adventure in Unknown New Guinea. Illustrated by W. RAINEY, R.I. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

By HARRY COLLINGWOOD.

WITH AIRSHIP AND SUBMARINE: A Tale of Adventure. Illustrated by EDWARD S. HODGSON. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 6s.

NEW AND POPULAR EDITION OF

G. A. HENTY'S WORKS,

Illustrated by eminent Artists. Beautifully bound in cloth, with ornamental Cover Design and olive edges, 3s. 6d.

FOUR NEW VOLUMES.

NEW BOOKS FOR GIRLS.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

SISTERS OF SILVER CREEK: a Story of Western Canada. Illustrated by ROBERT HOPE. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

By BESSIE MARCHANT.

NO ORDINARY GIRL: a Story of Central America. Illustrated by FRANCES EWAN. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

By LILIAN F. WEVILL.

BETTY'S FIRST TERM: a School Story. Illustrated by ARTHUR H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 3s. 6d.

BLACKIE'S CHILDREN'S ANNUAL.

FOURTH YEAR OF ISSUE.

A Handsome Volume of 192 pp. with over 150 Illustrations, including 40 Full-page Pictures in Full Colour by the best Artists. Picture boards, cloth back, 3s. 6d.; cloth, gilt edges, 5s.

BEAUTIFUL PICTURE BOOKS.

THE RHYME OF A RUN, and other Verse.

Written and Pictured by FLORENCE HARRISON. With 24 Drawings in full colour, beautifully reproduced and mounted on grey art paper, and many in outline. Sumptuously bound, 6s. net.

THE STORY OF THE WEATHERCOCK.

Stories for Children by EVELYN SHARP. With 16 Coloured Plates and the Text fully illustrated with Black-and-White Drawings by CHARLES ROB-INSON. Large 4to, cloth, full gilt and gilt edges, 6s. net.

HEROIC LEGENDS. The best of the Old Legends retold by AGNES GROZIER HERBERTSON. Illustrated with 16 beautifully Coloured Plates by HELEN STRATTON. Square 8vo, cloth elegant, full gilt and gilt edges, 6s. net.

HANS ANDERSEN'S FAIRY TALES. Illustrated by HELEN STRATTON, with about 30 beautifully Coloured Plates, and a large number of Black-and-White Drawings. Large crown 8vo, cloth elegant, olive edges, 5s.

BLACKIE & SON, Limited, 50, Old Bailey, E.C.

formed by British seamen. The deeds have been well selected. Mr. Fraser is well known as a writer of naval books. He writes tersely, he knows his subject, and if, now and then, he rams home his theme in the manner of the magazine statistician, we can forgive him. His book makes an excellent sea anthology. It is well illustrated from old prints and photographs.

The army is not neglected. We have another of Captain F. S. Brereton's military romances, entitled "With Wolseley to Kumasi" (Blackie & Son, 6s.), a story of the Ashanti War. It is not among the best of Captain Brereton's books; but it is carefully constructed. It is a book which may profitably be given to the boy who intends to join the army. It will teach such a boy what to expect when fighting with savage tribes in tropical countries. We think that Captain Brereton would do well to imitate the methods of Mr. Edward Fraser (for whom, see above), or of Mr. Edward Gilliat, who, in "The Romance of Modern Sieges," a volume of The Library of Romance (Seeley & Co., 5s.), brings together a number of vivid accounts of modern sieges, English and foreign, from the siege of Gibraltar to that of Port Arthur. Such a book will really teach history, and at the same time interest the boy's imagination. Modern military history could very properly be taught from such a book. In the same Library, published at the same price, is "The Romance of Savage Life," a delightful work by Mr. G. F. Scott Elliott, an able writer of various talent. We think that such a book should be read to all children when they begin upon foreign geography.

Among the books before us are two examples, new and old, of the romance for boys. The new book is "The Pearl Seekers," by A. Macdonald (Blackie, 6s.), a tale with enough scientific detail to give it a smack of Jules Verne, and enough of up-to-date piracy to remind us of Mr. Max Pemberton. Some of the inventions (as shown in the illustrations) remind us of a book by Mr. Wells. It is a wild and wondrous story, but it is not so good as the old romance. "Hendricks the Hunter," by W. H. G. Kingston (Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.), in his new edition, with Mr. Finnemore's exciting pictures, is still the mighty hunter he used to be. Allan Quartermain himself will never quite eclipse the good Hendricks, for all his diamonds and his Ingoldsby Legends.

JOHN MASEFIELD.

THE GIFT-BOOK.*

FATHER XMAS must fill his wallet, and the book-shops at holiday time must not forego their piles of brightly-coloured volumes. Doubtless, therefore, these books have their uses, and most young folks are fairly indiscriminate in their tastes, and will enjoy the manufactured story as well as the story which lives and is literature. The reviewer, then, must not wax cynical over these productions, but must grant them their place with Xmas crackers, plum-puddings, and other manifestations of the season.

(1) "St. Jude's" is a collection of stories gathering about John Carmichael, the young minister of St. Jude's, and it contains some good, if obvious, character studies: of the wise and tender Carmichael himself, of the cast-iron

* (1) "St. Jude's." By Ian Maclaren. Religious Tract Society. 6s.

(2) "The Stolen Voyage." By Ethel Turner. Ward, Lock & Co. 3s. 6d.

(3) "The Unlucky Family." By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture. Smith, Elder. 6s.

(4) "Under the Flag of France." By David Ker. Blackie & Son. 5s.

(5) "The Dragon and the Raven." By G. A. Henty. Blackie & Son. 3s. 6d.

(6) "The Pretenders." By Meredith Fletcher. Henry Frowde and Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.

(7) "The Sniper." By F. Cowley Whitehouse. J. Nisbet & Co. 3s. 6d.

(8) "The House Prefect." By Desmond Coke. Henry Frowde & Son. 6d. net.

(9) "Muggins of the Modern Side." By Edmund Francis Sellar. Blackwood. 6s.

(10) "Betty's First Term." By Lilian F. Wevill. Blackie & Son. 3s. 6d.

(11) "A Discontented School Girl." By Raymond Jacobens. W. & R. Chambers. 5s.

(12) "The Adventures of a Dodo." By G. E. Farrow. Fisher Unwin. 3s. 6d.

Calvinists who sit in judgment on him, of the miserly old man redeemed, of course, by "The Power of the Child," and other familiar types. The book is full of the well-known humour and pathos of the "Kailyard" school, too well known now to be quite effective.

(2) "The Stolen Voyage" is also a collection of tales, but it is not easy to determine whether it is meant for children or their elders. The title story is a good bit of characterisation which might appeal to either class; some of the remaining sketches are episodes of child-life, others are quite out of the range of young people's interest. None displays Miss Turner at her best, though "Taylor, Tram-Guard," is an effective study. On the whole, the book is—a gift-book.

(3) There is plenty of rollicking fun in "The Unlucky Family," and Mr. E. J. Reed's illustrations are irresistible. The adventures and misadventures of the Cockney family in their newly-inherited country house provide scope for endless drollery, and Mrs. de la Pasture makes very merry with her puppets. Yet from her hand the reader expects some genuine human feeling, and is not wholly content with this broad caricature. "A Book for Children" is the sub-title of "The Unlucky Family," and doubtless some children delight in broad farce. But a child's wistful imagination will find scant satisfaction in this volume of determined drollery.

(4) To escape from the modern world and ride forth "Under the Flag of France" is a relief. Bertrand du Guesclin is the hero of Mr. Ker's spirited romance, and a gallant hero he makes, fighting his own disabilities—the ugly face and uncouth figure which make him a mock among his young companions—as valiantly as he fights his foes. There are touches of mysticism and poetry in the story: the figure of Brother Michael, "God's Pilgrim," lingers in the memory, and the snatches of song sound winningly above the clash of steel. One suspects the writer of having enjoyed his work, not merely set out to produce a boys' book for Christmas.

(5) It is almost needless to characterise the late G. A. Henty's work. "The Dragon and the Raven" is in his well-known, long accepted style. His young Saxon hero is just a manly, public school boy, in old-world raiment, and all his adventures and escapes end happily in the good old fashion. King Alfred, his learning and valour—and his burned cakes—make due appearance. Mr. Henty was a practised craftsman, and the approval of generations of school-boys has sealed his success.

(6) "The Pretenders"—which has nothing to do with the Stuarts—has vital and amusing qualities. The twin brothers, who take advantage of their extraordinary likeness to each other to indulge in pranks "most various," are likeable little scamps, and Tommy, the narrator, who writes too well for his part, tells their story with verve. Monk, the dreaded monitor—who turns out less of a terror than was expected—and "the Shah," are both decidedly alive, while Tommy's real hero-worship for and apparently disloyalty to the latter bring a breath of romance across the scrapes and escapes. "The Pretenders" is, in fine, a pleasing little comedy of errors.

(7) "The Sniper" is a public school story of the familiar type, which carries its heroes out to the wider world beyond the school bounds and leaves them happy—one with a V.C. and the other with a lady love. It is pleasantly written, but we have read it many, many times before. Fortunately, new school-boys come forward for the old school stories, so demand and supply "go on for ever."

(8) But—shade of Tom Brown!—what shall be said of "The House Prefect"? Surely, Bob Manders is a most depressingly conscientious young gentleman, who spends most of his time moping and mooning over the scrape which he had not courage to own up. Mr. Desmond Coke is fond of talking about his hero's "almost morbid sensitiveness," and Bob's scruples and the woes of "the Catlet" do not make enlivening reading. The book closes, however, with a triumph in the county match, for sake of which boys will forgive much.

(9) So many books and still no literature! The Ancient Mariner was not in more melancholy plight with "Water, water everywhere, nor any drop to drink."

"Muggins of the Modern Side" endeavours to help us out

FROM

THE DE LA MORE PRESS LIST.

DE LA MORE BOOKLETS.

Size, pott 8vo, 3½ in. by 6 in.

Price 6d. net each in art wrappers; three in a box for 1s. 6d. net or six in a box for 3s. net. Also bound cloth, 1s. net; in moreen, 1s. 6d. net; or in full lambskin extra gilt and gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net.

The "De La More" Booklets have won their way into general favour as substitutes for the useless and ephemeral Christmas and Birthday Card. They are beautifully printed at the De La More Press on very fine paper specially made for them, and are bound very carefully, and in an artistic manner.

New Volumes:

22. Shelley's Sensitive Plant 23. Browning's Saul
24. Milton's Il Penseroso, L'Allegro, and Arcades

Previous issues in the series

- | | |
|--|--|
| 1. Charles Lamb's DREAM CHILDREN and THE CHILD ANGEL | 12. Emerson on SHAKESPEARE |
| 2. Washington Irving's CHRISTMAS DAY | 13. Coleridge's ANCIENT MARINER |
| 3. Rossetti's HAND AND SOUL | 14. Shelley's CLOUD, SKYLARK, and WEST WIND |
| 4. Milton's MORNING OF CHRIST'S NATIVITY | 15. Keats' ODES |
| 5. Keats' EVE OF ST. AGNES | 16. ABRAHAM AND ISAAC: an Old English Miracle Play |
| 6. Shelley's ADONAI'S | 17. FitzGerald's RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM |
| 7. Wordsworth's ODE ON IMMORTALITY | 18. Smart's SONG TO DAVID |
| 8. Byron's HEBREW MELODIES | 19. THE BOOK OF RUTH |
| 9. Milton's LYCIDAS | 20. De Quincey's SUSPIRIA |
| 10. Carlyle on SHAKESPEARE | 21. TOM PINCH'S RIDE TO LONDON, by Charles Dickens |
| 11. Goethe on SHAKESPEARE | |

"The 'De La More Booklets' are a happy idea. They consist of classical masterpieces in paper covers such as Shelley's 'Adonais,' Keats' 'Eve of St. Agnes,' and Milton's 'Hymn on the Morning of Christ's Nativity.' If the De La More Press can make such masterpieces into common presents they will be doing a great service."—Athenæum.

"Several charming booklets have reached me from the De La More and more Press!"—Baron de B—— W——, in Punch.

NATIONAL WIT AND HUMOUR SERIES.

32mo, cloth, 1s. 6d. each net. NEW VOLUME.

5. WIT AND HUMOUR OF THE PHYSICIAN. A Collection from Various Sources, classified under appropriate subject headings.

Previous issues in the Series:—

- 1 and 2. American Wit and Humour. A Collection of Anecdotes, Aphorisms, and Repartees. Two Volumes.
3. French Wit and Humour. A Collection of Anecdotes, Aphorisms, and Repartees.
4. German Wit and Humour. A Collection of Anecdotes, Aphorisms, and Repartees.

THE QUIET HOUR SERIES.

32mo, 1s. each net.

Daintily bound in white leatherette, with gilt lettering, and especially suitable for presents.

NEW VOLUMES.

3. A YEAR OF BLESSING. Quotations for every day of the year, by ROSE PORTER.
6. BOOK OF FAMILY PRAYERS. By LYMAN P. POWELL. With an Introduction by the Right Rev. O. W. WHITTAKER, D.D., LL.D., Bishop of Pennsylvania.

Previous issues in the Series.

1. In Quietness and Confidence. 2. Open Windows.
4. Resting in His Love. 5. Looking Towards Sunrise.

NIGHTS AT THE OPERA.

A series of handbooks for the music-lover, the object of which is to reproduce in an attractive form an analysis of the music, together with a running commentary on the dramatic element in the opera to which it is devoted. 1/- net each.

- | | |
|----------------------------------|---------------------------|
| 1. Lohengrin. | 3. Tristan and Isolde. |
| 2. Tannhäuser. | 4. Meistersinger. |
| 5. Rheingold and Walkure | } Ring Des Nibelunge n |
| 6. Siegfried and Götterdämmerung | |
| 7. Bizet's Carmen. | 8. Gounod's Faust. |
| 9. Mozart's Don Giovanni. | 10. Verdi's Il Trovatore. |
| 11. Verdi's Rigoletto. | 12. The Flying Dutchman. |

ON A PINCUSHION, and other Fairy Tales. By MARY DE MORGAN. With Illustrations by WILLIAM DE MORGAN, Author of "Joseph Vance," and "Alice-for-Short." Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

LETTERS FROM PUSSYCATVILLE. By S. LOUISE PATTESON, Author of "Pussy Meow: the Autobiography of a Cat." Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. 3s. 6d.

THE IMMORTALITY OF ANIMALS and the Relation of Man as Guardian from a Biblical and Philosophical Hypothesis. By E. D. BUCKNER, M.D. 5s. net.

MY LITTLE FRENCH FRIENDS. By LINA OSWALD. Demy 8vo, cloth, 2s.
WHERE THE SUGAR MAPLE GROWS. Idylls of a Canadian Village. By ADELINE M. TESKEY. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

THE HOME COOK BOOK. 2s. 6d. net.

A complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, Ltd.,
32, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

Mr. Eveleigh Nash's Christmas List.

1. GENERAL LITERATURE.

THE COURT OF PHILIP IV.

By MARTIN HUME. Demy 8vo, with Portraits, 18s. net.

The Nation: "This extremely interesting volume."

Daily Chronicle: "Nothing the writer has yet done in the domain of history can compare with this, his latest work."

The Evening Standard: "We do not think that in any of his now numerous volumes he has been better inspired than in the present."

N.B.—A New and Cheaper Edition of Major Hume's famous book, "The Wives of Henry VIII.," has just been issued. Price 7s. 6d.

FOXHUNTING RECOLLECTIONS.

By Sir REGINALD GRAHAM, Bart. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 10s. net.

The Graphic: "His volume is one of the pleasantest that fox-hunting ever inspired."

Field: "Brimful of interest from start to finish."

World: "Abounds in amusing reminiscences."

The Daily Chronicle: "Alive with good stories."

GEORGE SAND & HER LOVERS.

By FRANCIS GRIBBLE, Author of "Madame de Staël and her Lovers." Demy 8vo, with Portraits, 15s. net.

Daily Mail: "Mr. Gribble has achieved singular success in this admirable biography. He has salted it with wit, and his insight is remarkable."

The Daily Telegraph: "Mr. Gribble has a remarkable tact, and an almost impeccable taste in the delineation of this kind of romance . . . no one who really wishes to understand human nature can fail to follow the story with deep interest and indulgent sympathy."

BATH UNDER BEAU NASH.

By LEWIS MELVILLE, Author of "Farmer George," &c. Demy 8vo, Illustrated, 15s. net.

Daily Chronicle: "The book is a banquet of sweet associations. . . . A thoroughly entertaining volume."

The Daily Telegraph: "This is a bright, attractive book—one of the best we have read from Mr. Melville's pen."

2. SIX-SHILLING FICTION.

MR. STRUDGE.

By PERCY WHITE

The Globe: "Undoubtedly this is the best thing Mr. White has done."

THE WONDROUS WIFE. (2nd Impression.)

By CHARLES MARRIOTT

Daily Chronicle: "Shall we call it the wondrous book?"

BUNKUM. (3rd Impression.)

By FRANK RICHARDSON

Daily Mail: "Hilariously funny."

PIGSKIN AND PETTICOAT. (2nd Impression.)

By HELEN MATHERS

THE WOMAN IN THE WAY.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX

THE SPANISH PRISONER. (2nd Impression.)

By Mrs. P. CHAMPION DE CRESPIGNY

CIRCE'S GARDEN.

By CULLEN GOULDSBURY

THE STARS BEYOND.

By ROSAMOND LANGBRIDGE

THE LISTENER.

By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD

An Enthralling Volume of Psychological Stories.

3. CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

SELLING LIKE WILDFIRE IN THE WEST END.

CAUTIONARY TALES FOR CHILDREN.

Verses by H. BELLOC. Pictures by B. T. B., Authors of "The Bad Child's Book of Beasts." Crown 4to, with over 80 Illustrations, 2s. 6d. net.

The Morning Post: "From beginning to end the book is one delicious bit of fun; there is humour even in the disposition of the type. And, last, a word for B.T.B.'s drawings. They are things of real delight, as comic and inconsequent as the lines they illustrate."

The Westminster Gazette: "From Edward Lear to Mr. Hilare Belloc is no very abrupt transition . . . his new Cautionary Stories will certainly last as long as 'The Moral Alphabet.'"

CHRISTMAS AT POVERTY CASTLE.

By TOM GALLON. Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ILLUSTRATED LIST POST-FREE ON APPLICATION.

London: EVELEIGH NASH, 32, Bedford Street, W.C.

by writing a novel, which example of youthful fiction distinctly is refreshing. Indeed, Muggins' literary tendencies and mania for quotation differentiate him somewhat from the average hero of the boy's book. Most of the story, though, is taken up with his exploits at cricket, football, and golf.

(10 and 11) From boys' books to girls' book is a change in subject, not in method. "A Discontented School Girl" and "Betty's First Term" are irredeemably mechanical. The only character which shows an approach to vitality is the quaint German maiden Elise in the former story, with her serene Teutonic obstinacy and smouldering passion for music.

(12) "The Adventures of a Dodo" is a title to stir the heart with hope of an escape into the entrancing regions of "make believe." The Dodo bears a strong family likeness to Mrs. Nesbit's doubly immortal Phoenix, but, though not strikingly original, it proves to be a diverting fowl. The children who follow its wayward course make acquaintance with the Pied Piper of Hamelin, Robinson Crusoe's parrot, and other notable personages. Willy Pogany's artistic illustrations have the true convincing touch of the impossible

NATURAL HISTORY.*

EVERY dog lover and every other student of animal psychology will be grateful to Miss Slaughter for her entertaining and instructive volume. Attempts to summarise our knowledge of the animal mind are by no means uncommon; but it is rarely that the dog gets quite the justice of such sympathy and intuition that this lady possesses. From the odd little bundle of nerves that fantastic breeders have evolved for a plaything of the lap, to the fighting bull terrier and the champion of the foxhound kennel, the dogs of Miss Slaughter's acquaintance (and it is a wide one) are as carefully considered as any human subject of character-sketch or obituary notice. The individual note of each is again and again brought out as the story of their moral and intellectual adventures is unfolded. All the dogs that the author has known seem to be lovable. Certainly she makes us love all those of which she writes, from the one "canine idiot" to the "soldier of fortune" and the "artistic thief." Perhaps the most interesting of them all is "Bandy," the property of a Marlborough House master. His attention to cricket and his supreme love for any kind of ball, his punctuality to all his self-imposed engagements, his infallible and decorous attendance at parade, his resentment of ridicule, are so many splendid and consistent instances of well-known dog character. So is his treatment of the bandmaster for coming on parade without his gaiters. Not only did he fasten on the man then and there, but proceeded to inflict further punishment in cold blood. He went to the gymnasium, where a band practice was being held—an event he was on other occasions careful to ignore—demanded admission, and, "without a second's hesitation, made straight for the astonished instructor, and repeated his warning against laxity." The clever expedients by which the "artistic thief" hid the signs of his guilt are most interesting, as well as funny; and of the hundreds of anecdotes there is not one, whether it be true or exaggerated, that will not add to our love and appreciation of the dog. It is a great book for animal lovers of every age.

A more loosely spun book is Mr. Bridges' autobiography of a squirrel. The author is, no doubt, acquainted with the natural history of the animal with which he deals, and he skilfully weaves into the story many likely and exciting incidents. The feelings attributed to Scud, the squirrel narrator, are those that most of us think one of us would have if we could be placed more or less exactly in the skin of a squirrel. The animals are given the fullest powers of speech, being able to give one another intricate directions, and to lay wonderful plans for the discomfiture of the enemy. For many purposes, the actual antics of one tame squirrel would be worth more; but if Mr. Bridges' end is to make an interesting story, roughly according with observed facts, he has abundantly succeeded.

Mr. Atkey, on the other hand, deliberately makes his animals far more dangerous and valiant than they are. He sets himself the task of making the New Forest as wildly interesting as some Far West woodland. For moose he has red deer, for wolves foxes, for bear and lucivee a wild cat; and he enriches his Hampshire jungle by the legitimate postulate that a pair of dogs and a pig have escaped from human tutelage, and founded dens for themselves among the wild creatures. But he oversteps the bounds of probability when he lays a pack of foxes at the throat of Red Deer, whom they nearly overcome, or allows the two lurchers and the wild cat to kill a strayed Welsh bull, and in other similar extravagances. He has, however, made a wonderfully interesting book, livelier than much that Mr. Charles Roberts, his evident paradigm, has written, because the Hampshire writer deems himself less bound by the facts. His animals talk among themselves a picturesque, Old Testament-like language, and are about as intelligent as human beings. The owl, for instance, catches a vole, and makes a bargain that it shall have its liberty if it promises to gnaw the bonds of an eagle, for whose freedom the owl has made a profitable contract with Barak, the Dog. The illustrations, by Mr. Harry Rountree, are exceedingly good. He is even greater as a painter of real animals than as a comic artist.

Some of the "Little Foresters" also are far too clever, and the writer of the stories has an aggravating way of pretending the tales are true. When he tells, for instance, the story of a robin that went and plucked a poisonous herb, with which it then doctored a snake so that it was compelled to come down from the nest it was attacking, Mr. Hawkes thus concludes: "It was some poisonous tropical plant, the seed of which had, by some strange chance, been dropped in our soil. But even so, it is still a mystery how Cock-robin knew where it was growing, and by what instinct he knew that it was poisonous to the snake. I have often read of like incidents in tropical countries, but had been doubtful of their truth, but here was a demonstration at my very door." Mr. Hawkes's books of reference must be of the class to which Sundowner's snake stories belong. In another chapter he cheerfully allows the birds to combine to surround the snake with prickly thorns while he sleeps, so that when he wakes up he shall kill himself on them. These are American stories, now introduced for the first time into England. They are given a very good send-off by the illustrations of Mr. Charles Copeland.

A great number—probably the majority—of the pictures in Messrs. Kearton's new volume have been published before, mainly, however, in more expensive treatises. Some of the very best fruits of Mr. Cherry Kearton's long and abundant practice are here; and, in something like two hundred pictures, there is not a bad one. They are accompanied by a bright textual commentary, the great value of which is its practically perfect reliability. We hope that Mr. Kearton's readers will take to heart his advice to make notes for themselves of what they observe in the Fairyland of Living Things.

Flowers and trees and birds and beasts exchange confidences in the book of stories, the first of which concerns the Queen Bee. The translation, no doubt, has been lovingly done, and the book is very prettily illustrated with pictures. The coloured pictures especially, with their tastefully designed borders, give the book a marked sense of elegance and sweetness. The republic of the hive is travestied as a rather ridiculous monarchy; but how many writers are there, from Maeterlinck downward, who have not made this mistake? This and other stories are very readable. Mr. Moore Smith is to be congratulated on having discovered and handed on to his young compatriots these beautiful little papers on some of the simpler natural phenomena.

* "The One Dog and the Others." By Frances Slaughter. Longmans, Green. 5s. net.

"The Life Story of a Squirrel." By T. C. Bridges. A. & C. Black. 6s.

"Folk of the Wild." By Bertram Atkey. E. Grant Richards. 6s.

"The Little Foresters." By Clarence Hawkes. G. G. Harrap & Co. 2s. 6d.

"The Fairy Land of Living Things." By Richard Kearton, F.Z.S. Photographs by Cherry Kearton. Cassell. 3s. 6d.

"The Queen Bee and Other Nature Tales." Translated from the Danish by G. C. Moore Smith. Nelson. 3s. 6d.

Price per Volume—2s. net in cloth; 3s. net in leather.

LONGMANS' POCKET LIBRARY.

"More charming gift-books of the kind could hardly be conceived."—Bookseller.

"A very acceptable series is Longmans' 'Pocket Library,' bound either in cloth or leather, as you wish, or as your pocket may dictate."—Daily Chronicle.

Two New Volumes.

BALLADS AND LYRICS OF OLD FRANCE. WITH OTHER POEMS. By ANDREW LANG.

Mr. Lang's "Ballads and Lyrics of Old France" was first published in 1871, and has been out of print for many years.

THE WRONG BOX.

By R. L. STEVENSON and LLOYD OSBOURNE.

The following Volumes are also Now Ready:—

F. ANSTEY.

Voces Populi. First series
With 20 Illustrations by
J. BERNARD PARTRIDGE.

J. A. FROUDE.

Short Studies on Great Subjects. Five volumes.

RICHARD JEFFERIES.

The Story of My Heart: My Autobiography. With Port-trait.

ANDREW LANG.

New and Old Letters to Dead Authors.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

*The Life and Death of Jason:
A Poem*.

J. W. MACKAIL (Edited by.)

Select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology. (Greek text only.)

R. L. STEVENSON.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, with other Fables.
A Child's Garden of Verses.
*More New Arabian Nights—
The Dynamite*.

STANLEY WEYMAN.

The House of the Wolf.

CARDINAL NEWMAN.

Apologia Pro Vita Sua.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,

39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

WORKS BY THE RIGHT HON. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

CHEAP EDITION. In square crown 8vo, appropriately bound,
2s. 6d. net; original edition, 5s. net.

In the Name of the Bodleian, and Other Essays.

By the Right Hon. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, Honorary Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

CHEAP and UNIFORM EDITION. Price 2s. 6d. each; also ORIGINAL EDITIONS, 5s. each.

OBITER DICTA.

First Series.

OBITER DICTA.

Second Series.

RES JUDICATÆ.

ESSAYS ABOUT MEN, WOMEN, AND BOOKS.

In foolscap 8vo, cloth, price 5s. SECOND EDITION.

MISCELLANIES.

LIBRARY EDITION. In 2 vols., crown 8vo, bound in cloth, 12s.

COLLECTED ESSAYS.

Vol. I. contains: OBITER DICTA, Series I.

OBITER DICTA, Series II.

Vol. II. contains: MEN, WOMEN, AND BOOKS;
RES JUDICATÆ.

NEW FAIRY TALES.

In crown 8vo, well printed and attractively bound, with illustrations,
Price 5s. net.

A MOTOR MAN IN FAIRYLAND. An All-the-Year-Round Fairy Tale for Old People who have remained Young, and for Young People who are growing Old, to be read in the houses of those who partake of high tea, and where the associations of the Stables have not been desecrated by Motor-cars. By CHARLES THURSBY
With excellent Humorous Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR.

In crown 8vo, attractively bound in cloth, illustrated, price 3s. 6d.
GRABLAND AND KING SELF. Two Fairy Stories,
by HARRIET J. SCRIPPS, Author of "A Little Handful," "Sparkles,"
"A Monkey Friend," "Chums," &c. With Illustrations by Miss EDITH
A. CUBITT and Miss DORA AUGUSTA DEACON.

In crown 8vo, tastefully printed and bound, and illustrated by Photographs of Animal Life taken from Nature, price 5s. net.

A NEW NATURE BOOK FOR CHILDREN.

THE MINIMISINGS OF MAURICE. Being the Adventures of a very Small Boy among very Small Things. By the Rev. S. N. SEDGWICK, Author of "Petronilla," "A Daughter of the Druids," "The Romance of Precious Bibles," "The Story of the Apocrypha," "Sermons from Nature," &c.

Elliot Stock, 62, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

A. C. FIFIELD'S NEW LIST.

WHERE MEN DECAY. By Lieut.-Col. D. C. PEDDER.
Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d. A valuable study of the social causes of rural depopulation and decay.

THE LAND OF ETERNITY. By A. G. PARAMAHAMSA.
Cloth gilt, 3s. net. With Portrait. Discourses and addresses on the Vedanta philosophy by a famous Indian teacher.

JESUS IN LONDON. By E. NESBIT. With 7 Illustrations in two colours by SPENCER PRYSE. Size 13½ by 9½ in. 7d. net. Post free in tube, 8d. A very powerful and attractive new poem.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE LORDS. By JOSEPH
CLAYTON. 1s. net; cloth gilt, 2s. net. Postage 1½d. and 3d.

"Will prove indispensable to the modern political reformer."—New Age.
THE BISHOPS AS LEGISLATORS. By JOSEPH
CLAYTON. Third edition. 1s. net. Postage 1½d.

"A tremendous and terrible indictment."—Daily News.
TOLSTOY: A Study. By PERCY REDFERN. With Photograph. 1s. net; cloth, 2s. net. "It is an excellent and excellently written critical study."—Mr. H. G. Wells.

HOW TO PAINT IN OIL. By FURZE WALSH. Attractive wrapper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. Postage 1½d. and 2d.

"It deserves real success."—Mr. Frank Spenlove-Spenlove, R.B.A.

WHY YOUR MANUSCRIPTS RETURN. By
A. GOOD. 6d. net; cloth, 1s. Postage 1½d. and 2d.

"A sensible and well informed little book."—T.P.'s Weekly.

New Editions of George MacDonald's Works.

PHANTASTES: A Faery Romance. With 33 Illustrations by ARTHUR HUGHES. Cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net.

FAIRY TALES BY GEORGE MACDONALD.
With 13 Illustrations by ARTHUR HUGHES. Cloth gilt, 4s. 6d. net.

THE DIARY OF AN OLD SOUL. With Photogravure.
Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

DAILY READINGS FROM G. MACDONALD.
Boards, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 3s.

ARBOR VITAE: On the Nature and Development of Imaginative Design, for the Use of Teachers and Handicraftsmen. By GODFREY BLOUNT. Illustrated. 5s. net. Postage 6d.

THE SCIENCE OF SYMBOLS. By GODFREY BLOUNT.
Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

THE POETIC SPIRIT. THOMAS FOLLIOTT. Cloth gilt
3s. net. Postage 3d.

"All that Mr. Folliott writes leaves the mark of a sincere and independent thinker."—Newcastle Journal.

BOOKS THAT ARE THE HEARTS OF MEN. By
A. T. STORY. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d. net. Postage 3d.

"I don't know a better introduction to the very best books that have been written."—Methodist Times.

SHIFTING SCENES. By Mrs. J. A. HOBSON. 2s. 6d. net.
"They interpret with sympathy and insight lives that to the unseeing eye contain but few elements of interest."—Review of Reviews.

SELECTIONS FROM CHARLES SWAIN. With Photogravure. 5s. net. "The book will be prized by every lover of poetry who possesses it."—Scotsman.

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

The Duma and the Revolution.

THE BEST BOOK ON RUSSIA

Issued in recent years is unquestionably

PRINCE KROPOTKIN'S

Autobiography—with a new Introductory Chapter by the Author, and a Preface by George Brandes—

MEMOIRS OF A REVOLUTIONIST

"In this volume," says Dr. Brandes, "will be found a combination of all the elements out of which an eventful life is composed—

Idyll and Tragedy, Drama and Romance.

Parts of his narrative, from the very nature of the events he has to tell, are more intensely exciting than anything in those novels which aim only at being sensational."

"This delightful book," says the Athenæum, "will never be out of date."

New, Cheaper, and Enlarged Edition,
Crown 8vo, 6/-

LONDON: SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN.

FOR THE BABY'S STOCKING.

At the time of year when stockings are hung out, the grown-up relative discovers how many more books there are in the world than there used to be when Santa Claus was young. In those days, when the grown-up relative was young too, the baby's stocking was full of toys. Now, it has to be stretched, even reinforced by a grown-up stocking or two, in order to admit books instead.

We doubt if Mrs. Molesworth's latest story, "The Little Guest," will occupy this position in many nursery bookcases. It is good, of course, as any book of Mrs. Molesworth's must be; but, judged by the high standard she herself has set up for us, it falls a little short of our expectations. There is no living writer who understands so well as she does the love of little children for stories that deal with the commonplace of nursery life, or who exercises so much fine restraint in rejecting the joke that may catch a laugh from the sophisticated reader, but will never produce a smile from any child. And those parts of "The Little Guest," that present the daily life of the Penrith children, with their small jealousies and childish passions and generous impulses, are excellent. But when little Elinor—who, by the way, is less real than any child heroine of Mrs. Molesworth's whom we can remember—runs away from her adopted home and falls in with her own father and helps to bring the story to a happy conclusion with breathless rapidity in the last chapter, we feel that a less accomplished writer than Mrs. Molesworth could have dealt more convincingly with the situation. We do not think this book of hers will oust "Carrots" or the "Cuckoo Clock" from their place in the nursery bookcase.

It was a good idea to re-tell the old Northern myths, which is what Mr. Thomas Cartwright has done in two small books, called "One for Wod and one for Lok," and "Sigurd the Dragon-slayer." They are just the right size to slip into the baby's stocking, but we are not sure that they will ever attain distinction on the baby's bookshelf.

"The Old Nursery Stories," on the contrary, set an example of the way in which familiar stories may be re-told without being spoilt. The nursery will probably feel, as we did on opening this collection of old fairy tales, that E. Nesbit has no business to be re-editing other people's stories, when she can make up such magnificent stories out of her own head. But the nursery will forgive her, as we did, when they read how well she has rendered the incomparable histories of "Jack the Giant-Killer," "Beauty and the Beast," and all the rest of the real heroes and heroines that nobody ever grows tired of reading about. For those babies who have not inherited the old nursery books of their mother, E. Nesbit has evidently made this charming new edition of them.

Uniform with "The Old Nursery Stories," is "Granny's Wonderful Chair," by Frances Browne. It is a pity that a sententious conclusion to the book should rather spoil the effect of simplicity that characterises it up to the last page or two; for all the tales in it are told in just that direct, unpretentious style that children respect, and the history of the lucky little girl who possessed the wonderful story-telling chair makes a good connecting link for a collection of original fairy tales. "Granny's Wonderful Chair" may safely be squeezed into the baby's stocking this Christmas.

The same may be said of "The Podgy Book of Tales,"

"The Little Guest." By Mrs. Molesworth. Macmillan. 4s. 6d.
 "One for Wod and one for Lok." By Thos. Cartwright. Heinemann. 1s. 6d. net.

"Sigurd, the Dragon Slayer." By Thos. Cartwright. Heinemann. 1s. 6d. net.

"The Old Nursery Stories." By E. Nesbit. Frowde. 1s. 6d.
 "Granny's wonderful Chair." By Frances Browne. Frowde. 1s. 6d.

"The Podgy Book of Tales." By Lena and Norman Ault. Grant Richards. 2s. net.

"The Alphabet of Beasts." By L. Beatrice Thompson. Gay & Bird. 2s. 6d.

"The Children and the Pictures." By Lady Tennant. Heinemann. 6s.

"Edward Buttoneye." By Hilda Austin and Cyril F. Austin. Nister. 1s.

"Little Blue Rabbit." By Hilda Austin and Cyril F. Austin. Nister. 1s.

"The Baby's Day Book." By W. Graham Robertson. John Lane. 3s. 6d.

"Cautionary Tales for Children." By H. Beloe and B. T. B. Nash. 3s. 6d.

though it will in this case be a very tight squeeze, and one which a full-sized person's stocking would scarcely bear. Most of these stories of nursery toys are amusing, especially the one about the china puppy that grew into a china dog, because he had a hopeless passion for a sugar mouse that the horrid little boy ate right down to its string tail—and "trouble always ages one." As light literature, the "Podgy Book," despite its stodgy name, may well take its place in any baby's library.

The instructive tone of the preface to "The Alphabet of Beasts," is enough to condemn the book in a child's eyes. "By the word 'beast,' we generally mean a four-footed animal," it announces solemnly. There is, however, a chance that this is meant for humour, read in the light of what children sometimes mean by the word "beast." The "Alphabet" fulfils the promise of the preface. To say that a bear "likes honey, and can learn to dance," is a misleading description, and calculated to make an imaginative child see the bear dancing with a ring through its nose, in its wild condition. The picture of an animal on every page may, however, condone for the deficiencies in the letterpress.

We have kept the best till the last, because, as everybody knows, that is the rule of the nursery. "The Children and the Pictures," by Lady Tennant, is too large and fat a book to go inside anybody's stocking, but it will balance with ease on the end of any nursery cot, because it has magic in it. Dream stories, as a rule, are not sure of success with children, because they are generally so badly done. In Lady Tennant's book the children do not go to sleep in the first chapter and wake up in the last, or anything obvious and clumsy like that; they just find out by accident that the people in the Old Masters' pictures, that hang on the walls of the downstairs rooms, sometimes come out of their frames and walk about; that the children in the pictures even expect to be played with; and these things occur at any time when the grown-up people of the household happen to be out of the way.

There are good reproductions of the Old Masters as illustrations to this capital story-book; but, best of all, there is inspiration in it, and Santa Claus will undoubtedly carry it with him when he goes on his wonderful journey round the world on Christmas Eve.

When rhymes are good, there is always a place for them on the nursery bookshelf. Mr. Cyril F. Austin shows considerable facility in rhyming, in his little books of nonsense stories told in verse, called "Edward Buttoneye," and "Little Blue Rabbit." With the help of the really excellent pictures, done by Miss Hilda Austin, these both stand a very good chance of pleasing the critical sense of babies. They will love the story of the two dolls who, in search of a job, found a coal barge to tow:—

"And as beside the stream they wound,
 Their burden felt so large,
 That Horace, every hour or so,
 Said, 'Are you sure coal doesn't grow?'"

And since rabbits belong by right to the land of which all young things are free, every baby will appreciate the tale of the rabbit who was born blue, much to his own distress, and afterwards fell in with kind children, who offered to wash him with soap:—

"Said Brand, 'We toned the Noah's Ark down,
 Who knows we may not wash him brown?'"

"The Baby's Day Book" has beauty in it, and for that reason some of the "women of four," for whom the title page tells us it is intended, may take it to their hearts. They will certainly find a place there for some of the very imaginative pictures, especially for that of the Flyaway Steed, and of the small woman of four who is courtesying to the baby moon. Most of the poems will, we fancy, leave them untouched.

"Cautionary Tales for children," is not for children at all. There was a laugh or two for the nursery in the same authors' "Bad Child's Book of Beasts," because there was good fun in it; but the humour of the "Cautionary Tales" will leave the nursery cold and untouched. The satire is excellent in "Lord Lundy," whom his family "shoved into politics":—

"In which profession he commanded
 The income that his rank demanded,
 In turn as Secretary for India, the Colonies, and War;—" but it is not the satire of the nursery.

"R.T.S." BOOKS TO BUY & GIVE

PLEASE SEND POST CARD to The 'R.T.S.' 4, Bouverie Street, London E.C., and ask for a copy of the Society's new 32-page Illustrated List of Gift Books.

AN IDEAL CHRISTMAS GIFT.

An Artistic Folio Gift Book (10½ by 12½ inches) in white cloth, gilt top, 16s. net.

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

Depicted in 24 Original Coloured Pictures by HAROLD COPPING. Each of the twenty-four Pictures described by the LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM (Dr. Handley C. G. Moule).

The Athenæum says:—"The artist has imagination and religious feeling, is an excellent colourist, and a bold draughtsman. The water-colours have been admirably reproduced. Indeed, praise is due to all concerned in the genesis of this sumptuous volume."

The Daily News says:—"... The pictures are not only faithful reproductions of Palestinian life as seen to-day; they are a recreation of scenes that might have been enacted nearly 2,000 years ago."

The Guardian says:—"The colouring is agreeable, and in many cases the composition is decidedly effective. The figure of Our Lord, as a rule is majestic and impressive."

GRIFFITH JOHN:

THE STORY OF FIFTY YEARS IN CHINA. By the REV. R. WARDLAW THOMPSON, D.D.

With Two Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The British Weekly says:—"It is a fascinating and inspiring volume."

The Christian World says:—"No one can read the story without being inwardly refreshed. The mere adventure side of it is stirring to a degree."

JAMES CHALMERS:

HIS AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND LETTERS. By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A.

With Portraits and other Illustrations. Prepared in handsome binding for special presentation, padded paste grain, 6s. 6d. net. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d., cloth gilt.

The Daily News says:—"It is the best missionary biography that has appeared during the last twenty years."

NEW CHEAP EDITION, REVISED.

ANGUS'S BIBLE HANDBOOK.

An Introduction to the Study of Sacred Scripture. By JOSEPH ANGUS, M.A., D.D. Revised and partly Re-written by Rev. S. G. GREEN, D.D. 848 pp. New Cheap Edition. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; bound in half-paste grain, cloth sides, gilt top, 4s. 6d. net; or in half-morocco, 7s. 6d. net.

The British Weekly says:—"This handbook, of more than 800 pages, contains a mass of information which cannot elsewhere be found in so convenient and compact a form."

THE DEVOTIONAL COMMENTARY.

12 Volumes are Now Ready. 2s. each.

GENESIS, Vol. I. By Rev. W. H. GRIFFITH THOMAS, D.D.—ESTHER. By Rev. Dr. J. ELDER CUMMING.—THE PSALMS: THEIR SPIRITUAL TEACHING. By Rev. Dr. J. ELDER CUMMING. 3 vols.—PHILIPPIANS. By Rev. F. B. MEYER.—I. THESSALONIANS. By Rev. A. R. BUCKLAND, M.A.—I. TIMOTHY. By Rev. T. A. GURNEY, M.A., LL.B.—II. TIMOTHY. By the BISHOP OF DURHAM.—PHILEMON. By Dr. A. H. DRYSDALE.—HEBREWS. By the BISHOP OF DERRY.—JAMES. By Rev. CHARLES BROWN.

JUST READY. By OLIVER G. PIKE.

ADVENTURES IN BIRD-LAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of 'Home Life in Bird-Land,' 'Woodland, Field, and Shore,' &c. With Coloured Frontispiece, 4 Photogravures, and 64 Plates, containing about 100 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. The text is embellished by 100 Pen Sketches by E. RICHMOND PATON, printed in mono-tint in the margins. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

"A veritable library of good reading."—Christian.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME ANNUAL.

The Annual contains 960 Large Pages; 666 Pictures; 11 Stories by IAN MACLAREN; 2 Long Stories; 19 Shorter Stories; 26 Biographical Papers; 52 Sunday Morning Readings by the BISHOP OF DERRY, and many other Interesting Papers for Every Member of the Household. Price 7s. 6d., in handsome cloth gilt.

IAN MACLAREN'S NEW BOOK,

ST. JUDES.

By IAN MACLAREN, Author of 'Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush,' &c. With 10 Full-page Illustrations by HAROLD COPPING. Large Crown 8vo, cloth gilt. Price 6d.

MRS. O. F. WALTON'S NEW STORY. The Authoress of "Christie's Old Organ," &c.

THE LOST CLUE.

By Mrs. O. F. WALTON, Author of 'A Peep Behind the Scenes,' &c. Illustrated. Cloth gilt. Price 6s.

"A MAGNIFICENT GIFT BOOK."

THE BOY'S OWN ANNUAL.

'The Boy's Own Annual' contains 10 Long Stories; 40 Shorter Stories; 29 Adventures; 20 Cricket Papers; 10 Football Papers; 15 Gardening Papers; 16 Indoor Amusements; 13 Outdoor Sports; 19 Papers on Rabbits, Dogs, and other Pets; and a host of other eye-opening, mind-informing, idle-hand-employing, helpful papers for boys of all ages. 832 pages, Coloured Plates, 500 other pictures. Price 8s., in handsome cloth gilt.

"AN IDEAL GIFT FOR A GIRL OF 16 TO 60."

THE GIRL'S OWN ANNUAL.

'The Girl's Own Annual' contains Long Stories by HELEN MARION BURNSIDE, RAYMOND JACBERNS, MARION LADY DUNBOYNE, LESLIE KEITH, LILIAN STREET, ESME STUART; 25 Shorter Stories; 12 Papers on How a Girl should Dress; 6 on Wild Flower Collecting; 5 on Easy Bookbinding; 4 on Embroidery; 4 on Gardening, and a great variety of other helpful papers for sensible girls; Loving Counsel, Needlework, Education, Cookery, Nursing, Travelling, Health and Beauty, Singing, Art, &c. 832 pages, profusely Illustrated with Tinted and other Pictures. Price 8s., in handsome cloth gilt.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, London, 4, Bouverie Street, and the St. PAUL'S BOOK SALOON, 65, St. Paul's, E.C.

Please send Post Card asking for the R.T.S. new 32-page Illustrated List of Gift Books.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LD.

6/- EACH.

Small quarto, cloth extra
(6½ by 9), gilt top, 6/- each.

Miss L. M. Alcott's Famous Stories.

NEW ILLUSTRATED EDITION.

For many years a better Edition of Miss Alcott's charming stories has been asked for, but hitherto, with the exception of "Jo's Boys," only the cheap Editions have been available. The new Illustrated Editions at Six Shillings, now produced for the first time, have been entirely re-set.

LITTLE WOMAN, with Little Woman Wedded.
LITTLE MEN.
JO'S BOYS.
EIGHT COUSINS.

ROSE IN BLOOM.
AN OLD-FASHIONED GIRL.
UNDER THE LILACS.
JACK AND JILL.

6/-

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations.

The Advent of Arthur.

By ENID LEIGH HUNT. In Enid Leigh Hunt, a great-granddaughter of Leigh Hunt, the brilliant essayist, there has appeared a writer for girls whose due place is in the front rank.

6/-

Small quarto, cloth extra, with illustrations in colour and half-tone.

Life on the Ocean.

By GEORGE LITTLE. With an Introduction by W. CLARK RUSSELL. The author spent twenty years in the American Merchant Service as boy, mate, or captain.

6/-

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations.

Sandy Carmichael.

By CUTLIFFE J. HYNE. In this story of adventure the author has depicted life on two of the Pacific Islands at a time when European influence was not felt, when the islanders were in a state of barbarism and when they were cannibals.

6/-

Small quarto, cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations.

The Secret of the Sandhills.

By FRANCIS MARLOWE. A book that is certain to become a favourite with boys. It is a tale of adventure, and the brisk move of the narrative never ceases.

6/-

Demy 8vo., cloth extra.

Under North Star and Southern Cross.

By FRANCIS SINCLAIR. Many readers will remember Mr. Sinclair's "Where the Sun Sets," and in this work he once more places most of his scenes in the Southern Pacific, and reveals the charm and glamour of that marvellous region.

6/-

Small 4to., cloth extra, with coloured frontispiece and other illustrations, price 6/-.

Matthew Strong: The Story of a Man with a Purpose.

By MRS. FRANCIS. A remarkable story by a new writer. The work is concerned with present-day problems and struggles. Farm life, slum life, the life of the rich, the life of the poor, love, hate, generosity, greed, commercial trusts, the inner working of a great city store, political life and business life.

NEW WORK BY THE "AMATEUR ANGLER."

1/-

Fcap. 8vo boards, price 1/- net. Large-paper limited edition, on hand-made crown 8vo paper, price 2/6 net.

How does it Feel to be Old?

By E. MARSTON, F.R.G.S. Author of "After Work," "Booksellers of Other Days," etc.

6/-

Full crown 8vo (8 by 5½),
616 pages, cloth, price 6/-.

Dred: A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp.

By HARRIET BEECHER STOWE. With Introduction by the Rev. L. MacLEAN WATT (of Alloa). Some of the other stories by Harriet Beecher Stowe are at last beginning to emerge from the shadow into which they were thrown by the astounding and long-continued success of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." The introduction is a brilliantly written essay by the Rev. L. MacLean Watt, B.D., who traces the rise of the slave trade from the time of Columbus to its downfall during the American Civil War.

12/6 NET.

Large royal 8vo (10 by 7).
568 pages, cloth, price 12/6 net.

Magic.

Compiled and Edited by ALBERT A. HOPKINS. With an Introduction by HENRY RIDGELY EVANS, Author of "Hours with Ghosts; or Nineteenth Century Witchcraft." A most fascinating and comprehensive work on stage illusions, scientific diversions, and trick photography, with four hundred illustrations.

18/- NET.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo (9 by 6½), cloth gilt, gilt tops, nearly 1,000 pp., 36/- net; in 1 vol., 18/- net.

The Life of Wellington.

By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P., F.R.S. A new Edition in 1 volume of a work which describes the restoration of the martial power of Great Britain. The work includes 76 illustrations, comprising portraits, views of places, maps, battle plans, facsimiles of the Duke's letters, sketches, and orders.

1/- NET.

Demy 8vo, 116 pages, cloth, with plans, price 1/- net.

The Rise of Wellington.

By FIELD-MARSHAL EARL ROBERTS, V.C., Commander-in-Chief. A concise account of a great career. The Indian period, the Peninsular period, and the period during which Wellington commanded the Allied forces in the campaign which terminated with Waterloo are all described, Earl Roberts showing how the experience he gained during the first two periods so developed his natural talents and administrative capacity that he was finally able to meet and overthrow the French Emperor, whose genius for war had up to that date been regarded as absolutely unrivalled.

4/6 NET.

Small crown 8vo, 520 pages
cloth, price 4/6 net.

The Standard Opera Glass.

By CHARLES ANNESLEY. Containing the detailed Plots of 134 celebrated Operas, with Critical and Biographical Remarks, Dates, and other information. Already the book has passed through twenty-four editions, and more than one generation has availed itself of the help which the book affords. A number of additions have been made, so that this handy little work contains now the newest Operas, and yet remains compact enough to go into the pocket.

8/6 NET.

Large crown 8vo, illustrated
cloth, price 8/6 net.

Sailing Alone Around the World.

By CAPTAIN JOSHUA SLOCUM. A man who has voyaged around the globe alone in a small boat of his own building, and has survived to tell the story in vivid language has no difficulty in obtaining a hearing; and in this attractive volume, well printed and profusely illustrated, an endeavour is being made by still another edition, to meet the continued demand for Captain Slocum's "Sailing Alone Around the World." Good narratives, at first hand, of such adventures as this writer experienced in his hazardous journey is not so often found that readers in search of the best can afford to neglect such a stirring book; and people with literary tastes will read with special delight the account of the captain's visit to the home of Robert Louis Stevenson. Mrs. Stevenson wrote that Slocum was the sort of seafaring man that Robert Louis liked above all others.

1/6 NET.

Crown 8vo, 124 pages,
cloth, price 1/6 net.

The Real Book for Children.

By TWO OF THEM. Edited by E. GOSS. It is explained in the preface that "so many of the books for boys and girls are written by grown-up people, who think they know what boys and girls really like, which is rarely true, that I and my sister have made up our minds to write a book, because we think we know more about children than they do, being ourselves young." The book is full of fun and has more than a hundred comic illustrations.

3/6 NET.

Post 8vo specially bound in durable Rexine, price 3/6 net.

The New Cook Book.

Edited by GRACE E. DENISON. A volume of proven recipes by the ladies of Toronto and of other cities and towns. It contains full particulars of more than a thousand dishes. How to carve is illustrated by means of reproductions from photographs. Some of the recipes have been supplied by chefs, who have contributed an account of the dishes they have found, after wide experience, to be most popular.

1/- NET.

Fcap. 8vo, paper boards,
price 1/- net.

On Stammering, Cleft-Palate Speech, Lipping.

By MRS. EMIL BEHNKE. "The causes of stammering are carefully and clearly discussed, and an indication is given of the proper lines of treatment as regards hygiene and voice discipline. Mrs. Behnke's researches and methods have gained the approbation of the leading medical journals."—Fall Mall Gazette.

Please send Post Card for Illustrated List of Announcements with unique cover design showing the Old Globe Theatre, (Southwark), Old London Bridge, the Old Tabard Inn, together with an article on "Art and Letters in Southwark."

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LD., 100, Southwark Street, S.E.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE SPEAKER PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1907.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 11.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	381	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		“What is the Church, and who are its Members?” By the Dean of Ripon and C. J. Back	397
The Two Unionist Voices	384	The Decline of the Oxford Movement. By G. K. Chesterton and W. Scott Palmer	397
Mr. Birrell's Success	385	Arnold v. Borrow. By L. I. Guiney	399
Natal and the Empire	386	The Danger of Premature Burial. By Jas. R. Williamson	398
A Legal Minimum Wage	387	The Passing of Russian Autocracy. By “An Eye-Witness”	399
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		“The Ruin of Macedonia.” By G. F. Abbott	400
The Mortal Meaning of Fog	389	REVIEWS:—
Crime and Punishment	390	The Purgation of Homer. By Professor Bury	401
The Extinction of Birds	391	“The Best Magazine”	402
The Undying Hope	392	The Character of Venice	403
TRAVEL AND ADVENTURE:—		Thomas Hood	404
The Giants of the Sudan. II. By Sir Alfred Pease	393	A Tale of the Wild	406
POETRY:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF	408
The Three Women of Endell Street. By Ernest Rhys	394	THE WEEK IN THE CITY	412
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—
The Prospect in Portugal. By “Observer”	395
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	396
Books to be Read	396

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

A SCHEME of judicial reform for Macedonia is reported, after interminable delays, to be ready at last for presentation to the Porte. There are to be three inspectors, Ottoman subjects, who will report to the Financial Commission, on which a European judicial expert will be given a seat. The one satisfactory point in this plan is that the idea of international control is preserved, and the range of the Commission's purview extended. But the Commission will have no right of direct interference, and everything will depend ultimately on diplomatic action at Constantinople. The scheme is trivial and nearly useless, but, none the less, valuable time and diplomatic energies are likely to be wasted in forcing the Porte to accept it. The “Times” correspondent in Constantinople reports that independent opinion there is unanimous that “the Powers are merely wasting time and trouble” in elaborating such schemes, while they take no adequate steps to end the anarchy caused by the bands, which often enjoy Turkish connivance or toleration. The only measure worth pressing would be one conferring executive powers upon the European gendarmerie officers. At present they are mere inspectors, and the work of coping with the bands is left to the unreformed soldiery. General de Giorgis, indeed, is so despondent that he has tendered his resignation. If these officers, free to increase their forces by enrolling some sort of village militia, were entrusted with the actual work of police, the anarchy would speedily come to an end. But we doubt if they would care to accept such a commission unless the civil authority placed over them were made responsible directly to the Financial Commission or to a European governor.

* * *

THE treaty of annexation transferring the Congo to Belgium, with its voluminous appendices and inventories, has now been published. Criticism centres on two points. In the first place, the financial stability of the new Colony will depend entirely on the revenues it derives from the shares which it will inherit in the various rubber-collecting companies. If forced labour were really checked, the inflated value of these shares would fall, and Belgium would have to choose between philanthropy and a deficit. In the second place, the revenues of the Crown Domain, one-tenth of the area of the Free State, yielding one-sixth of the rubber, are still reserved for “literary, artistic, and sumptuary purposes.” This has meant in practice the building of palaces for King Leopold, the subsidising of beauty in a frankly personal form, and the corruption of the Belgian Press. With these revenues the Colony might, perhaps, pay its way; without them, it must either continue the present system of exploitation or ask for subsidies from the Belgian taxpayer. The Treaty, like the Constitutional Law, will go before the Parliamentary Commission of seventeen members, which is unlikely to have its labours ready for the Chamber before February or March.

* * *

ON Tuesday Dinizulu voluntarily and unconditionally surrendered to Sir Duncan Mackenzie's force, which arrived at his kraal at Usutu, without resistance. He had previously offered to come to Pietermaritzburg when the first news of the expedition reached him. The Government of Natal, without dealing with this offer, to which no reply was sent, now declare that they had evidence that his arrest would have been resisted if it had been undertaken by a police force. Reports have been spread of the presence of armed Zulus in Zululand and Northern Natal, of which, says the agency that sends them, there is “as yet no confirmation.” Dinizulu will be tried by civil process, which we hope will be carefully watched by the Imperial Government.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR made a long speech at Devonport on Monday, in which he declared that the Unionists could no longer be described as a divided party, without, however, indicating the precise grounds of its unity. His speech was purely critical, dealing, as he said, with “two small studies in the art of misgovernment.” The first of these was Mr. McKenna's “administrative tyranny” in the matter of the sectarian training colleges, under which the State, which finds five-sixths of the revenue, proposes to open these institutions to an occasional Nonconformist student. Having attacked this impiety, Mr. Balfour denounced the Government for failing to put in force the Crimes Act against the cattle-drivers in Ireland, an omission due to Mr. Birrell's electoral promise not to resort to coercion. The Government were “afraid of their own speeches” and were “slaves of their own perorations,” a servitude which cannot be charged to Mr. Balfour. Similarly the members of the Government had been “hampered” by their “mendacious statements” about Chinese labour. The statements were not mendacious, and the Government have not been “hampered” by them. Already 16,000 Chinese have gone, and the rest are following.

* * *

LORD LANSDOWNE delivered a high Tory speech at Edinburgh on Wednesday. He approved of Sir Edward Grey's foreign policy as non-partisan, sneered at the shattering of the Premier's “cloud-built castles” of peace—his policy of “fewer ‘Dreadnoughts’ and more canal boats”—through the failure of the Hague Conference, and suggested that the Anglo-Russian Agreement gave too much control over Persian territory, “stretching far to the south.”

The House of Lords was entitled to deal freely with the land, because its members knew about it, just as soldiers knew about the Army. He praised the English land system as working smoothly, producing a high return per acre, and giving rise to slight friction between the landlord and the tenant, who was a free contractor. The Lords were right in resisting the application to Scotland of the ruinous Irish system of dual ownership, and in maintaining the distinction between landholding in the western Highlands and the Lothians.

* * *

MR. ASQUITH has spoken both at Nottingham and at the Eighty Club, declaring, at the first place, that though Free Trade "bored" Mr. Balfour, it had intense interest and importance for the mass of the people, announcing the Government's "fixed determination" to open up old-age pensions next Session, but discouraging "extravagant proposals." Step by step progress was necessary. At the Eighty Club dinner, he dealt with the House of Lords, denying that it had, during at least 150 years, possessed co-ordinate authority with the Commons, or that it had the right of calling a dissolution. But a Second Chamber might properly intervene when the Commons (a) "outlived their authority," or (b) perverted their mandate, or (c) did their work hurriedly and inexpertly. This suspensory veto would subsist under the Ministerial plan, by which the life of each Parliament could be cut down from seven to five years, or less, so as to avoid the danger of a House of Commons growing out of touch with the people.

* * *

KING OSCAR II. of Sweden died peacefully on Sunday last, aged 78, after a long reign of thirty-five years. He was a grandson of the famous Bernadotte, one of the most adroit and most slippery of Napoleon's Marshals. He did not share his grandfather's good fortune. He was of noble presence, had real literary accomplishments, and his charming, if rather impulsive, character helped to sustain the always artificial union between Norway and Sweden for all but the closing years of his reign. But it broke down finally in 1905, by the act of Norway. The King showed both grief and anger, but his action was temperate and definitely repudiated the use of force. His personal popularity in Norway survived the embittered controversies on the consulates and diplomatic representation. He is succeeded by his son, Gustavus V., a connection by marriage of our own Royal family.

* * *

THE German Reichstag has been busied with the discussion of the new Associations Bill, which extends the liberty of meeting in some minor ways, but forbids the use of non-German languages in public speeches. This repressive measure, an innovation, is, of course, directed against the Poles. The Socialists (as the only German Liberals) and the Centre (as Catholics) oppose it. The so-called Radicals are silent in public but restive in private. They are doubtless open to a bargain, as they are in Prussia, where the Polish Expropriation Bill is still being pressed despite its rejection in Committee. A sensation has been caused by the resignation of the Crown Prince of Bavaria of his position as Patron of the Navy List, by way of protest against the extremists, and in particular against General Keim. His action will doubtless induce Prince Bülow to countenance the League a little less openly.

* * *

THE Temperance Legislation League, of which Lord Peel is President, held a representative Conference on Thursday, on the forthcoming Licensing Bill. An appeal was adopted and issued to the public. The various points on which there is agreement among temperance reformers are detailed and emphasised. With regard to the wider options of veto and disinterested management, which could scarcely come into force before the expiration of the time limit, the League recognises that there will be great unwillingness on the part of the House of Commons to enact them at present. It repeats the warnings to temperance reformers which were given by the Prime Minister at Manchester in November, 1899, and by Mr. Lloyd George at the recent annual meeting of the United Kingdom Alliance. It recalls the various occasions on which, during the last forty years the confident anticipations of temperance people with regard to legislation have been grievously disappointed. It concludes by appealing to temperance reformers to put aside personal preferences, and unite in giving the proposals of the Government earnest and enthusiastic support. In the attitude which it adopts with regard to local option and disinterested management, the League is itself setting an example in the way of putting aside such preferences, and its action in this respect augurs well for the success of the policy of concentrating on essentials.

* * *

BORIS SARAOFF, the brilliant Bulgaro-Macedonian guerilla chief, has been murdered by a private enemy in Sofia. A clever organiser, a magnetic leader, a gallant and capable soldier, he was at the same time an unscrupulous politician, a spendthrift with public money, and a "propagandist" whose hands were stained with much innocent blood. He once nearly provoked a war between Bulgaria and Roumania by his organisation of murder. It was probably he who originated the dynamite outrages that preceded the general rising of 1903 in Macedonia. While Groueff, the real hero of that insurrection, lived, Saraoff's sinister influence was held in check. Latterly, amid angry dissensions, he was working for another forward move. It does not follow that his removal will disorganise the movement; it may, on the contrary, make for unity. The fact that such a man, a strange compound of brilliant qualities and medieval vices, was the hero of the younger men in Macedonia, is itself an evidence of the demoralisation caused by racial feuds and Turkish tyranny, European indifference, and the futility of peaceful protest.

* * *

THE Army Council, which is proving itself an unfortunate tribunal for the decision of military questions, has issued a thoroughly unjudicial and only half-intelligible set of findings on the case of Lieutenant Woods. It reports that he was inefficient as a regimental officer, and that the officers who reported against him were not actuated by "prejudice or bias," though they worded their reports with "abruptness" and "unnecessarily strongly." It declares that his unpopularity was due not to his "studious tastes or temperate habits," but to his failure to associate himself with the "modes of thought and work" of his brother officers, and to "identify his life and career" with the "working and interests" of the battalion, rather than with his "individual tastes." We do not suppose that Lieutenant Woods is a Napoleon, and he may have been awkward in the field, but every word of this absurd censure might have been applied to the conduct of the boy Bonaparte at Brienne. "Dark, solitary, and restrained," says one of his biographers, "the new scholar assumed the indifference of wounded vanity, despised all pastimes, and found delight either in books or in scornful exasperation of his comrades when compelled to associate with them." Lieutenant Woods's unpopularity certainly arose from his refusal to mix fully in the "working and interests" of his battalion. The "working and interests" were defined by one of his brother officers as "golf," "squash rackets," and "going out with the drag." The "Times" rejoices in a verdict which effectually discourages character and intellect in an Army not too bountifully provided with either, and proudly reflects that the "officer" and the "gentleman" will be for ever associated. "Gentlemanly" armies are very well in their way, but they are apt to be roughly handled by "ungentlemanly" ones—like the Boers.

* * *

THE conduct of the Works Department by the Progressive party in the London County Council has been thoroughly vindicated from the charge of bad, or even dishonest, accounting, which was advanced against it during the March elections. Mr. Waterhouse, who made the "commercial audit" demanded by the Moderate party, has reported that the commercial position of the department showed "sound and careful management," and that its transactions had been efficiently and accurately recorded. The Moderates tried to minimise the finding of the report, but, as Mr. Wood said, it destroyed the scandalous suggestions of "cooking, rigging, and faking," which blackened the department and the party that organised it last spring.

* * *

THE last week or so has been marked by a series of outbreaks of rowdiness. The mild violence of the suffragettes in interrupting, but not breaking up, Liberal meetings has been coarsely imitated by bands of medical students asserting the right of the profession to do what they like with dogs, and of rowdy undergraduates affirming their intention of doing what they like with dons. The medical students attack suffragette and anti-vivisection meetings impartially, the latter on account of an inscription on a statue of a brown dog, vivisected in University College Hospital. The statue was erected in a Battersea recreation ground, and the inscription ran as follows:

"In memory of the brown terrier dog done to death in laboratories at University College in February, after having endured vivisections extending over more than two months, and having been handed over from one vivisector to another till death came to its release."

Attempts have been made by bands of demonstrating students to destroy this monument. Several have been arrested and fined. In Cambridge, bands of undergraduates have assembled, on Sunday mornings, before the rooms of an offending proctor, and escorted him, amid ironical musical tributes, to church. The growing license among undergraduates, both at Oxford and Cambridge, will probably lead to the abolition of the special University laws in their favour, and to their treatment by the police and the town magistrates.

* * *

A NEW party (our Rome correspondent writes) has been started in Milan, and it has taken the name of the Italian Economic Party, it being composed of tradesmen, manufacturers, and industrial people of all kinds and without any definite political shade. The object of the new organisation is to bring about a resurrection of life in the Peninsula in all fields, by solving the economic problem outside of politics or, to be more exact, influencing politics through economic considerations. Their contention is that, in Italy, a progress proportionate to what every citizen is entitled to hope for, is not possible without a considerable increase of riches, which will also have, as consequence, a true moral and political amelioration. Therefore the country must be spurred to work more, to produce more, to spend more; but to reach this object the party deem it indispensable to have the chief organism of the State, Parliament, composed in a different way, that is to say, of men convinced of the usefulness of this programme and sympathising with it. The party openly says that it is a scandal that a town like Milan, the moral capital of Italy, being the centre of all that is produced in the Peninsula, should not be represented in the Chamber by a single man connected with commerce or business. Their first move will be a crusade, inside as well as outside Parliament, against all unproductive persons. They remark that in Italy there is an average of 75 lawyers to every 100,000 inhabitants, which in some provinces rises to 155 for the same number of inhabitants. The priests are 129,893, viz., 28 to every 10,000 inhabitants, while for the same population Switzerland has only one.

* * *

A SKILLED observer of politics writes us: "As the result of an extended tour of speech-making, I find a great body of vigorous and enthusiastic Radicalism in the country keenly interested in social reform and in the House of Lords question. This is especially true of Scotland, where a very powerful and striking anti-peer movement is in full progress. But I also note two movements of detachment. The first is on the right wing, the second on the left. On the right, the Tariff Reformers are making some progress. They have practically abandoned preferences, for which no one cares a jot, and they do not go in for full-blooded Protection. But they preach retaliation and anti-dumping with some skill and success, and alienate a few working-class votes. On the left side is the growing and serious trend to Socialism of the younger men, largely produced by the missionary spirit, the serious, passionate, and disinterested advocacy of the abler working men and middle-class Socialists on the one hand, and on the other the coldness and hardness of some of the elder Liberals in the provinces, and the absorption of the younger middle-class politicians and clubmen in amusements. This is the really menacing feature of the situation for Liberalism."

* * *

THE German Emperor came up to town after completing his visit to Highcliffe, and, after a round of semi-private engagements, left this country on Thursday morning. On the eve of his departure the German Embassy issued a communiqué, notably friendly in tone. The Kaiser, it stated, had greatly enjoyed his visit, was especially pleased with the greeting he had received from the English people, and hoped that his sojourn with us would foster "friendly feelings" between the two peoples. The Kaiser has, by all accounts, public and private, exerted his powers of personal fascination with much success, and the gaiety and brilliance of his talk have won him many friends.—Mr. Roosevelt has at last definitely reasserted his pledge not to allow himself to be nominated for a third Presidential term. The cynical world of American journalism attributes this step—which is natural and honourable—to his desire to damage the candidature of Mr. Cortelyou, whom he introduced into politics. For the moment, Mr. Hughes and Mr. Taft seem likely to dispute the Republican nomination, while Mr. Roosevelt's retirement is said to have improved the chances of Mr. Bryan.

* * *

THE University Rugby match resulted, as was generally expected, in a win for Oxford. The game was an exciting one, for Cambridge, though completely outplayed in the second half, more than held their own at the beginning, and but for the brilliant defence of the Oxford full-back, would certainly have scored. At the end of half an hour the attack of the Cambridge forwards lost its vigour, and Oxford finally won by a goal and four tries to nothing. The winning team owed their success to superiority behind the scrummage, though, at the same time, their forwards played, if a not brilliant, at least a plucky and tenacious game. The passing of the Oxford backs was good, their half-backs being particularly clever, and quite outclassing their Cambridge opponents. The game was an interesting one to watch, and both University teams are this year well above the average.

Politics and Affairs.

THE TWO UNIONIST VOICES.

It is easy to discern in the speeches of Unionist leaders which cover the columns of the "Times," the existence, not, indeed, of a consistent Unionist policy, but of an attempt to convince the public that such a policy exists. Yet nothing can be clearer than the essential disunity of aim. The Opposition is divided into two sections. One is almost purely critical and negative, and rests on aristocratic and old Tory conceptions of the State and the Empire. This is represented by Mr. Balfour in his speech at Devonport, by Lord Lansdowne in his address at Edinburgh, and by Lord Curzon in his lecture to the members of the Birmingham Institute. Mr. Balfour expends his ingenious but narrow and timid intelligence on criticism, not of the Government's Bills, but of its administration, with a special view to the revival and perpetuation of coercion in Ireland, and the maintenance of the hold of the Church of England, treated not as a national institution, but as a close sectarian body, over the fabric of public education. Lord Lansdowne endeavours to fix the Scottish and English land systems in their present position of dependence on great landlords and great estates—i.e., their subordination to the dominant British interests of sport and pleasurable life for a small and favoured class. Lord Curzon appears to think that the main business of Englishmen is to maintain themselves in a state of brooding imaginative delight about the Empire, especially about that portion of it which exhibits none of the really great political achievements of the British race in their despised island home, or even in their self-governing Colonies. This is all. None of the really pressing problems of the British State—unemployment, and ill-paid and irregular employment, the condition of the old population, the conduct of the Poor Law, the diseases of child life, the allied problems of housing and homework, wealth and taxation—come within the horizon of these politicians. In sharp contrast with this attitude is the policy of the second Unionist group, which consists of Protectionists, under Lord Milner and Mr. Austen Chamberlain. They are all for reform. They would, of course, reform the tariff altogether, but they are also open to consider the questions of a minimum wage, the "distribution of wealth," and unemployment. This is Tory democracy—absolutely unsound in its economics, unprepared to provide funds for correcting the worst evils of poverty, or seeking them in the taxation of the great body of home consumers—but still striving to discover some connection between Imperialism and the people, and even finding the point of contact in a vague State Socialism.

If these are the first-fruits of the union of the Unionist Party, we may look at some future date to a renewal of the old struggle between Lord Salisbury and Lord Randolph Churchill for the capture and government of the Tory machine, and of the veiled but not less real antagonism between Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chamberlain. On the political question of the hour we shall soon come to a testing point. What will the Opposition do about the House of Lords? If the Commons again present a contentious Education Bill, and again pass the Scottish Valuation Bill and a Scottish Land Bill, will Mr. Balfour and Lord Lansdowne repeat the action of 1906 and 1907? If they do, they will have given a truly revolutionary turn to our political history. Hitherto it has been possible to argue that the Lords have only exercised the kind of veto which not merely Mr. Asquith, but, as far as we know, constitutional writers generally assign to them—namely, the power of remitting to the Commons for further consideration a Bill which, for good or bad reasons, they think was insufficiently considered, or ill-considered, or in flat disharmony with the will of the people. This is the suspensory veto, which, we may say incidentally, the Prime Minister's scheme expressly reserves to the Lords. It is fair to say that under the new and much extended reign of closure by the will of the Executive, some such power of reference, used by a competent and well-equipped body of fairly neutral statesmen, represents a useful, even a necessary, constitutional function. But no such conception arises in the minds of men like Lord Lansdowne. They defend the House of Lords as a stronghold of property, or of the special kind of property in which the great majority of the peers are interested. Why, he asked at Edinburgh, should not the country listen to landlords on problems of land tenure and management, of which they have special experience, just as it listens to soldiers on matters of army discipline? But the House of Lords question is not a question of expertise; it is a question of leaving the final decision on a great national concern in the hands of a body representing only one kind of interest, that of ownership. And that is the root of the trouble about this House. It has no true national outlook at all. It decides educational questions in the interests of the Establishment, for no Dissenters sit in it, Labour questions (when it dares) in the interests of capital, because it contains no representatives of Labour, land questions in the interests of the landlord, because it contains no tenant farmers and no agricultural labourers, political questions in the interests of Toryism, because nine out of ten of its members are Tories. And all this mass of bias and prejudice is only softened, and even temporarily diverted, when the word is carried round from the Tory Leader in the Commons that it is just as well, for the good of the Party, to put off the struggle with Radicalism to some more convenient season.

This is not a mere academic quarrel. Lord Lansdowne's conception of the Lords as a final court of appeal in matters of landed property shows that he is opposed to any serious changes in our land system, and means to use the peers to avert them. Everything, he says, is well under the English system of partnership between landlord and tenant. Under it "the land has been well cultivated, our acreable yield has been higher than in any foreign country, and hard cases have been rare." This is simply not the fact. It does not happen to be true that English land is profitably cultivated in comparison with our chief European rivals, and such a result can only be arrived at by comparing the poorest kinds of foreign land, which we relegate to pasture, with the much better English arable lands. France yields food for about 170 persons per square mile, that is to say for forty persons more per square mile than this country. It retains a far greater population for country life; that population is an independent and not a depressed community, and it provides something like nine-tenths of what the nation consumes. Our land system is unscientific and wasteful, and our soil, rich as it is, feeds and rears a dwindling section of the people. These are the results of combining feudalism in economics with landlordism in politics. The Conservative Party, in its present hands, and in spite of the vague protest of the neo-Protectionists, stands for both these forces, and next Session will test their power of resistance to democracy.

MR. BIRRELL'S SUCCESS.

It is time, we think, for the Liberal Party to note that the little crowd of "Ascendency Men" who destroyed Mr. Wyndham's career in Ireland are endeavouring to perform the same service for his successor. In the interval they secured a Chief Secretary after their own heart in the person of Mr. Walter Long, and Mr. Walter Long to-day is making himself the violent spokesman of their cause. Various efforts to re-create the Tory Party on the basis of some unanimous cry have proved ineffective. At the General Election a last despairing appeal to rally against "Home Rule" was brushed contemptuously aside by the electorate. To-day Mr. Balfour at Devonport is very content to devote five minutes to the Tariff Reform tangle and fifty minutes to denouncing the Irish administration of Mr. Birrell. The English people fail to respond. The agitators are discovered as the children sitting in the market-place. "We have piped unto you and ye have not danced. We have mourned and ye have not lamented." The piping becomes shriller and the mourning more clamorous as the noise fails to arouse responsive echoes. Mr. Long descends from the customary outlet in the "Times" to plead for coercion in the halfpenny papers. He deplores the apathy of people on this side of the Channel. That apathy is indeed deplorable. It is part of the general profound indifference to the internal conditions of any country but their own, which is the characteristic of the English race, and the unanswerable argument for Home Rule. If England had ever taken a persistent and intelligent interest in the Irish agrarian problem, the Irish agrarian problem would long ago have been but a memory. The process of restoration, now so slow-moving and tiresome and so clumsily delayed by hitches in machinery, would have long ago been completed. Disturbance in Ireland, the most crimeless country in the civilised world, is never inexplicable and random. It has always signified that for some reason the agrarian revolution has become blocked and impeded. The wisdom of statesmanship adopts such measures as are convenient for the suppression of disturbance. But it also repairs the machinery and starts it again forward on its beneficent action.

The present attitude of the average Englishman is not difficult to summarise. He is weary of the continual report of trouble in Ireland. Inwardly, he is convinced that Ireland is a pampered nation, and that Ireland has received in the past far too large a proportion of the nation's attention. He believes Irishmen to be irrational, inexplicable, irritating; always discontented, never satisfied. He would gladly leave them alone altogether, to "stew in their own juice," if he could be quite convinced that in thus leaving them alone, they would not brew up danger to this country, and if he did not distrust them on account of their religion. When he hears of "cattle-driving," he is a little agitated, for he associates it instinctively with cattle-maiming, and he remembers the hideous stories of the outbreaks of twenty-seven years ago. When he finds that the process is merely driving cattle away at night, without bodily injury, he is inclined to think it is a silly sport; but he cannot get very excited about it. He thought that, by paying fourteen millions of his own money, he had got rid of the landlords; and he asks, somewhat wearily, why it is that the landlords have not gone. He is willing that cattle-drivers should be prosecuted; although his stomach turns a little at the idea of packing juries, or abolishing the recognised machinery of legal decision. He cannot understand the condition of mind in which, say, twelve men, chosen at random by lot, from any city or countryside, can be trusted to acquit, as innocent, men whom they know to be guilty. For he has never understood—he never will understand—the conception of a whole nation, united in passive resistance to his rule and repudiating his justice; which he is convinced—he is so sure of it—is the most benignant Government and the most impartial justice of the civilised world.

Such is England in its attitude towards Ireland: not the England of that tiny landlord class which has associated itself with the same class across the Channel, but the ordinary secure, sedate elector, who is the ultimate court of appeal. What of Ireland in its attitude towards England? Briefly that of a quiet but serious struggle between the bulk of a party which counsel moderation and a legal agitation, and the extremists who would revive the efforts of the old days of violence and agrarian crime. The application of coercion, by a Liberal Government, to deal with cattle-driving, is of course unthinkable. But if it were applied, without a shadow of doubt it would render all the work of moderation useless, and in a moment set the heather aflame. That is a deduction from the history of a hundred years. The idea that coercion has ever succeeded in quieting or pacifying Ireland is an idea belonging to the region of dreams. It has never had any result but that of attracting nine willing "martyrs" for every tenth which it succeeds in clapping into gaol. Ireland has never been pacified after each effort of the agrarian war, but by definite agrarian legislation and by the exercise of deliberate influence for peace amongst its national leaders. After the miserable violence of the '79 land war came dual ownership. After the De Freyne Estate agitation and the last dose of coercion came land purchase. Lord Dudley's Commission will report in a few days' time. That report is expected to declare for expropriation. No nation, was Lincoln's famous declaration which precipitated the Civil War, "can remain half slave and half free." Ireland, in the testimony of all competent observers, cannot remain half transferred to its own people, half in the hands of the alien. When the process is completed there will be no further indication of agrarian unrest in Ireland.

The present campaign is concentrating all its violence upon Mr. Birrell. He is written down a "failure"; he is rebuked for his humour; he is described as cowering before the agitations of rebellion or (in Mr. Balfour's pleasant indictment) shackled and tortured by the stupidity of his own former pledges and promises. No Chief Secretary who was honestly seeking the welfare of the common people of Ireland could fail to earn such objugations; which are entirely honourable to the recipient. So far from proving a failure, Mr. Birrell in Ireland is attaining an almost unexpected and quite remarkable success. No Liberal Chief Secretary up to the present has succeeded in winning any kind of sympathy or co-operation in Ireland from the native population. The Irish people are convinced that he is an honest Home Ruler. They are convinced that he is there with no interested aim. They are convinced that he is labouring under impossible conditions with the desire to effect what reform is possible in the general interests of the people. "Mr. Birrell," is the remarkable testimony of a Nationalist Member of Parliament, "instead of threatening coercion, appeals to the people themselves, and his appeal has already met with remarkable response." Belfast was in a condition of civil war while the soldiers maintained order; when the soldiers were withdrawn and the priests requested to keep the peace, tranquillity remained undisturbed. "The question for Government is this," says Mr. Stephen Gwynn; "do you want to punish cattle-driving, or do you want to stop it?" In such an alternative one type of mind will inevitably choose the former; another type of mind the latter; and argument between them is vain. Mr. Birrell has appealed to the people of Ireland, in the name of one who fully recognises the evil to which these demonstrations design to call attention, and who is determined to remedy it at the earliest possible moment. He has declared that the work of devising such remedy will be hampered and may be ruined by a further continuance of the agitation. In any other country but Ireland such an appeal might be received with derision; but Ireland is not as any other country. The advocates of force are half beside themselves at the idea of concluding treaties with "law breakers"; but the advocates of force have tried their policy for many decades and generations, and produced nothing but red ruin and the breaking up of laws. "To bring about the change from pasture to tillage," runs the remarkable confession already quoted above, "from eleven months' tenants to occupying owners, many of us held that agitation was necessary, and we advised it. Now feeling convinced that the necessity for land reform in this direction is just as clear and as urgent to Mr. Birrell and to Mr. Russell as to me, and that they mean business, I, for my part, shall no longer advise the continuance of an agitation which, if carried further, may hamper them financially and otherwise." "We believe in no man's infallibility," wrote Spurgeon of Mr. Gladstone, "but it is restful to be sure of one man's integrity." Men in Ireland are beginning to be sure of one man's integrity: of a man "who is prepared to stand by and act upon the fulness of his Liberalism even at the utmost political risk to himself." That attitude towards an English Chief Secretary is something new in the history of the two nations. It is an attitude which those who live upon the inherited hatreds of a subject and despised people will never forgive. But there are many who would be very content to shun success, if this is to be reckoned as failure.

NATAL AND THE EMPIRE.

Most English readers, unacquainted with the lingua Nataliensis, on reading of the unconditional surrender of Dinizulu, probably pictured the Zulu chief, at the head of a rebel army, submitting to the superior force with which he found himself confronted before he had found time to carry into execution his nefarious design of swooping down with a murderous impi upon the unprotected farmers of Natal. It may, therefore be well to remind them that there is nothing in the official explanation of the military movement in Zululand to sustain the allegation of "the existence of a widespread conspiracy" leading to "a general rising." The official list of "outrages," no doubt, suggests that the outlawed remnant of Bambaata's band, which ever since the Mome massacre last year, has wandered in the Inkandhla bush, has sought vengeance on neighbouring chiefs who slew their friends and took their cattle. But, considering the magnitude of last year's havoc, these cases have been very rare, and there is no evidence of concerted action among their unknown perpetrators. The case was evidently one for police, and not for military, operations. As for Dinizulu himself, there has been absolutely nothing in his record to warrant the supposition, either that he was preparing rebellion, or that he would refuse to come into Natal to meet any charge his enemies might concoct. Only last May, on the invitation of the Natal authorities, he went to Pietermaritzburg, and underwent a searching examination before the Governor. He has repeatedly expressed his willingness to meet these new vague accusations in the same peaceful manner, and the march of these armed troops to within a few miles of his kraal looks like a deliberate act of provocative insolence on the part of the Natal authorities. It is now evident that even in Natal some misgivings, financial and other, exist regarding the wisdom of this military expedition. Though the "Daily Telegraph," which has given fuller attention to this Zululand incident than any other newspaper, fiercely denounces in its editorial columns those amongst us who venture to question the humanity and discretion of the Natal authorities, its own Natal correspondent shows that criticism is not confined to English Liberals. In a most significant telegram on Tuesday last, we read:—

"Admittedly an awkward situation has been established in Zululand now that Dinizulu has surrendered quietly. Although the prime object of the troops was to capture Dinizulu, the natural course of asking his surrender before despatching a force was not adopted. Until he offered to surrender the Government kept secret their intention to arrest him. It is complained now that the troops have been used expensively, for this purpose might have been achieved by a magisterial summons."

Exactly. Why then were the troops sent? Not to arrest "the rebels," for that, we are told, "the police were capable of doing." Either the despatch of this expedition was an act of folly and extravagance, or was certainly calculated, if not designed, to stir the latent fighting spirit of the Zulus, and to procure the rebellion which would then furnish an ex post facto justification for the policy of violence.

Dinizulu is, we gather, to be put on his trial at Maritzburg for inciting to rebellion. We hope the trial will be a full and fair one, though Dinizulu's experience of Colonial justice twenty years ago is not calculated to induce in him very sanguine expectations. Meanwhile the situation still remains a very serious one in Zululand and northern Natal, over which the state of anarchy named martial law still prevails. If, as is suggested, the troops are sent to capture all the chiefs alleged to have "rebel tendencies," a recurrence of last year's bloodshed and destruction may be anticipated. For any evidence of resentment at an armed invasion of their lands, any refusal or tardiness in delivering their friends to the tender mercies of a court-martial, any flight at the approach of the troops, was last year systematically treated as rebellion, and brought upon its perpetrators a remorseless retribution. In order adequately to realise the state of mingled hate and terror, which must exist in Zululand as a legacy of last year's "punishment," we must remember that at least three thousand Zulus, virtually defenceless, were shot down, many thousands creeping, wounded, into the bush, that whole tracts of their country were devastated by fire, and a large population left starving and homeless. If these troops are given a free licence to arrest all persons against whom a charge of "intending rebellion" can be constructed, a repetition of these terrible scenes may be expected.

It is presumptuous, we are told, for us to express opinions upon an issue which Natal authorities alone are competent to determine. But this contention can no longer be upheld on the present issue. Last year the same charges were launched, in precisely similar phraseology, of conspiracy, intended rebellion and projected massacre, and facts gave the lie to these allegations. There was no conspiracy, no rebellion, and the massacre was inflicted by the white colonial troops. This terrible abuse of martial law last year is a valid basis for our appeal to the Imperial Government to use every legitimate authority to stay a repetition of the iniquity this year. Indeed, the conduct of Natal brings up for necessary consideration the whole larger issue involved in the unregulated use of martial law by incompetent Colonial Governments. That any self-governing colony, which has received its constitution from the Imperial Government under express guarantees of the maintenance of justice and of civilised institutions, shall be at liberty at its own will to renounce all these guarantees and, reverting to the license of military autocracy, be empowered to call upon the Imperial Government for a merely formal ratification of the Act of Indemnity by which it has whitewashed its illegalities, is an abuse of the imperial relations. It is a particularly flagrant case when a colony like Natal repeatedly recurs to this illegal status in order to deal, as her own laws will not permit, with the lives and liberty and property of those British subjects within her confines who are deprived of all share in self-government, and who, for the protection of their vital interests, can only look to the fair administration of laws made by the master race.

We strongly urge upon the Imperial Government the importance of devising effective remedies for these abuses of Colonial constitutions for the purpose of illegal treatment of subject peoples within their borders. No one questions that it is our imperial duty to secure the repression of naked slavery within all portions of our Empire. A fortiori there is an obligation to put down or prevent barbarities which are worse than slavery. We are well aware of the extreme delicacy of the question, but this condition does not warrant the British Government in shirking a plain duty, viz., to secure the life and liberty of her subjects against illegal force. So long as the Empire is to retain any reality and unity some function of imperial justice must remain for her to exercise. Some minimum standard of civilised government must be continuously maintained in all parts of that empire, unless we are prepared for a moral dissolution, to be followed, we may be sure at no distant time, by a political dissolution. And there is no part of South Africa where this minimum standard is so essential as in Natal.

The condition in which these subject races live, in colonies where their presence is a negation of true self-government, is incomparably the gravest of all our imperial problems. We are well aware of the extreme difficulty of attempting to enforce any close regulation or protection by imperial officers within the territory of self-governing colonies. No solution lies that way. But the case of Zululand may well induce the Imperial Government to consider whether the precedent of Basutoland, which was withdrawn from the control of Cape Colony when the latter had proved its incapacity to govern it peaceably, should not be made applicable here. In any event, when the question of the unification of the South African State comes up for settlement, care must be taken to secure more stable guarantees for justice and humanity to the native population than exist at present in the instance of Natal. If any further evidence was needed than the damning testimony of recent history to the incapacity of the small Garden Colony to govern with humane intelligence its Zulu tribes, it is afforded by the "Report of the Native Affairs," published two months ago. The Natal government of the natives is there roundly designated as "a system of government which disregards natural laws, leaves out of account the idiosyncrasy of a people, and is doomed to failure," and "which, as it fails to attract sympathy on the one hand, and loyalty on the other, stands self-condemned, and should be replaced by another framed more on natural conditions, and the habits and temperament of the people." Can a Government, guilty of such errors in its past, reasonably claim immunity from imperial criticism, and be expected to carry out, of its own motion, unaided by imperial assistance, an adequate code of reforms for the future conduct of its native affairs?

A LEGAL MINIMUM WAGE.

LORD MILNER was described on a historic occasion as a "lost mind." But before the loss occurred Lord Milner had imbibed from Arnold Toynbee and others some sound economic principles which appear to have survived the wreck. The chief of these is the conception that the State has a more positive responsibility towards its members, and particularly its poorer members, than that of securing them legal freedom and immunity from unjust or excessive taxation. These are indeed important things to secure. But it can never be ignored by anyone who looks the facts of modern industry steadily in the face that under the forms of complete political and legal freedom the economic forces of the modern industrial system may build up a tyranny under which the weaker are crushed as effectually as by a despotic system established by law. The woman who together with her children works from morning to night, and from week-end to week-end, stitching button-holes, fastening "hooks and eyes" on to cards, or making cheap coats and trousers, is legally free to take her work elsewhere if she is not satisfied with the conditions and the payment. If she thinks 1s. 6d. too little for making a dozen shirts she is at liberty to find, if she can, anyone who will pay her 2s. Here, according to the old economics, the duty of the State in the matter ceases. If she cannot find anyone who will pay her more than 1s. 6d., then, according to the economists, 1s. 6d. must be assumed to be the fair price for that amount of work. No other test of fairness, it was alleged, could be assigned except that which the laws of supply and demand actually secure in the end for the worker. Let everyone have equal opportunity to get the best price he can, and the whole duty of the State is done.

Unfortunately the whole interest of the State in the matter is by no means ended. If as politicians or economists we are to have no bowels of compassion for the unhappy workers whose utmost toil cannot secure for them the bare necessities of decent existence, we are nevertheless as ratepayers compelled to stand between them and starvation. And of one thing we may be certain. The victims of the sweated trades are not really living on their sweated wages. Either they are being maintained by some outside support, whether of friends and relations or of public charity, or they are slowly or rapidly wearing away. Their strength, insufficiently supported by the pittance they can earn, is being wasted month by month, and sooner or later they, and probably their children with them, must come on the public for support. Meanwhile, at best, these same children are growing ill-nourished, ill-housed, and ill-clothed. They will be turned into the streets at the first moment that the School Attendance Officer will allow, to make coppers by street selling, or whatever semi-vagrant occupation comes to hand. They will learn no trade. They will do nothing to equip them for the struggle of adult life. They are merely preparing themselves to swell the ranks of the unemployable, and they in their turn will become a burden on the community. For the public "sweating" is no business proposition. It may enjoy the cheap goods, but it has to pay in hard cash later on for all the loss of human tissue that has made them cheap.

How then can society protect itself against the sweater, how can it alleviate this dark seething mass of human misery, how can it choke up this source of future pauperism? The remedy suggested by the Anti-Sweating League, to which Lord Milner gave his blessing, is the creating of Wages Boards, on the analogy of those in Victoria, to fix a minimum wage in certain scheduled trades. The principle underlying the proposal, whether it be accepted or not, is readily intelligible. It lays down that just as the State has prescribed certain conditions as to health, safety, and hours in industry, so it may also secure certain conditions as to the primary object of the worker, namely, wages. The grounds for interference are the same in both cases. On the one hand there is the economic weakness of the operatives, which induces them to assent to conditions which are not for their good. On the other there are the large permanent interests of society itself, which cannot view with unconcern the acceptance by any class of the community of conditions of work incompatible with safety or with health. It may be said that these arguments imply an enlargement of the functions of the State. They imply that it is among the duties of the State, not merely to guarantee subsistence to all its members—as is implied in the Poor Law system—but so far as lies in its power to secure them, in return for serious effort of their own, an independent maintenance in enjoyment of, at least, the bare necessities of a civilised existence. If it is argued that this is an extension of State-responsibility, we may admit the impeachment, without shame.

But it may be asked: Can the thing be done? Can a minimum wage be fixed, can agreement be secured, and if so, will it not merely mean an increase of unemployment? As to the first point, it should be understood that there is no question here of a universal minimum. The proposal is to constitute Boards representing employers and employed, who would be thoroughly conversant with their own trade in their own district, and would legislate accordingly. They would in every respect resemble the many Conciliation Boards in the great organised trades, except that, instead of relying on the agreement which instituted the Board, their decisions would rest on legal authority. It would, of course, be the first object of such a Board to secure agreement. In practice it would proceed by "levelling up." It would raise the wages of the worst shops to those paid by the best and most capable employers. In so doing it is true that it would probably eliminate some very incapable workers from employment. This is a drawback which has to be faced. But may it not be fairly said that among those at present underpaid there are two classes? There are those whose work would be worth far more than they earn, provided they had but the economic position which would enable them to secure payment proportioned to their industry. There are also those who, miserably paid as they are, are not producing and cannot produce more than the value of their wage. The object of legislation is to help the former class to the honourable independence which, once achieved, they are able to maintain. In the case of the latter, it should surely be recognised that those who, through no fault but that of sheer incapacity, are permanently unable to earn a decent livelihood, are fit objects of wisely directed help. In a word, the consequence of the Wages Board legislation will be found to be an increased need for better provision for dealing with the unemployed. At all events, the very worst use to which we can put the incapable is that of helping by their competition to drag down into the mire of misery those a step above themselves, who might under more favourable circumstances be able to maintain themselves in modest comfort.

The practicability of Wages Boards in this country has been called in question. On the whole, the experience of Victoria seems to us quite as satisfactory as could be expected. There have been some partial failures. The most sanguine could hardly expect to escape them. In some five cases there has been friction, but in four of the five it has been in one way or another surmounted. Of forty-two Boards that have arrived at a rate of wages, only one has been a total failure, and the great majority have worked smoothly. Doubtless the English conditions are more complex, but, on the other hand, the task proposed in England is much more modest, being confined to a limited number of specially scheduled sweated trades. The scheme holds the field. No other method of dealing with this tragic side of our social life has yet been propounded. Mr. Herbert Gladstone has been well advised in taking steps to obtain a special report on the Victorian system, and if this report is as favourable as the Colonial official reports themselves, we have no doubt that he will find means of adapting the system to English conditions.

Life and Letters.

THE MORTAL MEANING OF FOG.

WE discussed in THE NATION the other day the contrast between private magnificence and public meanness, in the external structure of our British civilisation. Still more striking is the contrast between private cleanliness and public filth. While our cold tub and personal fresh air practices have gathered almost superstitious sanctions of propriety and decency, we are content to go on, decade after decade, breathing in our streets a common air, largely made up of the waste matter and noxious vapours given out in the processes of city industry and life. Except for a rare Sunday in a breezy spring or autumn, Londoners do not know what really pure air means. The normal state of London atmosphere, far short of fog, is so packed with particles of carbon and other far more harmful things, that the direct rays of the sunlight cannot penetrate, while free breezes cannot carry off its poisonous freight. Nor is it much comfort to Londoners to know that many of our great industrial cities are worse sufferers. We all, in private, admit the value of fresh air and sunshine. Nor will we deny that the increase of bronchial and pulmonary diseases must be due in some measure to the foul conditions of our town atmosphere, especially in the congested working-class quarters. The air we breathe is probably a more important factor in vitality even than the food we eat, and the high mortality, especially among children, in our city slums is largely attributable to atmospheric poisons. Dr. Tatham, the Medical Officer of Health for Manchester, has stated his deliberate conviction that the people living in the central district of Manchester lose 30 per cent. of their normal life from the conditions of their surroundings; and of these conditions foul air is certainly the most important. In London the issue is dramatised a few times every winter in some famous "fog."

The attitude of the public mind towards these fogs is typical enough. We grumble at them when they are upon us. But we are really rather proud of them. They even contribute an element of romance to the dull tenor of our routine life. We like to astonish foreign visitors with an experience of "a real London fog," and when we are informed that Paris sometimes suffers quite as heavily, we feel patriotically indignant at this mean theft of our supremacy. This fact that our fog has become a sort of sentimental asset contributes something to our refusal to seek a remedy. But our apathy and impotence are deeper rooted in the national psychology. "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? How much rather then when he saith to thee 'Wash and be clean'?" This surely goes to the root of the matter. We have no realising sense of the mortal meaning of our London fog. If we knew that on some one day each December the fumes of the neighbouring chimneys would sweep down the Strand in a poisonous stream of vapour, so strong as to asphyxiate the several thousand people walking in the street and destroy their lives, such a calamity would be unendurable, and no expense or effort of public authority would be spared to prevent it. Yet if this same calamity is spread out instead of being thus condensed, if it operates gradually instead of suddenly, irregularly instead of regularly, indirectly instead of directly, not only is it endurable, but it seems possible to generate no serious determination to combat it. "During a famous fog in London in 1880," writes Mr. Graham, in a little volume entitled "The Destruction of Daylight" (George Allen) "some 3,000 people more than usual died in three weeks. A still worse case occurred in 1892, when, after a heavy fog, there were 1,484 additional deaths in a week in London. A large part of this illness and death is caused by the soot passing into the breathing tubes and causing bronchitis; the delicate membranes of the lungs become clogged and inflamed with sticky soot, and so become diseased." There can be no reasonable doubt that the conversion of a comparatively innocent Thames valley mist into London fog, by an unnecessary addition of smoke, is directly responsible for thousands of deaths every winter.

Yet it appears as if nothing effective in the way of remedy could be obtained. In order to get a quick and strong redress, a grievance must be novel and urgent in its nature, it must be perpetrated by known persons, and suffered by known persons. The causation must be direct and obvious, and must stir a feeling of outrage in the public mind. Unless all these conditions are present, it is scarcely possible to get a real remedy. A case in point is the grievance of the motor car. Here are present many of the semeia of a public outrage: a small number of known persons openly abuse the highways, offending and injuring every sense of the other wayfarers, habitually defying the law of the land, and causing loss of life and limb to many citizens. Yet somehow no remedy appears feasible. Why? Chiefly because the grievance, though tolerably rapid, has been gradual and continuous. In its inception, the motor car was interesting as a miracle, and as it grew into a nuisance and a peril, the habit of seeing, smelling, dodging, and enduring it grew likewise: at no particular time did it grow from a tolerable nuisance into an intolerable outrage, and so nothing has been done. If in a single season the revolution had occurred which has made our best highroads the private playground of a few thousand reckless plutocrats, even the tame Southerner would have taken arms against the injustice.

So with the smoke nuisance, of longer standing, of slower growth and of subtler injury. It is probable that the larger mass mind is immovable, because it does not really believe that good air is a condition of healthy life. In the vast majority of our town dwellers, we must remember, there is no consciousness of the ugliness and meanness of their city, no realisation of hygiene still less of the æsthetic value of pure air and sunshine. As a nation we do not believe that smoke is responsible for the vital injuries which Mr. Graham describes, and until we do we shall not exert the necessary effort to deal with it. In his careful, well-informed, and temperate discussion, Mr. Graham shows that several technical remedies for the worst of the evil already exist. Considering the contributions of the domestic grate and the factory chimney, respectively, to the smoke nuisance, he shows what can be done by the use of gas fires, coke, coaline, and other substitutes for our wasteful domestic fire, and sets forth the various claims of reformed methods of stoking, and other economies of fuel which have already been tested in industrial furnaces.

No serious doubt exists about the technical feasibility of stopping the smoke evil. It is entirely a matter of imposing certain immediate expenses and inconveniences of no great size upon business and private householders, and of securing an adequate enforcement of existing and required legislation. It would not cost very much, and the cost would rapidly be recouped in human and mechanical energy. But such solution, simple as it sounds, is very difficult. British cities are designed mainly for industrialists to work in, not for citizens to live in. This being so, it has been virtually impossible to get laws upon the Statute Book, or if they are there to get them administered, if the administration interferes or seems to interfere with some immediate economy of industry. Stupid or short-sighted manufacturers want to be allowed to waste their coal, to pollute rivers, and to exercise other sorts of industrial liberty, and as politicians, magistrates, and citizens, they prostitute their public influence to their private business interests. Therefore they got inserted in the Public Health Act of 1875 the qualifying words, "as far as practicable," to undo the effectiveness of the prohibition of injurious smoke, and, as local administrators, have in most towns, by refusals to convict, or by the imposition of trivial fines, reduced the law to a dead letter.

The conquest of smoke belongs in truth to that great struggle to secure the city for the citizens, to make it primarily a place to live in, and only secondarily a place of industry. Here it is idle to trust to voluntary individual action: a few public-spirited manufacturers will do their duty and something more, the majority will only move when they must. "Masters will not take the trouble to alter their furnaces, nor will the men alter their method of stoking, unless they are compelled." Mr. Graham is thoroughly practical in his suggestions for the alteration and improved administration of the law. His proposals are as follows:—

(1) Omit the words "black," and "as far as practicable," and the statutory notice from the Public Health Act.

(2) Make the fines cumulative and high.

(3) Give power to the Court to order smoke-prevention appliances on the Chief Inspector's advice.

(4) Put the inspectors under the Alkali Acts, and make them independent of local control.

(5) Let each large district be under a competent chemist, or engineer, with scientific training.

(6) Inspect domestic fire-grates, and make householders liable to a fine for excessive or protracted smoke. Remit a little from the rates of gas-users, by selling gas a trifle below cost. Compel the use of gas or electric cookers and coke furnaces where possible.

Are we as a nation still so indifferent to the value of pure air, so much lovers of darkness rather than of light, that we cannot muster enough intelligent self-interest to secure this charter of civic cleanliness?

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT.

ALMOST all recent legislation points to the fact that imprisonment is falling more and more into discredit as a remedy for crime. A prolonged experience of its operation shows that it seldom has the effect either of reforming or of deterring the convicted offender. Of the male population committed to English prisons more than one half have been convicted before; and of the female population more than three-fourths have been convicted before. Thousands have been convicted ten or more times and thousands have been convicted over twenty times. In the face of revelations of this kind it is impossible to retain more than the smallest modicum of faith in imprisonment or penal servitude as a remedy for crime. Imprisonment under the best conceivable conditions deprives a man of his liberty and reduces him for the time being to the status of a slave. And slavery is not and never will be a good preparation for freedom. In spite of the discredit which has fallen upon imprisonment we still put people into jail at the rate of nearly two hundred thousand a year. For a variety of offences imprisonment with all its imperfections is the only mode of treatment which society has been able to devise.

In modern penal legislation the great difficulty has been to find substitutes for the prison cell. We have, it is true, such substitutes as fining, sureties for good behaviour, reformatory and industrial schools for juveniles, and more recently inebriate reformatories have been introduced on a small scale for habitual drunkards. But when all these penalties have been exhausted there still remains an enormous number of petty cases which are dealt with by short terms of imprisonment. According to the last Prison Report nearly seventy thousand cases were committed to prison for periods of a week and under, and nearly forty-five thousand cases for periods of from eight to fourteen days. In other words, considerably more than one half of the prison population committed during the year had sentences of fourteen days and under. These short sentences to prison are futile and mischievous, and it is to be hoped that the Probation of Offenders Act, passed last Session, and which will come into force almost immediately, may have the effect of limiting the number of petty offenders who now undergo brief terms of imprisonment. According to the provisions of this Act, an official, to be called a probation officer, may be appointed for every Petty Sessions division, and offenders whom it is not deemed expedient to imprison may be liberated on condition that they put themselves under the supervision of the probation officer. The duties of the probation officer will be to advise, assist, and befriend offenders placed in his charge; to see that they carry out the conditions under which they were liberated, and to report to the court as to their behaviour. This system has been in operation for a considerable number of years in the United States, and it has met with a solid amount of success in all cases where the courts have been able to obtain a zealous probation officer. If our courts succeed in getting hold of the right kind of probation officer, this new substitute for imprisonment may be of the greatest value in dealing with small offences.

Mr. Gladstone is to be congratulated upon the passing of this useful little Act, and it is to be hoped that the justices of the peace in our boroughs, and where it is possible in our counties, will take the lead which he has given them, and do their utmost to make the new Act a success. The Home Secretary is on more difficult ground with the schemes which he says he has in hand for dealing with habitual offenders. According to the brief report of a recent speech of his at the London magistrates' dinner, he proposes next Session to bring in a Bill for detaining habitual offenders after they have served their sentences of imprisonment or penal servitude. It will be interesting to see the conditions under which he hopes to work such a scheme. He seems to contemplate the establishment of a new kind of prison, in which habitual offenders at the expiration of seven, ten, or fifteen years' penal servitude, are to be incarcerated afresh for an indefinite period. If such a scheme is only intended for the weak-minded and the imbecile, who, under any circumstances, are not fit to be at large, it would stand in the same category as asylums for the insane and mentally defective classes, and no objections could be urged against it. But if it is his intention to introduce into this country the principle of what is called the "indeterminate sentence," he must be prepared to encounter serious opposition from many quarters. He must remember that an indeterminate sentence—that is to say, a punishment without any fixed limit attached to it—is entirely out of harmony with the general principles of English law. The object of a fixed sentence of so many months' imprisonment, or so many years of penal servitude, is not merely to punish the criminal, but also to protect his liberty against the arbitrary will of the administration. The indeterminate sentence withdraws the individual undergoing it from the sphere of law, and places his liberty completely at the mercy of prison officials or Home Office officials. We do not believe that the people of England, with their jealous regard for individual freedom, will ever consent to place the freedom of any man, however degraded, permanently at the mercy of a prison bureaucracy. An extension of the principle of conditional liberation, and not the indeterminate sentence, is the English method of dealing with habitual offenders. According to our present system, a prisoner in penal servitude can only be liberated after he has served three-fourths of his sentence. If this principle of conditional liberation were made more elastic, if it were extended so that the offender, at the discretion of the authorities, might have his sentence conditionally remitted by one-third or one-half, it would meet all the necessities of the situation. At bottom, the criminal problem is not so much a penal as a social problem. It is not by penal measures, but by social reforms, that crime will be reduced; and it would be a fatal mistake to do anything which might lead the public to believe that mere alterations in penal machinery are a satisfactory substitute for an amelioration of the wretched social and economic conditions out of which crime takes its rise.

We have an excellent instance of the futility of altering penal machinery in the expectation that such change would lead to the diminution in the number of prisoners committed to gaol for debt. Some years ago Mr. Gladstone was chairman of a committee of inquiry into the administration of prisons and the treatment of prisoners. One of the recommendations of this committee was that debtors should be treated like ordinary criminal prisoners. This recommendation was made, among other reasons, in the belief that if debtors were treated as severely as ordinary criminals, it would deter them from coming to prison. But what has been the result? During the last ten years or so, the debtor population in prisons, so far from diminishing, has increased something like twenty-five per cent. Here is an object-lesson, if ever there was one, of the futility of imagining that offences can be reduced in number by the mere exercise of severity. The existing rules for the criminal treatment of debtors who are incarcerated for purely civil offences ought to be abolished at once, as they can be abolished, by the Secretary of State. The proper policy, in the case of debtors, is not to reduce them to the rank of criminal prisoners, but to take exactly the opposite line, and abolish imprisonment for debt. In the "Positivist Review" for the present month, Mr. Atkinson, one of our most cautious and judicious stipendiary magistrates, puts forward a powerful plea for the abolition of imprisonment for debt. He gives several heart-rending instances of the cruel hardships inflicted on the debtor and his family, under the existing law. The Government cannot afford to neglect Mr. Atkinson's appeal. Last year the number of debtor and civil-process prisoners amounted to nearly 20,000. The abolition of the existing law as to petty debts would sweep most of these people out of prison, and confer a real benefit on the community as a whole.

THE EXTINCTION OF BIRDS.

It might be thought that the bird was particularly well equipped for resisting the forces that make for the extinction of species. Far better able than the mammals to escape from narrow surroundings; living a life that gives scope to the intelligent and energetic faculties; endowed in a pre-eminent degree with courage and an æsthetic sense, and their corollary, a strong selective instinct; the bird should be the last to allow itself to be shut up in an island and there to dwindle into impotence, and to perish at the first inletting of fresh elements of competition. When we think of the periodic and casual exchanges that take place between the bird population of our islands and that of Europe, Africa, Asia, and even America, and the apparent feebleness of some of the wanderers, we are scarcely prepared for the long list of extinct species that the islands of the world (and the continents in less degree), have to offer.

The northern species, for the most part, hold their own. They are not only hardier than the birds of the tropics, but almost universally given to the habit of seasonal migration. We do not forget the great auk, the Labrador duck, and the few others that form the exception that proves the rule. The overwhelming proportion of the long list of birds extinct within historic times, dealt with by Mr. Walter Rothschild in his new book,* are examples of the degenerating tendencies of a tropical existence. The dodo is the best known—that wingless pigeon, many times the size of a flying pigeon, that awaited so long on Mauritius the fate that was certain to befall it the first time the island should be visited by sailors pining for fresh meat. The island of Réunion supplied an almost exact counterpart in the Bourbon dodo, and a third though importantly different bird existed not far away in Rodriguez. The last was far less "ineptus" than the dodo, or the Bourbon solitaire, being endowed with strong legs for running, though, like them, it had given up the use of its wings. It was, says L'Éguat, "wonderfully beautiful." He compares it, indeed, to a beautiful woman. "They walk with so much stateliness and good grace that one cannot help admiring them and loving them, by which means their fine mien often saves their lives. As soon as they are caught, they shed tears, without crying, and refuse all manner of sustenance, till they die."

From L'Éguat's description of this running solitaire, we can imagine that its imprisonment had been less protracted than that of the dodo, or that it had some enemy, not so persistent as to keep it on the wing but active enough to make it keep its legs in use. The art of flying, which fascinates the featherless biped so much that many of us would give our arms for wings, seems to be rather a bore than otherwise to the birds themselves. It is fear, not pleasure, that has given the bird wings, and the vivacity, intelligence, and æsthetic tastes it displays are rather the outcome of flight than its cause. As soon as the necessity for wings is abolished, the bird begins to give up the pleasures of flight, and to indulge its carnal appetite instead. Parrots, Amazons, and macaws are among those that, without entirely giving up the use of the wing, suffer themselves to be cut off from their kindred by a few miles of sea, and many of them are figured in this gallery of extinct beauties. The imaginative avine temperament lends itself easily to any tendency towards variation, and it is far more likely that specific differences have arisen after geographical severance, than that each island should be the last standing-place of a species once far more widely distributed. The St. Kilda wren is just as certainly a descendant of the mainland wren as the man of St. Kilda, in whom, by the way, Mr. Kearton has shown some points of variation, is a descendant of a mainland race.

Mr. Rothschild names in his list of causes tending towards specific extinction the draining of marsh lands, the stripping of forests, and other direct or indirect changes, such as the introduction of a new enemy or the destruction of an old food. The first cause may be said to have operated to a considerable extent in this country, for the draining of the fens of Norfolk and Cambridge has driven away many species once very abundant. So has the sanitation of London abolished the kite, though it can scarcely be said to have been the cause that has driven it into the mountains of Wales. The spoon-bill and the kite are as common as ever throughout the world, and it is conceivable that when all bogs have been drained and the exhibition of carrion made the rarest occurrence, they may still find a living. Darwin has reminded us that there are still woodpeckers on the plains of La Plata, where not a tree grows, and that others of the family in North America have become frugivorous, while yet others get their living as fly-catchers. It is difficult to destroy a numerous and widespread race by taking away its food. Some members of it will manage to adapt themselves to a substitute, and gradually the vitality that produced so large a horde will flow full-tide in the new direction.

Even London has its dodo. In the green island of the parks, surrounded by a sea of bricks and mortar, the wood-pigeon, one of the wildest and most active birds of the country, and a visitor to and from the Continent, is slowly accumulating lethargic habits and their consequences, that may some day justify us in naming it Columba inepta. Countrymen who have seen and admired the wild cushat in high flight at the rate of sixty miles an hour almost fail to recognise the species in the fat thing waddling among the sparrows, feeding from the fingers of man and scarcely deigning to open its wings for the purpose of scrambling into the low bush in which its nest is perennially built. The fear of rats and cats is just sufficient to keep it from abandoning the air altogether and building and living on the ground. Even as it is, a removal of the fond protection that makes its easy life safe would in a few weeks cause the extinction of the London wood-pigeon.

There are two notable instances of lost species that are not covered by the facts just considered. One is the Passenger pigeon of North America. Up to the forties of last century it must have numbered myriads. When it moved about the country the air was darkened for miles, the roosting birds destroyed forests and the inhabitants of wide districts ate nothing but pigeon for weeks together. Its nesting area in Ontario covered hundreds of square miles of continuous rookery, single trees in which have been known to contain ninety nests. Mr. Rothschild accounts the species extinct in a wild state and says that the sole remainder of the race is a group of five birds in the possession of Professor Whitman, of Chicago. Reports collected for many years by the editor of "Recreation," however, are hard to overlook and seem to point to a distinct revival in the history of the passenger pigeon. Every year since 1891 Mr. Shields has had accounts sent to him from Manitoba, Wisconsin, and several parts of Canada, and as late as 1903 a band of three hundred birds was said to be inhabiting a happily remote part of Pennsylvania. But even if these reports are all true, the passenger pigeon stands as a continental species of enormous numbers brought to the very verge of extinction almost in the space of a human generation. The Labrador duck was never nearly so common, but up to a few years ago lived an apparently healthy existence in a range whose winter extension covered a good deal of the Hudson Bay Company's territory. The collector is not accountable for its disappearance. Some cataclysm or far-reaching misfortune of which we know nothing has visited it probably in its nesting ground and extinguished an interesting species whose nearest relative, so far as feathered appearance goes, is the old squaw. There is, however, many another species of duck, notably among those coming from the south, that the American gunner seems likely soon to exterminate. Extinction by human agency works with geometrical acceleration. Soon the common bird begins to get a little rare, and every specimen acquires a market value above that which the pot gives it. Then the price of its skin goes up from shillings to pounds and the bird is not only shot at sight but waited for and sought out. It is a sad story and one which surely does no credit to our civilisation.

* "Extinct Birds." With 45 coloured plates embracing 63 subjects and other illustrations. By the Hon. Walter Rothschild, Ph.D., F.Z.S. Hutchinson. £25.

THE UNDYING HOPE.

THE undying hope of humanity rests upon a conviction that its triumph is essential to the universal triumph, that its interests will not be sacrificed to meet the Divine Scheme, but are a vital part of it, and that man's need of God is God's need of him. The time is past when we could be comforted by any faith short of this, by any theory representing either God's justice or His love as optional, something that He could refuse to give and yet be God, or something to which we could be utterly and permanently irresponsible, and yet be men. We speak no longer of His uncovenanted mercies, simply because we hold that His covenant is as wide and as deep as the universe, and takes cognisance of the path of every atom, and of every human soul. There is no safety, no shelter, in any lesser covenant. A God who could do without us would be a God we could do without. We could not even miss Him, if we were not mysteriously one with Him. But if we are one with Him, what follows?

Every unit, every fraction, must be justified by the whole, and in its turn, to some extent, must justify the whole, and itself. Human sin seems to be the refusal of self-conscious beings to afford this justification, to realise their own context, their explanation in God. The temporary refusal, because in every living soul, deeper than even sin, there lies the impulse towards self-justification—or self-realisation—the two are one.

But this is not an easy gospel with which to come into close contact; and many people, all their lives, successfully hold it at arm's length. For it requires us to explain ourselves, our follies, and our sins, by something diviner and greater. We would willingly explain them by something smaller. If we are selfish and indolent, we may talk of temperament, and of heredity, and circumstance, and the clay and the potter; and all the while God is waiting for the only true apology—sacrifice and honest work. It is not enough to confess that we have robbed Him; we must pay the price of every sin; and the price is righteousness. Not pain—mere pain cancels no debt, though it may be a necessary factor in the exaction of payment. But if we have been weak, we must coin a deeper strength from weakness; and if we have been hard and bitter and revengeful, we must distil love from hate. The saint is the only explanation of the sinner that is accepted by God; and He not only accepts, but demands it; not only demands, but impels it. For the final guarantee of man's divinity is the humanity of God.

It is this Divine insistence, this relentlessness of God's grace, that is our hope. Words and tears are of no avail: we must pay the uttermost farthing. Hate might spare us: love never will. And if it seems a hard doctrine, this inexorableness of God, we must remember that His exaction of righteousness from unrighteousness is likewise His exaction of infinite joy from pain, and peace from thwarted passion and selfish agony. There are so many hells, we need a heaven that is built out of them, that can use and transmute them. A heaven that cannot interpret hell, is no heaven for mortal men; and to many of us the consciousness of hell and heaven comes simultaneously—when, like poor Dives, we lift up our eyes, "being in torment." It is as if nothing else would ever have induced us to lift them up! And then, let us hope, we think, as He did, of our brothers, or our friends. And then, surely the bridging of the great gulf is only a matter of time.

Have you never seen, passing over a coarse, brutal, vacant face, the sudden look of a saint or Madonna? And if so, did you not feel that, for the first time, you had seen the face in its reality, and caught a glimpse of the making of purity—not the purity of the snow, that falls on the earth and is spoiled, but the living purity of the flower, that makes the dark earth nourish it? A flower is a small brown seed, mud, and sunshine; and we must not forget the mud. Strange elements enter into the building of the house not made with hands—but they do not enter it unchanged; they are transformed by a thousand deaths.

That is why, perhaps, some of us hardly want such a house for the soul. To be honest, we fear that it would be less suitable for time than for eternity; and we want a jerry-built house, that we can furnish on the hire system. And the city of God is very well; but we prefer a city that we can survey and measure, whose streets—not being of pure gold—we can dig up and put down again.

So we bring purely material estimates to bear on spiritual things, in all the greater haste because we shrink, with positive terror, from the prospect of one day having to estimate material things spiritually. It is a terror of the flaming sword that guards the way of the Tree of Life—the only way worth treading, the way that only those may tread in whom love casts out fear.

We flinch, and we should always flinch, but for the Divine desire that will not let us rest—the unswerving purpose that moves through all our human purposes, but whose goal is still beyond. We may notice, in our own lives or in the lives of others, a process of spiritual elimination, by which the false, or insufficient ideals towards which the soul strives, are tried, one by one, and found wanting. It is a method that involves much pain; it is laborious and long, and it is satisfactory. We do not adequately realise that God is behind it, forcing us, step by step, to relinquish the halting solutions in which we seemed to find the very secret of life, leading us towards some solution that holds good eternally.

That is the hope, the faith that can confront failure and pain and death—the faith that though the fulfilment of God's purpose in us often means our frustration in time, our ultimate frustration is impossible, since it would mean the frustration of God. Christ's purposes were thwarted, and His heart was broken. He was rejected, betrayed. But what overthrew His glad human dreams of the speedy coming of the Kingdom was something more than the world's hatred. It was the hope of God, that triumphed over His hope, only to fulfil it the more utterly.

We know how the old leaf-bearing impulse is thwarted, or transcended, if you choose, by the impulse to bear fruit, how fruit and flowers alike demand its sacrifice. We often see men and women leading forlorn hopes quietly, people who deserve success, and whom it would have left unspoiled, who would have found a purer joy in it than the ambitious or selfish can ever find. Yet they go on grey day after grey day, with so little obvious sunshine that we are inclined to quarrel with the universe on their behalf, if not on our own. For it is not in human nature actually to prefer the forlorn hope. We should all like to wave our banner over some conquered citadel. Why cannot a triumphal entry be granted to such as these, with flags flying and beat of drum?

Simply because God's conception of human victory is so much greater than ours that it cannot always adapt itself to our small triumphal processions. Yet His most glorious hope lies hidden in the hope we call forlorn, like the jewel in a matrix of clay; and it will prevail at last.

Those who hold this faith do not lose it in the face of what we call death. For they believe that their treasures of experience, their love, that is so slowly learning complete self-forgetfulness, their wisdom, bought with many blunders and much pain, their reverence and gratitude for stronger and better souls, are not only their own priceless possessions, but part of the wealth of God, that they belong to His essential being, and mean more, not less, to Him than to them.

Travel and Adventure.

THE GIANTS OF THE SUDAN.—II.

BY SIR ALFRED PEASE.

The Nuer is very lanky. What the stork is among birds, or perhaps the flamingo, the Nuer is among men. Being amphibious, the Nuers are endowed by nature, like herons and other waders, with the most extraordinary long legs (femur and tibiae); when at rest or on the look-out, in the marches or on ant hills, they stand motionless on one leg; when moving in the swamps, they take the same leisurely strides over the rushes as a stork does. Like water birds, they have long thin necks, and small narrow heads; their features are often good, but I remarked no uniformity amongst them in this respect. As far as their physiognomy is concerned, it in some degree resembled that of the Kaffirs of South Africa. Later, I shall give some of the reasons which make me suspect a common origin of these Nilotic negroes with the Bantus. Their language is a most peculiar one; it is, I think, the most inarticulate I have heard, and more difficult, I should say, to acquire than even the click languages of the Bushmen and Hottentots of South Africa. A preliminary process before attempting to learn it would be to break out your front teeth. It is full of deep hollow noises, sometimes slowly, sometimes quickly ejaculated; how much of these sounds represent words, or are merely expressive or artistic flourishes, it would be difficult to decide.

To return to my first acquaintances; I signed to them to follow me, and pointed to the tracks of game. They understood my meaning at once. We soon found three or four oribi feeding on an open flat, and I proceeded to stalk them, crawling through the grass. They played the game to perfection. When I had got about 160 yards from the herd I raised myself to shoot. The Nuers raised their long necks just sufficiently to see what was going to happen. Their astonishment at the performance was enormous. On recovering from their first fright at the double crack of my rifle, they rushed up to the two dead bucks. Then came an examination of the wounds, a diagnosis performed with a great deal of noise and pantomime, especially on discovering that the bullets had gone right through both bucks. When I presented one to each, they were more than ever delighted, and in a very few minutes had the skins off, the carcasses cut up, using, like most natives, their spears as knives, and were off to their village, laden with meat. Whilst all this was going on, my companions, Mr. Edward N. Buxton, and Miss Buxton, his daughter, had, with greater enterprise, discovered the village from whence these men came, and had been followed by quite a crowd of the villagers of both sexes, young and old, to our boat. The same afternoon, at their desire, we transported some forty of them across the Zeraf, and we parted from our friends, after giving each a present of beads, and their chief a scarlet kammerbund, which he wore with evident pride.

As we sailed up the Ghazal, we saw many Nuers; the whereabouts of their villages was betrayed by the palls of smoke at sundown, the mosquito curtains of the natives. By day you might climb to the mast-head and see nothing but one vast ocean of swamp and reeds. On all these waters where we sailed, the difficulty was to find a "meshara," i.e., a landing-place. A meshara on the Ghazal is not exactly what would be called a landing-stage here. It was something like this: you let your boat drive before the wind, to carry you as far through the dense margin of reeds as it could penetrate, and then you floundered on foot through the great strong river grass, called "oom soof," i.e., "the mother of wool" (vossia procera), a most disagreeable plant, covered with hairy leaf sheaths. To grasp it is to have your hand full of its needles, and wherever you touch it the irritating stuff penetrates. No herbage is more preferred by cattle and sheep, which no doubt accounts for the pasturing of the cattle in these swamps. Having got through the oom soof, you find a track in the marsh, among high reeds, growing far above your head; this is the high road to the village, perhaps one or two miles distant; remember this is the dry season, yet along the highway you have to wade often for a quarter of a mile at a time, up to your waist, and sometimes up to your neck in warm muddy water; you may have two or more khors to cross, yet however deep the water, the dense mass of floating and sunken reeds allows you to get over them without much risk of going through, and seldom allowing you to sink in above the knees. But at best it is a laborious way of getting across country.

We arrived at a Nuer village in the early morning, hot, wet, and muddy, and I will try and describe what we found. On a strip of dry, baked, marsh clay land, about a quarter of a mile in width, and as far as you can tell, several miles in length, are sprinkled clumps of thorn scrub, and groves of acacia trees, intercepted by open stretches of black burnt plain, or of coarse yellow grass; dotted over the ground are ant hills; in the foreground, only a few yards from the reeds and mud out of which you have emerged, is the village. The huts are arranged round an open space, and among them are tall trees. There is no outer fence, or zariba. The central space, till the sun is well up, is full of cattle, sheep, and goats. As the fires die down, and the night shroud of smoke melts into the sky, the Nuers (all innocent of any clothing whatever) emerge from their huts, and stand about with arms folded across their chests, waiting for the sun to roast them into activity. The naked giants catch sight of you, and, spear in hand, come out to meet you. The bashful giantesses keep in the background, and peep round the sides of the huts; the children mount ant hills, and view the proceedings from a safe distance. When the interview is over, the natives go to their milking, and take their cattle out to pasture. Beyond the village, you find what may be a lagoon, a lake, or river; half a mile of open water lies before you, bordered on the further side with high trees and jungle; the surface of the water is dotted with the dark heads of hippo. If you do as we did—carry your boat with you, and cross over the water—you may perhaps go a mile or more through forest or over grass before you come to another marsh, khor, or lagoon. You will find the great spoor of elephants in all directions, and probably see water-buck (Cobus Defassa) and white-eared cob (Cobus leucotis) in quantities, and sometimes giraffe.

Our time among the Nuers was not sufficiently long to do more than get a slight idea of their habits and customs. They appeared to me not low down in the scale of human races. They build neat huts, make fine spears out of the iron which they obtain from the Abyssinians in exchange for their cattle. They told me that for one cow they got enough iron to make 100 spears. I doubt my interpreter here, I think he only used "100" to indicate a great many. As among the finest races in Equatorial Africa, such as Somalis, certain Gallas, and others, their usual diet is entirely animal, and principally confined to milk. One tribe of Gallas I once came across lived altogether on hippo flesh, so they declared. The Nuer has two meals a day—one about 10 a.m. and the other in the evening. The women shave their heads, wear beads as do the men, and as many as eight or ten brass rings inserted down the outside edges of their ears; a hideous projecting brass pin is inserted in their upper lip; both men and women are tattooed on the face, arms, and bodies with branded marks.

I cannot conceive a more ugly or uncomfortable ornament than this thing the women wear in their lips; its utility, as has been suggested, may be to serve the same purpose that a ring in a bull's nose does, namely, to render the ladies more manageable.

The household utensils of the Nuers are sometimes made of wood, but generally are calabashes (gourds) or crude black, brittle earthenware vessels of the type usually found among primitive people in Africa, or dug up in Europe; such as I have found in the valleys of the Sahara and in the mountains of the Swaziland Drakensberg. The furniture of a Nuer hut is very simple, and consists of as many heaps of wood ash as there are occupants of the hut—these are the beds, mattresses, and bedclothes of the family.

I found a very well-defined religion among these people; all natives I have met with have some kind of religion. Even among the Gallas, who are generally credited as being without any trace of one, I found a very distinct belief in a creative intelligence or Spirit they called "Wak"—all beyond their own intelligence was ascribed to Wak. They believed also in other spirits, which required propitiating or avoiding. My experience is that a native is shy of talking of these things, and also finds great difficulty in conveying his ideas on such subjects, but from a Nuer you will succeed in getting at least as much information as you could squeeze out of an average English schoolboy asked to expound the Athanasian Creed.

The result of my investigations, filtered through a Nuer who spoke Dervish Arabic to a Cairene who translated into murdered English, was as follows: A belief in a Creator, and in a great prophet of their race called Loungdian; that they occasionally sacrificed at a place called Louack, up the Zeraf River, to the God of the Dinkas, Denkie, who I made out to be a sort of anthropomorphisation of the Creator, though they called the supreme Creator Quott; there is a temple (mosque) at Louack up in a forest, built of timber, with a high tower. They do not pray like Muslims; they have Mullahs, and at times appeal to, and ask forgiveness of Quott, and beat a big drum. They believe in rewards and punishments, in angels, a big devil that carries away the spirits of dead men, and in other devils; in Paradise and hell. They like to be buried at Louack, but generally are interred in a sitting posture outside their huts. They are polygamous, but there is no divorce; the price of a wife is ten cattle; they appear to worship their ancestors. I put these last three things together, as they are singularly identical with certain practices of the Bantus, or Kaffirs, of South Africa, and, to my mind, suggest a common origin. Schweinfurth, in his journals, notices some Dinka characteristics and customs, which are probably common to the Nuers, and are identical with those of Kaffirs. I noticed that their shields were similar in form, and their clubs are exactly of the round, nail-headed knobkerry pattern of South Africa. The Nuers use the bow; their boats are the roughest kind of dug-out canoes, or rafts made of Ambatch stems tied in bundles. They are diligent fishermen, and usually catch fish by spearing them in reeds along the margins of the rivers.

At births, weddings, and occasions of rejoicing, they kill male cattle and eat meat; they make beer out of durah when they have it, and, like Kaffir beer, it is made by sprouting the grain, rolling it with stones, and leaving it to ferment for two days. The men receive their names from their cattle. Each man gets his name from the bull slaughtered on the day of his birth. Here are some of the names of bulls, and therefore of men: Weyell (crawling), Lief (one at the head of a united company), Bei (the river), Fuang (the rock), Gang (the peacemaker), Banggong (the dis-obliging), Worr (runs well), Touté (the bull destined to be killed on the natal day). The women's names all seem to begin with a sound akin to N—e.g., Nashuad (the spotted beast), Niob (a hard job), Nowish (the name of a village).

Altogether the Nuers and their black neighbours are worth studying, and this sketch is written in the hope of raising sufficient interest in the "Giants of the Soudan" to create a demand for more accurate and better information. For Mr. Edward North Buxton and I did not visit the swamps of the Sudan to study the Nuer or his language, but to obtain specimens of Mrs. Gray's Waterbuck (Cobus Maria Gray), and having succeeded in our quest are not likely to revisit our long-legged friends.

Poetry.

THE THREE WOMEN OF ENDELL STREET.

AFTER the days of the northern rain,
The sun stepped yellow and merry again
Between Endell Street and Drury Lane.

His feet were warm on the pavement there,
He drew bright hands through the children's hair,
And the windows gleamed like gossamer.

He lit on Queen Charlotte's Hospital,
And the children's eyrie behind its wall:
There Endell Street ends, but that is not all.

Hard by are two churches; a workhouse then;
Some baths not intended for gentlemen;
And public houses—some nine or ten.

From one of the houses—I change the name
And call it the "Lion"—three women came;
And I laughed aloud as I looked at them.

With untold graces, they sidled and smiled;
One arm, bacchantic, the air beguiled;
On the other, black-shawled, each bore a child.

At first I laughed, and then changed blood;
For there are three graces that men hold good,
But the fourth and the fairest is motherhood.

With eyes ensanguined, with feet of lead,
And a song from which the heavens had fled,
They danced the dance of the Quick-in-the-Dead.

They becked to each other, and bowed like mimes;
And joined their voices—three tunes, three times,
With terrible gestures and horrible rhymes.

They reeled till I thought the babes would drop,
Whose mammet faces looked drearily up,
Accusing High Heaven above the town-top.

* * *

What things are they that a babe should see?—
Green grass, I think, and a growing tree,
And the sea-sand washed continually.

And a bright-eyed mother, so wondrous kind,
She would win the air and woo the wind,
To bring her babe one joy to its mind.

But these—oh, mournful mother of men!
What joy had their eyes of the dancers who then Within the dread doorways went dancing again?

The three women went;—their three babes stay;
They rise up like ghosts on the sunlit day,
And the sun on the windows is clouded away.

Oh, Trojan women of our new Troy,
That build its walls for glory and joy,—
What doom for the cities that babes destroy?

Make now a song of a broken charm,
To keep the soul of the babe from harm,
That hangs, unloved, on its mother's arm.

ERNEST RHYS.

Letters from Abroad.

THE PROSPECT IN PORTUGAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Last Sunday, the organ of the Prime Minister who now assists the King to rule Portugal in defiance of its Constitution intimated that normal Parliamentary conditions might be restored at an early date. The situation, it stated, was manifestly improving, and if the improvement continued, a General Election might be held in March. No doubt the expected outbreak has been delayed so long as to seem increasingly improbable; and Senhor Franco, moreover, has always represented himself as a sort of Dictator in the original sense, or rather as an Aesymnete. His prototype, on his own showing, is to be found among those reformers of ancient Hellas who were called in at great crises to remove existing abuses, and give the State a fresh start under revised administration and new laws—though they worked with, and not against, the popular will. Again, Senhor Franco's procedure is only an intensification of practices carried on by each party in turn during the last twenty years in Portugal—even for such utterly illegitimate ends as that of making an Opposition defeat doubly sure at a General Election; and he claims to be dealing with a number of conspicuous and grotesque abuses in the administration which the regular politicians are not likely to clear away. He professes to have seceded from the Regenerador Party because he despaired of its efficiency, to have vainly attempted to enlist the Parliamentary Opposition. It may, therefore, be desirable in his present position only because the King will not let him go. He says that the efforts to raise the country have failed, after six months' agitation, that it is not likely to rise now, and that, therefore, the time will soon come to test public opinion on his policy and work.

Still, the announcement may be susceptible of another interpretation. The King next May is going to visit Brazil. In his absence a regency must be instituted. Now the Crown Prince is only twenty, the Queen Mother is not popular, and Senhor Franco is not in favour with her, inasmuch as he has both reduced her allowance and revealed rather too fully the details of the notorious financial embarrassments of the Royal House. Regencies, moreover, have proved critical periods in the past, notably in 1902, though the King was no further off than London, when disturbances were set up by the alleged inadequacy of the proposals for the reduction of debt, and Senhor Franco was leader of the Parliamentary Opposition. It may, therefore, be desirable to regularise his rule before the departure of the Crown, to leave to the Regent, whoever may hold that office, as little opportunity as possible for getting rid of him, and to give the Cortes, or at least the minority in it, a chance to blow off its steam.

For it can hardly be supposed that an election conducted by the Dictator and his Ministers is likely to let in the Opposition. Portugal has a very wide suffrage—potentially; but it is limited not only by a trifling tax qualification, but to those adult males who can read and write; and, though for fifty years education has been legally compulsory, about three-fourths of the population is illiterate. True, the strength of an extra-Parliamentary regime ought to be in the illiterates, and therefore an election might be supposed to be dangerous to the Dictator. But no Portuguese Ministry is ever defeated at the polls. Ordinarily the Minister of the Interior "conducts the elections"; sometimes special means are resorted to. Senhor Franco himself explained to the correspondent of the "Temps" about a fortnight ago that the present system of large electoral districts was substituted for single-member constituencies by decree in 1901, expressly to dish an Opposition at that time led by himself, whose members in the Chamber were consequently reduced to one. It is quite incredible that a Minister who has recently been telling his adherents that he means to govern without a Parliament for a couple of years or thereabouts should go to the country after only ten months, unless he is quite sure of a favourable verdict—or unless he knows that the game is up.

But is it up? The spectacle presented by the two Parliamentary parties at their meetings on Sunday was not altogether encouraging to their foreign sympathisers. These parties have been a long time making up their minds; they have now passed resolutions embodying dignified protests against the unconstitutional decrees which have been substituted for legislation, the grants to the King, and the dictatorial rule. The Progressists seem to have been more undecided than the Regeneradors, and a dissentient group, led by Senhor Alpoim, had seceded a few days earlier because the Parliamentary parties are not Radical enough. Their leader is an ex-Minister and a peer, but he has not yet, like some other peers, gone over to the Republicans, and their attitude remains obscure. These protests have been vigorously backed up by meetings in the two great towns, but we have no means of knowing if their influence goes much further, and, with the Press muzzled and the post and telegraph under stringent censorship, it is not easy to see how it can do so. Senhor Franco's aims may conceivably be right; his means and methods are wholly wrong; and in any other country a justifiable revolution would have already begun. But—though their leaders have declared that they would go all lengths in defence of freedom—it is not clear that the Parliamentary parties are yet ready for revolution.

Will any other section of the people rise? In 1901, when the King was supposed to be a Freemason, there were Ultramontane demonstrations and riots, set up by a rumour that a prominent citizen was preventing his daughter from taking the veil, and the Cortes all but repealed the sentence of banishment imposed by law against the Legitimist or Miguelite branch of the dynasty, imposed after Dom Miguel's expulsion for gross misrule in 1834. But there is no sign of a Catholic reaction now, though Dom Miguel has assumed that attitude of expectancy which has so often made the Duke of Orleans look foolish. In 1902, during the Regency, there were Republican demonstrations, in the following year there was a small Republican émeute in the army, and a weavers' strike, complicated with political elements, in Oporto; and nine years earlier, a Republic, which was not wholly extinguished for several hours, was actually proclaimed in Oporto by a few soldiers, financed by Portuguese from Brazil. But, though it is rumoured that rifles are going in, it is hard to see who is to use them, or who is to pay for a rising. The Brazilian Portuguese appear to have rallied to the Crown; the large landlords and manufacturers are not Republicans yet; the Republicans have the best intellect in the country, and their leader claims that they are getting at the illiterate rural labourers; but they cannot have much money, and there is no evidence that they mean to rise. The King and the Dictator have secured the army—a conscript army, be it remembered, inasmuch as substitutes can be bought, and therefore no more democratic than that of France under the Second Empire. The cost of the Monarchy is excessive; the King habitually oversteps the limits set to the action of a constitutional monarch; the debt, which increased by leaps and bounds from 1852 to 1892, was nearly as much per head, till it was written down, as the burden left by the war of 1871 on France; even now the proportion is not far short of our own, and the national resources are immeasurably less. Senhor Franco has struck at minor abuses, but increased a civil list already out of proportion to the national wealth; his rule is maintained by force, aided by the apathy of the masses and the weakness of the political public. But his fall seems more likely to be hastened from above than from below. Should a rising come, one can only hope that no power—not even Spain—will prevent the people of Portugal from working out their own salvation.—Yours, &c.,

OBSERVER.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

It will be interesting to the many admirers of Professor Harnack to be informed that a new book may shortly be expected from his pen on the Acts of the Apostles. It will be a critical investigation into the origin, structure, and literary characteristics of the Acts on much the same lines as his recent work, "Luke the Physician."

* * *

ANOTHER German writer whose name is becoming well-known to English readers, Professor Bousset, has also a new book in the press on the difficult subject of Gnosticism. It is called the "Hauptprobleme der Gnosis," and will be ready shortly. Professor Bousset's striking inquiries into the Religion of Judaism in early Christian times eminently fit him for the task of dealing with the Oriental origins of Gnosticism, and the book will no doubt be a serious contribution to the rise of Christian ideas and institutions.

* * *

INSTEAD of writing new books, Mr. George Moore has of late given most of his time to the revision of his previous novels. He has practically re-written the whole of "Evelyn Innes," for an edition which Mr. Fisher Unwin will publish early in the spring. Mr. Moore says that the desire to re-write "Evelyn Innes" has haunted him for the last nine years, ever since the publication of the book. He describes the soul of Evelyn Innes as luring him on like a phantom, but always disappearing like a nymph in the mist, whenever he attempted to seize it. However, Evelyn Innes seems to have grown tired of the pursuit, and Mr. Moore tells us that on his return to Dublin last year, she had become as docile as a studio model, arriving at half past ten every morning to be written about. Mr. Moore claims that all the ancient masters revised their books again and again, gaining substance and beauty in every revision. Following their example, his next work will be the revision of "Sister Teresa."

* * *

A NEW monthly magazine, called "The Readers' Review," published by the British Library Association, in conjunction with the National Home Reading Union, is to appear next January. "The Readers' Review" is intended to serve as a monthly guide to books and reading, and each number will include short articles on noteworthy works, together with longer articles of literary and general interest, accompanied by short selected bibliographies. Among the contents of the opening number will be articles on "The Literature of the Sea," by Mr. Frank T. Bullen; "Whittier as Poet and Reformer," by Mr. W. E. A. Axon; "Books About Australia"—intended as the first of a series of articles dealing with books about our colonies—by Sir John Cockburn; and notes on "Books and Bookmen," by Mr. Thomas Seccombe. The journal is also intended to serve as an official organ for local public libraries, and with this object a special supplement will be printed for each district, containing recent additions to the local library and notes upon library work in the district. The work done in this way should prove most useful, and we are glad to learn that it is being widely supported.

* * *

THERE is something ironical in the award of the Nobel prize for "the most remarkable literary work of an idealist tendency" to Mr. Rudyard Kipling. Even Mr. Kipling's most indiscriminating eulogists would hardly hold that his works are remarkable for their idealist tendency. There is hardly any English writer more closely identified with the gospel of force or a firmer believer that the Deity is to be found on the side of the big battalions. The award also raises another question. This is the first time that the prize has been given to an Englishman, and it would seem therefore that the Nobel Committee regards Mr. Kipling as the greatest of contemporary English writers. When one calls to mind the names of Mr. Meredith, Mr. Swinburne, and Mr. Hardy, one feels that the untranslatable French word, saugrenu, applied by Matthew Arnold to similar judgments, is the only epithet that describes the verdict of the Committee.

MR. F. A. MACKENZIE, who has recently returned from Korea, is at work upon a volume dealing with the present situation in that country, which will be published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton very shortly under the title "The Tragedy of Korea." The work is likely to damage the reputation of the Japanese for humanity. The charge against Japan is that towns and villages are being razed to the ground with a thoroughness and heartlessness worthy of the Turks. The Japanese, however, are extremely sensitive to European opinion, and Mr. MacKenzie hopes that his book may so stimulate public criticism that Japan will be persuaded to carry out her guarantees with reference to life and property in Korea.

* * *

NEXT week sees two interesting literary anniversaries. The centenary of the birth of John Greenleaf Whittier falls on Tuesday, December 17th. Whittier's simple and beautiful character is rightly held in high regard in America. Springing from a stock of sturdy, strong-minded, New England farmers and Quakers, he is typical of all that was best in the New England life of the last century. Though not a great poet, he was a skilful artist in verse, and he employed his pen on the most stirring of themes—indignation against wrong, belief in truth and justice, deep-rooted love of his native soil, compassion for the lot of the workers.

* * *

WEDNESDAY, December the 18th, is the anniversary of the bi-centenary of the birth of Charles Wesley, the author of very many of the finest hymns in the language. "Hark, the herald angels sing" is the best known, but others, such as "Love divine, all love excelling," "Gentle Jesus, meek and mild," and "Jesu, lover of my soul," are examples of religious poetry at its best. Watts described "Come, O thou traveller unknown," as worth all the hymns he himself had ever written. It might also be described as one of the finest imaginative poems in the English language.

* * *

THE best life of Fielding is the volume by Mr. Austin Dobson in the "English Men of Letters" series; indeed, it is so excellent that it is very unlikely to be superseded for a long time to come. Mr. G. M. Godden's "Henry Fielding," to be published early next month by Messrs. Sampson Low, has, however, the advantage of containing some of Fielding's letters which have never before been published, so that it will have a special interest as an account of Fielding's very picturesque life. Fielding has attracted fewer biographers than any writer of equal eminence, perhaps because Mr. Dobson has left so little for others to glean.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The History of Freedom, and other Essays." By Lord Acton. Edited with an Introduction by J. N. Figgis and R. V. Laurence. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"Historical Essays and Studies." By Lord Acton. Edited with an Introduction by J. N. Figgis and R. V. Laurence. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester: A Biography." By Kenneth Vickers. (Constable. 15s. net.)

"A History of the People of the Netherlands." By Petrus J. Blok. Vol. IV. (Putnam. 12s. 6d. net.)

"Aphorisms and Reflections from the Works of T. H. Huxley." Selected by Henrietta A. Huxley. Golden Treasury Series. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)

"Ignaz Jan Paderewski." By E. A. Baughan. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)

"Memoirs of the late Dr. Barnardo." By Mrs. Barnardo and James Marchant. With an Introduction by Dr. W. Robertson Nicoll. (Hodder & Stoughton. 12s. net.)

"Pekin to Paris in a Motor Car." By Luigi Barzini. (Grant Richards. 16s.)

"Venetian Life." By W. Dean Howells. Revised and enlarged edition. (Constable. 16s. net.)

"Studies in the Parables." By Professor Laidlaw. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s. net.)

"Children's Children." By Mrs. Muirhead Bone. (Duckworth. 6s. net.)

"Promenades en Savoie." Par Henry Bordeaux. (Paris: Nouvelle Librairie Nationale. 2 fr.)

"Poèmes." Par Ernest Dupuy. (Paris: Société Française d'Imprimerie. 3 fr. 50.)

Letters to the Editor.

WHAT IS THE CHURCH, AND WHO ARE ITS MEMBERS?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Bardsley and those who think with him seem to make quite light of the tendency to convert the Church of England into a sect. I have no means of studying the cases which he quotes as giving it that character, and I think he would be doing a useful work if he would collect and explain them. The case he specially relies on seems to be one of a Nonconformist claiming an office established under a special deed, which said that the person elected must be "a member of the Church of England." Of course, in this and similar cases the judge must look to the intentions of the testator or the framer of the ruling document; and if it is clear that its intention is to indicate by the words "member of the Church of England" one who attends our services and practises the rules of the Prayer Book, he must decide that one who dissents from these is not a member of the Church in the sense thus put upon the words. But that appears to me to be quite an arbitrary definition of the Church.

The formularies of the Church of England define the Church as "the blessed company of all faithful people," or "all who profess and call themselves Christians"; or "the whole company of Christian people dispersed throughout the whole world." How can we dare to narrow it down as is now proposed? The "Church Reform Society," which Mr. Bardsley commends to us, has had its first result in the formation of the "Representative Church Council," the first act of which has been to limit the Church to those who have been confirmed, thus cutting off at once a good half of the Christian people of England from all share in the Church of England. The laity, Mr. Bardsley says, are to have power. But the laity admitted are only those agreeable to the clergy, sieved out by an ordinance in which the clergy have complete control (sometimes so exercised that the Confession is made its condition), and elected—who knows how? This is to be in future "the Church of England"—a sect conditioned by particular ordinances, not by faith or character. I cannot believe that this is what was meant by the Toleration Act, which simply gave permission to societies of Christians within the great circle of the Christian nation to worship God freely according to their consciences.

But, putting aside technicalities, I would ask, "What do we mean by the Church as contrasted with a sect?" A sect is a body of persons marked off by their adherence to a particular mode of public worship and teaching. A Church is a body embracing the whole life and endeavouring to live out Christian righteousness in all its fullness. This, a sect such as Mr. Bardsley would reduce us to, can never do. The nation alone can do it. Our Lord never said a word to enforce "church-going," and all that constitutes a sect, but bent all the stress of his teaching towards righteousness, individual and social. No doubt the "Church Reformers" will say that they aim at social good. I honour them for it; but they are only preparing an exhibition of their own incompetence. None of the social reforms which Christians of all kinds are feeling more and more to be a part of religion can be fully effected apart from the national powers; and the national powers claim the sanction of Christianity in law-making, in the administration of justice (which according to the Bible is a divine function), and in the working for the good of all classes under a Sovereign who is crowned with episcopal attributes to be the Christian head of a Christian people. If Mr. Bardsley and his "Church Reform Society" succeed, the result will be that the nation will be the true Church of Christ, and the organisation which these gentlemen wish to erect will be a narrow sect distinguished from other sects mainly by its clericalism.—Yours, &c.,

The Deanery, Ripon.

W. H. FREMANTLE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Bardsley's contention that Nonconformists have had no "moral right to intervene in the affairs of the Church of England" since the passage of the Toleration Act, is to me an amazing one. Until the year 1867 Nonconformists were compelled to pay Church rates, and surely were entitled to a voice in the expenditure of the money. I think there are some places where "dominicals" are still paid, and I know that all over the land tithe is still rented by law. Apparently Mr. Bardsley is prepared to maintain that, in the case of the tithe-payer, "taxation without representation is no tyranny."—Yours, &c.,

C. J. BACK.

Claremont, Connaught Road,
Wolverhampton.

December 10th, 1907.

[This correspondence must now close.—ED., THE NATION.]

THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I shall be enraptured to answer any of your questions, if that will in any way encourage you to answer mine. It is a good exercise in honesty to answer questions (as in a Law Court), even when one cannot see any particular sense in them. You ask me whether I am a member of the Roman Catholic Church. I am not. I shall not be until you have convinced me that the Church of England is really the muddle-headed provincial heresy that you make it out. But really now, between friends, what can that question mean? The Oxford Movement may or may not have declined; but there was an Oxford Movement. And the whole point of that Movement was to maintain that a man in the Church of England was not a man "deprived of the right of appeal" to the authority that can alone maintain dogma. A man who asks me, when I say I believe in Catholic dogma, "Are you a Roman Catholic?" is not a man who notices the decline of the Oxford Movement. He is a man who has never realised its rise.

You also ask me whether I have ever "heard of Newman." I seem to know the name. In fact, I have an impression (erroneous no doubt) that I have read most of his books. And I can only say that if you think that Newman agreed with you in this matter; if you suppose that Newman thought the Catholic Creed could change its meaning or that devotion to a person was adequate (in the absence of the cosmic philosophy of the Christian), I can only say, with respect as well as regret, that I am afraid you have "heard of Newman"—and that is all.

And now, when I have answered your two questions, will you humour me by answering mine, which I will repeat for the purpose. First, is your free Christian, devoted to the person of Christ, free to doubt His historical existence? Second, is he free to doubt His presence in the universe now, as a person to receive the devotion? Third, is not the affirmation of these two things a Creed, and (if the devotion is to continue) an unchangeable creed?—Yours, &c.,

G. K. CHESTERTON.

[Rome we know, and Canterbury we think we know; but what is Mr. Chesterton and to what does he "appeal"? The gist of modern Roman theology, as initiated by Newman, lies in the word "development"; even Anglicanism as interpreted by Dr. Creighton is declared to be based on "reason and sound learning." Both positions reject the notion of a cast-iron creed which Mr. Chesterton thinks he holds. As for his questions, the answer to all three of them is obviously "No."—ED., THE NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If it were possible to fix on Mr. Chesterton any label that the flow of ink into his next letter would not wash off, I should say that his astounding assertion about the Christian creeds stamps him as an "intellectualist." He says that "they were set down in black and white simply in order to clear the human intellect." And here he places himself in opposition to the men of the new movement, for whom intellectualism is the enemy, and the creeds guard inward and spiritual truths of faith and morals, truths of the living activity of man in his relation with God and his fellows. No wonder it is necessary to ask him whether he has heard of Newman.

In the "Essay on Development" and the "Grammar of Assent" there are seed ideas which are now growing rapidly and are thrusting aside intellectualism. Newman was of the race of the prophets. The soil was not ready in his time, and his germ-ideas could not develop until it was prepared by the work of Biblical criticism and research into Christian origins and history. Now it is bearing fruit, and the value of that fruit is in no way lessened by the fact that Newman did not foresee what it would be, and that his own attitude towards ecclesiastical and dogmatic authority was not the same as that of his Modernist sons. They are true children of the prophet, because they have learnt the lesson of his message, and are of his own spirit. To say that the letter of his life was not the same as theirs is only to say that he was a true prophet, because he anticipated in idea and in spirit the course of things that were to come. Criticism and research, unknown to Newman, have made possible the development of his prophetic doctrine—criticism and research aided and reinforced by a great and significant increase in our knowledge of psychology. And because the men of the Oxford Movement do not reckon to the full with criticism and research and psychology we are entitled to speak of its decline.

A Christian movement that is to be effective now must make courageous and ungrudging use of the results of criticism, because men are everywhere accepting these results. It must be in some measure pragmatic (not with Professor James's pragmatism, but with that kind which befits a Catholic thinker), because men are everywhere discovering that religion is primarily an affair of action and the whole man. It must emphasise the mysterious and mystical character of human life, because in the highways and in the byways of psychology men are discovering their own secrets. It must reckon with our all-pervading intellectual symbolism. It must help us to see that it is not possible, either in the creeds or in everyday life, to escape from symbolism and its varying inadequacy; and that if the symbolism of one age seems to "clear the human intellect," as Mr. Chesterton says, it may easily befog the human intellect in another age, simply because the intellectual presuppositions of one age, which are the stuff out of which its verbal symbols are made, are not identical with the intellectual presuppositions of another.

I ask Mr. Chesterton to consider what mutual concessions he and a Nicean bishop would have to make if they met to discuss their common belief in the Ascension, the Descent into Hell, and the resurrection of their own respective bodies. If he sees a principle emerging from this discussion he may possibly see that its extended application demands something that the men of the Oxford Movement are not prepared to give. For this reason, as well as for many others, they must give place to a movement better fitted to meet demands that are every day growing in strength and volume. And I hope Mr. Chesterton will find time to read "Il Programma dei Modernisti," in order that he may see what that movement is.—Yours, &c.,

WM. SCOTT PALMER.

December 7th, 1907.

ARNOLD v. BORROW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Some readers and lovers of Mr. Matthew Arnold's "Forsaken Merman" may not be aware that that most satisfying lyric has a foreign derivation and an English forerunner. A narrative as like it as a pea-blossom is to a butterfly may be found on pp. 120-123 of the out-of-print book entitled "Romantic Ballads Translated from the Danish," by—whom but George Borrow! and published in London in 1826. One gathers from a not too specific preface that the poem in question is taken from the ancient and famous Danish collection, the "Kiaempeviser." Here it is:—

THE DECEIVED MERMAN.

"Fair Agnes alone on the seashore stood:
Then rose a Merman out of the flood.
'Now, Agnes, hear what I say to thee:
Wilt thou my leman consent to be?'
'Oh, freely that will I become!
If thou but take me beneath the foam.'
He stopped her ears and he stopped her eyes,
And into the ocean he took his prize.

The Merman's leman was Agnes there:
She bore him sons and daughters fair.
One day by the cradle she sat and sang,
When heard she above how the Church bells rang.
She went to the Merman and kissed his brow:
'Once more to Church I would gladly go.'
'And thou to Church once more shalt go!
But come to thy babes back here below.'
He flung his arm her body round,
And he lifted her up into England's ground.
Fair Agnes in at the Church door stepped,
Behind her mother, who sorely wept.
'O Agnes, Agnes! daughter dear!
Where hast thou been this many a year?'
'Oh, I have been deep, deep under the sea,
And lived with the Merman in love and glee.'
'And what for thy honour did he give thee,
When he made thee his leman beneath the sea?'
'He gave me silver, he gave me gold,
And sprigs of coral my hair to hold.'
The Merman up to the Church door came.
His eyes they shone like a yellow flame;
His face was white, and his beard was green;
A fairer demon was never seen.
'Now, Agnes, Agnes! listen to me:
Thy babes are longing so after thee.'
'I cannot come yet: here must I stay
Until the priest shall have had his say.'
And when the priest had had his say,
She thought with her mother at home to stay.
'Oh, Agnes, Agnes! listen to me:
Thy babes are sorrowing after thee.'
'Let them sorrow, and sorrow their fill;
But back to them never return I will.'
'Think on them, Agnes, think on them all:
Think on the great one, think on the small!'
'Little, Oh, little care I for them all:
Or for the great one, or for the small!'
Oh, bitterly then did the Merman weep!
He hid him back to the foamy deep.
But often his shrieks and mournful cries
At midnight's hour from thence arise."

A comparison of the two versions, at any point from the adjective in the title down to the final line, is too elementary to be very instructive: for the distance between

"'And thou to Church once more shalt go;
But come to thy babes back here below!'
He flung his arm her body round,
And he lifted her up into England's ground,"

and

"'Go up, dear heart! thro' the waves:
Say thy prayer, and come back to the kind sea-caves.'
She smiled, she went up thro' the surf in the bay.
(Children, dear, was it yesterday?)" is simply the distance over the whole range of English letters, between lifeless prosiness and "immortal verse." Arnold's well-remembered fourth stanza about the "sand-strewn caverns," where the sea-snakes "dry their mail and bask in the brine," and past which the great whales "sail and sail with unshut eye," is a piece of his own highly imaginative embroidery; as is also the lovely and characteristic picture of his Margaret stealing to the window from the spinning-wheel, to "look at the sand, and over the sand to the sea" in a day-dreaming stare, with —"a heart sorrow-laden

A long, long sigh

For the cold strange eyes of a little mermaid
And the gleam of her golden hair."

In Borrow, and presumably in the original ballad, which I have not been able to find in the Bodleian, the young mother is unmotherly enough, both to the great (!) ones, and to the small.

Legends of this sort are common in the literature of the sea-loving Gael and Cymry: the mortal who marries a water-god, the neckan who is flouted by Christian children for having no soul, the sirens who bewitch the fishing-fleet, the merbaby who is washed ashore and buried among the graves of landmen—these poetical traditions haunt every seacoast of the north. Did Mr. Arnold think, as did the author of "Ionica," because certain things of beauty should be, though, alas, they are not, present to the memory of every educated man, that no label was needed upon translations from them? At any rate, it would be interesting to know whether he took this theme which none need hope to handle after him, from some fragment of oral or printed folk-song, from the "Kiaempeviser" itself, or from a glimpse of the baldest page in dear George Borrow? Where are the identical dry bones of the Merman with a domestic grievance, whose spirit it was given to Arnold to create?—Yours, &c.,

L. I. GUINEY.

THE DANGER OF PREMATURE BURIAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the very interesting article on "Winter Sleep" published in THE NATION of the 7th inst., reference is made to trance—one of those mysterious forms of suspended animation sometimes termed death-counterfeits, which so closely resemble death that not infrequently they have caused even experienced medical practitioners to blunder in their diagnosis and pronounce the living to be dead.

The late T. H. Huxley, the distinguished scientist, declared that "the indisputable signs of death were an extraordinarily difficult question"; yet in this country there is more often than not no medical inspection of the alleged dead, and certificates dooming them to the grave are signed on mere hearsay and unscientific evidence of decease. Whilst such extraordinary customs for a civilised country prevail, it is not surprising that from time to time narrow escapes from premature interment occur, and some chance circumstance may reveal, on the eve of burial, the presence of life, or the unfortunate victim of mistaken, or no, medical diagnosis is buried alive. An active movement is now on foot to remedy this dangerous state of affairs, and to obtain from Parliament effective legislation against the possibility of such ghastly tragedies. If any of your readers desire to aid this humane and beneficent enterprise, the present writer would be happy to send them literature on the subject on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope.—Yours, &c.,

JAS. R. WILLIAMSON.

100, Chedington Road,
Upper Edmonton, London, N.
December 9th, 1907.

THE PASSING OF RUSSIAN AUTOCRACY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At fifteen minutes past twelve on the night of November 26th, the Russian autocracy came to an end, and Russia became a constitutional State. There can be no other issue from the refusal of the majority of the Duma to declare that the Tsar is an autocrat, especially when we remember that this Duma—elected as it is under a "jerrymandered" election law—is the most conservative Duma that Russia can ever expect to see, as the election law cannot possibly be tampered with again. This great refusal was made during the discussion on the Address to the Throne. A moderate and loyal address, thanking the Tsar for his gift of the right of national representation had been presented by the Centre Party (Octobrists), but it was attacked both by Right and Left. The Right said that it should especially declare that the Tsar is an autocrat, unlimited, irresponsible, and absolutely unfettered by Parliament. The Kadets on the Left said that the "Constitution" should be employed, but (as Plevako, the great Moscow lawyer, who delivered the best speech in the debate, pointed out to them) the Russian expressions used instead of the only half-naturalised word "Konstitutzia" meant exactly the same thing, and the Kadets had been themselves so sensible of the average Russian's unfamiliarity with that foreign word, that they had changed their own original name, Constitutional Democrats, to a simpler appellation in the vernacular. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Kadets soon withdrew their amendment to the Address, which was finally carried by the Left, the Centre, and even the Moderates on the Right. The Reactionaries, on the other hand, wanted the Address to contain a declaration that the Tsar was still an autocrat, and, as they made it very plain that they regarded it, as it stood, as a treacherous and disloyal attempt to curtail the power of the Emperor, the position was very delicate.

The snow was falling thickly outside, while this great discussion was going on, and owing to the days being short and dark, all the electric lights in the Taurus' Palace were burning. Mr. Gutchkoff, the leader of the Octobrists, opened the debate in a very tactful speech, wherein, while making it perfectly clear that in his opinion Russia is now a constitutional monarchy, and the Tsar a limited monarch, he sweetened this bitter pill (for it is notorious that the Tsar, urged on by his mother and his uncles, desires to take back the Constitution and regard himself as an absolute monarch), by saying that as, owing to human limitations, it is impossible for even the greatest sovereign personally to direct all the affairs of his empire, so the Tsar has had in the past to depend largely on the Camarilla (Court clique), or on the bureaucracy, and the only change that was introduced by the manifesto of October 30th, 1905, was a substitution for those powers of the people's representatives.

With a strong hand, Professor Milyonkov tore away this graceful fiction. He said that the question now before them was: "Has Russia got a Constitution or not?" and that it would be a crime to return a vague answer. The adversaries of constitutional government would take advantage of that vagueness. They had tried to explain away the manifesto of October 30th, which clearly granted the Russian people a Constitution. Everyone knew that when, the other day, a member of the Cabinet told a newspaper reporter that he served a constitutional monarch, the official "Information Bureau" came out next day with an explanation that the Minister in question did not express any opinion as to the form of government at present existing in Russia. The word "Constitution" would meet the case better than any vernacular paraphrase. They said it was a foreign word. So was the word emperor (uproar on the Right). So were the words Tsar, monarch, autocrat. When it was clearly understood that they had got a Constitution, there would not be, as at present, authorities who regarded themselves as above the law, and entitled to alter it whenever they liked.

Although they can compose speeches which read well in the newspapers next morning, Gutchkoff and Milyonkov are, neither of them, orators, the former because of his low and monotonous voice, the latter because of his dry delivery. But both the Left and the Centre showed yesterday that they possessed able, polished speakers, who would command respectful attention in the greatest legislative assemblies. Plevako, the Octobrist orator, whose favourite reading is St. John Chrysostom (in commemoration of whose death 1,500 years ago all the schools and colleges in Russia were closed yesterday) proved himself a worthy pupil of that golden-mouthed Greek, and Maklakoff, Kapustin, Kolyubakin, and Rodicheff followed him close.

On the Right, Purishkevitch and Count Bobrinsky sustained the reputation they had made in the last Duma as fluent and ready speakers, but they had a bad cause. Purishkevitch tried to prove that all the attempts that have hitherto been made to introduce parliamentary government into Russia have failed, and that, therefore, no new attempt should be made, especially as it would be an unfilial, impious, sacrilegious attempt to curtail the power of the anointed Tsar. He spoke as if he had been specially commissioned to plead the Emperor's cause; and it was with the gesture of a Pope excommunicating schismatics, that he told the Centre that if, on this occasion they voted with the Left, the Right would never, never again have part with them. Count Bobrinsky, who is too clever to sit on the Right, were it not for the fact that his enormous estates made him fear expropriation, got in a home thrust at the Octobrists by saying that if the Tsar were not absolute and above the law, he could not have changed the electoral system in July last, and thus enabled the Octobrists to get a majority in the present Duma.

The orators of the Right mostly consisted, however, of priests and peasants. The priests were men of enormous bulk, with long hair and beards, and they delivered their sermons (for they were nothing else) in a sing-song, nasal key, exactly as if they were singing psalms. One of them quoted in full the account in the New Testament of how Christ dealt with the Pharisees who asked Him if it were lawful to pay tribute to Caesar, and left his hearers to conclude that it was their duty as Christians to bow their neck in submission to the civil power which God had placed over them.

The peasants on the Right resembled outwardly the Radical peasants of the last two Dumas, but only outwardly, for they were, as a rule, spiritless. Some of them, on being forced into the tribune by Purishkevitch, remained tongue-tied until the impatience of the assembly sent them shambling back to their places, mumbling "autocrat . . . of all the Russias."

These are the people whom the last election law has enabled priests and landowners to select as representatives of the Russian peasantry. From the clerical and bureaucratic point of view, they are eminently "safe" men. They are "religious" (in the bureaucratic meaning of that word), they are sycophants of the local Pope, no doubt they act as sacristans, and carry the banner in Church processions. When Bishop Mitrofan lately formed a Duma Priests' Party, he ordered these peasants to join it also, as if they were connected with the Church in some menial capacity.

When a division was taken at midnight, the Duma presented a scene worthy of an historical occasion. Seeing themselves outnumbered, the Right left their places, as if they could no longer sit with rebels, and gathered in a crowd at the door. When the result of the division was announced, and it became known that the Tsar has lost for ever the proud and terrible title of autocrat (save when it is given him for courtesy's sake), a wave of enthusiasm swept over this hitherto sedate and self-controlled assembly of black-coated gentlemen, and a hearty cheer went up for the Tsar—not for the Tsar-autocrat. The amputated title was at once seized and waved aloft, however, amid wild cheers, by the reactionists at the door.

The Liberals cheered again for the Emperor, the Tsar. Then the Right played its last card. With a unanimity and a harmony suggestive of careful rehearsal, it broke into the beautiful strains of the National Anthem, one of the reactionary leaders beating time for them with the skill of a practised conductor. In the last two dumas, this manifestation would have maddened the majority. It would have been like an Orange band playing "We'll kick the Pope before us" in a Catholic Church in Belfast. But on the present occasion the Octobrists joined in the hymn with a volume of sound that soon drowned the voices of the reactionaries, and with an even greater appearance of loyalty and devotion. Instead of furiously wringing his bell, as M. Muromtseff or M. Golovin would have done (and would have been technically right in doing, for the Chamber of Deputies is not a music hall), M. Kholmakoff turned to the great portrait of the Tsar Nicholas II., which hangs above the Presidential chair, and bowed reverentially. Thus it was that autocracy passed away in Russia.—Yours, &c.,

AN EYE WITNESS.

St. Petersburg, November 30th, 1907.

"THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. C. R. Buxton, in his letter on the above melancholy subject, endeavours to defend the denunciation of Greek activity in Macedonia, mainly by the argument that the Bulgarian element in the population of that country vastly preponderates over the Greek. The writer would have been more convincing had he begun by defining what he means by "Macedonia." As he is, no doubt, aware, there is hardly a more elastic term in the whole vocabulary of the human race than the term "Macedonia." It means one thing to the Serb, another thing to the Bulgar, and a third thing to the Greek; each party using and abusing it in its own way. With the Servian definition it would be irrelevant to deal in a discussion concerning the Greco-Bulgarian feud. I will, therefore, confine myself to the delimitations of the province favoured by these two rivals only. The Bulgar includes in "Macedonia" simply the whole of the territory which has been marked out as Bulgarian by the Panslavs, and which was sanctioned by the abortive Treaty of San Stefano in 1878. That delimitation suits the Bulgar admirably, because, by embracing the northern parts, which are thoroughly Slavonic (how much of those districts is Bulgarian and how much Servian I leave to others to decide), it naturally gives to the Slavonic element an indisputable preponderance in the total. But, for that very reason, it does not suit the Greek at all. The Greek asks: "What right have you to define as 'Macedonian' regions which at no period of their history have formed part of Macedonia? If the term 'Macedonia' is to have any meaning, it must surely be applied to those regions only which at various periods have been known as 'Macedonian.'" Those regions roughly correspond with the vilayets of Salonica and Monastir, excluding from the latter vilayet the sandjaks of Dibra and Elbasan, which are Albanian.

Now, in those regions—the only part of the country to which the Greeks lay claim—the Bulgarian element most emphatically does not preponderate. The inhabitants of those districts, if, for the purposes of the present argument, we omit the larger Turkish element, are partly pure Greek and Greco-Vlachs, and partly people who, although they speak a bastard Slavonic idiom, call themselves, in the vast majority of cases, Greeks, and are, for that reason, stigmatised by Bulgarian Chauvinists as "Grecomaniacs." What the real racial origin of these populations is, would be impossible to say. He can dogmatise most confidently who knows least about them. Personally, I have come across among them some who declare that their speech is due to intercourse with the Slav invaders. The tradition among them is that they adopted the language of their neighbours, because their neighbours were too stupid to adopt theirs. To my mind, this tradition, so far as it goes, is worthy of more serious attention than is vouchsafed to it by the advocates of the Bulgarian cause. It is not improbable in itself. The history of the world abounds in examples of one race adopting the language of another. But I will confine myself to the most obvious parallel. In Asia Minor there are whole populations the Hellenic origin of which has never been doubted, and which yet have for their mother tongue Turkish. But, for my part, I do not consider it necessary to lay too much stress on this tradition. I am ready, for the sake of argument, to grant that the Slavonic-speaking "Greeks" are no Greeks in blood. What then? Does that make them "Bulgarian" even in blood?

How little that is the case is shown by the fact that these very populations are claimed by both Serbs and Bulgars as Servian and Bulgarian respectively, and that the rival claims have at different times been espoused by Panslav politicians and publicists, according to the Russian policy prevailing at each time. Until 1885, for example, they were unanimously described as Bulgarian—for until that date it was Russia's policy to encourage the claims of the Bulgars. After 1885 Russian writers discovered suddenly that they were Servian—for after that date it suited Russian diplomacy to encourage the claims of the Serbs—and the Russian Consul-General at Salonica, M. Yastrebow, devoted much valuable time to the collection and edition of local folk-songs, which proved (to the satisfaction of all those who wished to see it proved) that the people were of pure Servian origin. Both theories, it is instructive to note, were based upon so-called scientific data; ethnological and philological. But the mere fact that the same data could be used to support such contradictory conclusions, showed the amount of reliance which could be placed upon them. However, even granting—for argument's sake, again—that these people, from a linguistic and racial point of view are Bulgars, how much does this admission help the practical claims of Bulgarian politicians? Ethnographical and philological theories, even when established, are of no importance whatever in practical politics: racial origin and language do not constitute nationality. If they did, the map of the whole of Europe would have to be changed in a manner that would, perhaps, surprise even Mr. Buxton.

The ethnographical doctrine, which played so loud and, in some cases, so mischievous a rôle on the Continent during the earlier part of the nineteenth century, has long been discredited and discarded by serious Continental thinkers. Renan, twenty-five years ago, gave eloquent expression to the saner views which had already been accepted in his time; and he did so in words which deserve to be quoted and remembered:

"De nos jours," he said, "on commet une erreur plus grave: on confond la race avec la nation, et l'on attribue à des groupes ethnographiques, ou plutôt linguistiques, une souveraineté analogue à celle des peuples réellement existants. . . . La vérité est qu'il n'y a pas de race pure et que faire reposer la politique sur l'analyse ethnographique, c'est la faire porter sur une chimère. . . . L'étude de la race est capitale pour le savant qui s'occupe de l'histoire de l'humanité. Elle n'a pas d'application en politique. . . . La race n'y est pas tout . . . et on n'a pas le droit d'aller par le monde tâter le crâne des gens, puis les prendre à la gorge en leur disant: 'Tu es de notre sang; tu nous appartiens!'" (See "Discours et Conférences," pp. 278, 296-297.)

This, I think, is an adequate reply to all the arguments based upon so-called ethnographical and linguistic considerations with regard to the people of Central and Southern "Macedonia," whom the Bulgars are pleased to call "Bulgarian," the Serbs "Servian," and the Greeks "Bulgarophone Greeks." The attitude of the Bulgarian propaganda towards these people, ever since the beginning of the Bulgarian movement, is described with prophetic fidelity and humour by Renan: "They seize them by the throat and tell them: 'You are of our blood; therefore, you belong to us!'" It is to be noted, however, as a most instructive and significant fact, that these people, despite all the methods employed by their would-be converters—education, bribery, and terrorism—have remained faithful to the Greek cause. Why? The Bulgars and their advocates reply without hesitation, "Oh, it is really ignorance and stupidity. They persist in calling themselves 'Greeks,' simply because they belong to the Greek Church. They are the victims of an error." A more convincing reply, to my mind, would be that these people, be their racial antecedents what they may, have identified themselves so closely and so long with the Greek nationality, that they have what we would call a Greek national consciousness—the only thing that counts in national questions. If they are the victims of error, it is open to the Bulgars to convince them of their error. But, I repeat, all the efforts made by the latter for thirty years to that end have, so far as the majority is concerned, miserably failed. These people, taken in the bulk, have undergone martyrdom in defence of what they consider, rightly or wrongly, as their national cause. Neither the hope of profit, nor the fear of death, has prevailed against their "error."

Under the circumstances, are we justified in denying to them the right of calling themselves "Greeks," or in denying to the Greeks the right of regarding themselves as such? Mr. Buxton, in illustration of his argument, quotes the case of Ireland. I, in support of mine, will quote a case at least as relevant—the case of the Channel Islands. As we all know, the natives of those islands, in point of race and language, are French; or, to be more accurate, judged by ethnographical and linguistic criteria, they are at least as French as the Macedonians in question, judged by similar standards, are Bulgarian. And yet, it is a notorious fact that the Channel Islanders, in point of national consciousness, are more English than the natives of England themselves. A native of Jersey or Guernsey resents nothing more bitterly than to be called a Frenchman. Precisely in the same way the natives of the Grecophil districts of Macedonia which I am discussing resent nothing more bitterly than to be called Bulgars. Now, what should we say of a French propaganda sending its missionaries to the Channel Islands to persuade the inhabitants that their allegiance to the English nationality is an error; that, judged by—to quote Mr. Buxton—"the fundamental identities of custom, language, and race," they are French; and that they, on that account, ought to join France? What should we do, if those missionaries, not content with theoretical arguments drawn from the waste-paper basket of Teutonic pedantry, began to "convert" the people to the French idea by terror? To put the question is to answer it.

Now, this is just what the Greeks, after years of patient endurance, such as few Englishmen are equal to, have done; finding that complaints and appeals for protection earned them nothing, except perhaps the secret contempt of those who in Greek forbearance saw a sign of impotence, and in Bulgarian violence a proof of vitality, they decided to meet their assailants with their own weapons. By every law of common sense and equity alike, I submit, the Greek attitude is as justifiable in principle as it was inevitable. The Greeks would, indeed, have richly deserved all the epithets which their most rabid enemies have ever heaped upon them, had they left to the mercy of their rivals a population which has proved its title to the Greek nationality and the sincerity of its attachment to the Greek cause in the most unambiguous manner possible—by dying for them.

As regards the methods adopted by the Greek bands, the worst that can be said about them is that they are but a pale copy of the methods employed for years, and without a word of protest from Mr. Buxton, by the Bulgarian bands. In a country still in the Middle Ages, warfare must (worse luck) assume a medieval aspect.

To conclude, so much concerning your correspondent's "racial facts" and his tactful refusal to apportion the blame between the two combatants. Space does not permit me to enter into any of the other issues raised by his letter. What I have already said, however, constitutes a sufficient contradiction of his astounding assertion—astounding, I mean, to those who are personally acquainted with the causes and the course of events—that the pseudo-insurrection of 1903 "represented the struggle, against overwhelming odds, of a single and coherent nationality."—Yours, &c.,

G. F. ABBOTT.

233, Temple Chambers, November 27th, 1907.

Reviews.

THE PURGATION OF HOMER.*

ON laying down this book, the reader's first feeling is likely to be bewilderment, finding that he has traversed a region where every square inch is soaked with the blood of controversialists, where every wall shelters a sharpshooter, and every copse conceals an ambush, where the atmosphere is riven with the cries and alarms of ceaseless polemic, and yet, all the time he was treading the perilous ground under the care of his guide, he never heard more than a faint echo of the clashing of the swords or the clamour of war. The strong impression which this brilliant study of one of the two most contentious problems of literature is sure to produce is undoubtedly heightened by the author's resolute skill in steering his argument clear of the controversies that beset his course. It is needless to say that only a master of the controversial literature could have embarked on this audacious policy without suffering sudden shipwreck.

Mr. Murray's book recalls us to the true appreciation of values. In late years the amazing discoveries of archæology on the shores and islands of the Ægean Sea have to some extent relegated the Homeric question to a secondary place; the Mycenæan question, as it is called, has been more to the front; and the tendency has been, naturally enough, to study Homer for the sake of the excavations rather than the excavations for the sake of Homer. The two interests, the literary and the historical, are, indeed, complementary; but it is well to remember that the literary interest in this case is incomparably greater. Who would give the Iliad in exchange for an exact historical chronicle of all the Ægean States of the second millennium? Who would barter the Odyssey for an authoritative history of the Greek migrations? "One of a hundred oxen's price, the other but of nine!" And the origin of the epic is of higher interest than the question, "Who are the Mycenæans?" In fact, ultimately, does not the intensity of the interest in Mycenæ and Co. depend upon their value for Homer? The importance of that value no one will dispute. The archæological discoveries have showered light on the historical background of the early epics; and Mr. Murray has devoted about a quarter of his work to the Ægean peoples, the pre-Hellenic races and the Northern invaders, the old civilisation and the dark age which ensued on its decline. Here he discusses the historical bearings of the legend of the Trojan war. He emphasises the fact that Troy, like Mycenæ, had been seized by Northern invaders, that Priam was as much a Northern chieftain as Agamemnon. This fact goes to explain the homogeneity of the Greek and Trojan civilisations as they appear in the Iliad. Accepting Bérard's demonstration that the prosperity of Troy and Mycenæ depended on their geographical situations commanding commercial short-cuts, the author thinks that these cities, as well as Cnossos and Thebes, which also depended on commerce, lying on trade-routes, were not destroyed by sudden shocks of war, but lost their wealth and power by degrees when commerce was paralysed by the movements of later and ruder hordes of Northern invaders. It was natural that Greek legend should ultimately represent the Trojan war as ending in the sack of Troy; for it is the privilege of legend to turn defeat into victory; a warrior people expects its chiefs to triumph. For instance, in Merovingian legend, where we can compare Saga with history, we find the defeat of the Franks at Visorontia masquerading as a success. Are not the tales of the dishevelled return of the Greek heroes from Troy highly significant? The tradition of the Nostoi belongs to the earliest and most fundamental parts of the Trojan cycle; it points surely to some very different motive from the triumphant home-coming of victors. Mr. Murray speaks of the expedition of Agamemnon (that is, of course, of some Achæan king corresponding to Agamemnon) as a historical fact. This is a view to which there has been a tendency to return since the discovery of the Sixth City of Hissarlik. But the existence of that city only proves strictly the actuality of the background; it does not show that the federal expedition from Greece against Troy was not pure fiction; and the sceptic may say that the author has assumed its historical reality without proof. To the present writer, the proof seems to lie in the unintentional implications of defeat. A triumphant enterprise might be a fiction, but a legend which implies, though it does not confess, failure, must assuredly have arisen from dire experience.

The dark period of migrations, which has been called the Middle Age, is treated in vivid pages, in which the author does not attempt to reconstruct the particular movements of particular tribes, but tries to show us the life and conditions of the time. He constructs an imaginary picture of the capture of an imaginary island, which might serve as the text for a story of Kipling. He goes on to show the decline of tribal custom and religion in these unsettled times, and certain germs of "regeneration" to be found in the feelings of aidôs, "sense of shame," and nemesis, "righteous anger," which he illustrates, with sympathetic insight, from Homer and Hesiod.

Having set forth the historical conditions, to which the rise of the epic must be related, Mr. Murray proceeds to develop the view, which, in one form or another, is held by most critics, that the Iliad and Odyssey are not works composed at a given moment, but include elements of diverse dates and diverse origins, introduced in successive generations by professional poets. But this thesis is wrought out and illustrated in a novel way, and by arguments which will probably help many who cling to the traditional unity of authorship to overcome their prejudices. The Greeks of the migration period possessed a literature which comprised "the whole body of heroic tradition, as embodied in hexameter verse." It consisted of poems, each of which might be recited on a single occasion. And these poems were written down, but not for the public eye, only for the use of the writer; each book was a unicum. The book was preserved in the poet's family as an heirloom, and in successive generations was "changed, expanded, and expurgated," to suit the changing tastes, ideas, and interests of the public, for whom the original bard's descendants provided æsthetic entertainment. The poems from which the Iliad and Odyssey grew originated in Æolis, and were in the old Æolic tongue, but they were afterwards annexed by the Ionians, and, as the tongue of the Ionians changed, the epic dialect changed, too. At the great Ionian festivals, long epics could be recited by relays of minstrels, and this would explain the possibility of such long compositions as the Iliad and Odyssey, which have been enlarged from shorter lays that possessed a more compact unity, and could be sung at a sitting.

The element of divination in parts of this reconstruction is considerable, and the argument is mainly analogy. Mr. Murray was inspired with the happy idea of using the light that modern criticism has shed on the growth of the Pentateuch to illuminate the evolution of a "traditional book." He shows that the evidence of the Iliad conforms to what we should expect to find, if it is the result of such a growth. And here he has made what must be pronounced his most important contribution to Homeric criticism. He has demonstrated a systematic process of expurgation in the Iliad. He has shown with penetrating acuteness that torture, insult to the dead, human sacrifice, god-kings, poisoned arrows, and impurity, were features of the epic in its older stages, but have been cleared out of Homer, not quite completely but leaving traces which enable us to see the process. A single word sometimes hints at discarded topics. The Homeric poets mention Minos as an intimate of Zeus; they are silent about the Minotaur and the human tribute. But the epithet olophron lets out the truth; it is a word used of dangerous beasts, and it betrays the horrors of savagery associated with Minos.

The internal evidence of the composite nature of Homer, supplied by inconsistencies of custom and misunderstandings, is restated with force and judgment for some selected instances which are sufficient for the purpose. A new and interesting item may be added to this evidence. It has been shown by the German scholar, Robert, that some passages of the Iliad display a true knowledge of Trojan topography as revealed by the explorations, while elsewhere there are mistakes and inconsistencies. Clearly the later poets failed to realise the relations of the localities implied in the older lays, just as they failed to understand the methods of fighting.

* "The Rise of the Greek Epic." Being a course of Lectures delivered at Harvard University. By Gilbert Murray, M.A., LL.D., Fellow of New College, Oxford. Clarendon Press. 6s. net.

The reviewer so fully agrees with Mr. Murray's general doctrine that he is little inclined to criticise the plan and disposition of the book. But one or two observations are perhaps desirable. It is surprising that the lecturer, while turning the lights full on the Iliad, has kept the Odyssey so persistently in the dim background, only occasionally flinging it a word. Of course, he has the answer that his design is to illustrate only, not to exhaust; but still his argument does remain incomplete, without some definite treatment of the second epic, and we have some right to complain that a brief section is not devoted to it. This silence is even tantalising, because the only important obiter dicta that we can find on the Odyssey point out that this poem is "nearer to the raw material" and less "Homeric" than the Iliad, the expurgation having been less thorough. We want to know why this was. For both poems were the results of an expansion which proceeded through the same period and in the same milieu. Mr. Murray will have to do his duty by the Odyssey; it will not let him off.

Again, while each lecture is perfectly satisfactory in itself, the method of exposition will, it is to be feared, provide difficulties for the reader who tries to put together the results of the several parts, and form a definite conception of the whole development. There is a certain vagueness at some points, and uncertainty may be felt whether the vagueness is intentional or due to want of co-ordination. These disadvantages are inherent in the analytic method of exposition when it is not supplemented by a synthetic recapitulation. For instance, having read Lectures IV.-VII., we feel quite clear that the Iliad came into existence on Ionian ground, being designed for recitation at the Pan-Ionian festivals. The Wrath of Achilles, from which it was expanded, was pre-Ionian, and so was much of the rest of the material, but the Iliad was planned by the Ionian Homer. We are then pulled up short, when we read in Lecture VIII. that the Æolic migration seems to have produced Homer, "if we mean by Homer the author of the Iliad." Are we then to suppose that the expansion of the Wrath into the Iliad was, after all, accomplished by an Æolian bard, and that in Ionia it was only expanded further? This seems to contradict the natural meaning of the statements in Lecture VII. The translation of "Homer" from Æolis to Ionia is not mentioned before Lecture VIII., and we wonder whether the author wishes us to suppose that the poets of Æolis migrated to Ionia, as the doctrine of the traditional book would seem to imply. Some of us may know what Mr. Murray means, but the book would have been easier if he had been more explicit in correlating the various parts of his analysis, and had stated precisely what points in the development he wishes to leave undetermined. It is noticeable that he is very chary of chronology.

No space is left to touch on the discussions of other interesting questions, as of the translation of local traditions from Greece to the scene of Troy, where a brilliant paper of Bethe is utilised. It may be said that since the appearance of the "Homeric Investigations" of Wilamowitz-Möllendorff no more important study of the Greek epic has appeared. The distinction of Mr. Murray's book is that it unites historical method with literary insight and sympathy of imagination. He has enriched us with much new knowledge, and he has saddened us with one new regret—that we have not an unexpurgated Homer.

J. B. BURY.

"THE BEST MAGAZINE."*

It is rather difficult to imagine a literary event more potent to stir up old memories in the depths of our literary consciousness than the celebration of its fiftieth anniversary by a contemporary at once so prime and so mature as the "Atlantic Monthly." But the other day Longfellow, Lowell, Holmes, Whittier, and the rest of the constellation seemed quite near us; and now how interminably remote! A little reverence and a little sadness cannot fail to mingle with the impalpable dust that has already begun to settle upon heads once so loved. Yet here, undoubtedly, is a group of which, at least as certainly as of any other group in the nineteenth century, it may be said that its legend is imperishable. Its very narrowness, its homogeneity of place, time, and circumstance, its essential provincialism under the garb of nationality, have enabled posterity to single it out, to focus it apart, and to regard its inmates with the same detachment and curiosity of interest which pertains to the fauna of a small oasis in the midst of a desert.

Boston in the fifties was still a nest of school teachers and transcendentalists. On the intellectual side it was dominated by its Brahmin caste of lawyers, professors, and Unitarian pastors, grafted upon the tough but finally outworn Puritanism of Mather and Edwards. The city and its suburbs constituted a sort of tutorial college to the whole of the vast mute continent. The wonderful pioneer life of the prairie, the forest, the emigration camp, and the border town had been lived in America; but, apart from the rough sketches of Cooper and Galt, it remained practically unembodied in art. Native utterance had been overawed, abashed, and finally silenced by the academic English judgments, of which Boston was the impartial, infallible mouthpiece. Boston proclaimed that it was successfully defying this unpatriotic impulse, but the progress of independence was hardly perceptible. In the great period of the New England masters, and of the "Atlantic" group, at any rate, it remained for all practical purposes of comparison imitative and essentially uncreative.

So little is there of the inevitable about the utterance of these worthies, that one never feels sure whether they will break out next in a song or a sermon, a philosophical essay or a didactic romance. But there is always something self-conscious and provincial, either in the form or the content of the literary output of the New England capital. It was not until the seventies or eighties that, with the advent of Twain, Bret Harte, Whitman, Cable, and Miller, men and women rose from the interior to vitalise American life in literature as a whole. The Americans have since risen rapidly to their new literary destiny. Something like a stampede has set in from the grass-grown streets of Boston; the modern Athens of America has been left high and dry, like Edinburgh, upon its acropolis; and the stern dilemma proposed by Francis Parkman that to be a successful writer in the New World one must be either a Harvard man or a humbug, has no longer a serious significance. Yet, when all this is said, it remains true that America neither has, nor can expect for a very long time to come, a group that will please, or attract the old world, or occupy such a place in its legendary as the famous Boston, Cambridge, and Concord groups which combined in the late fifties to produce the "Atlantic."

Lowell, the prince of Elmwood, was to a certain extent the darling of the group. He had much of Davy Garrick in his composition, mercurial, a creature of whim and mood, and with something of the varium et mutabile of the feminine temperament; the most gifted, perhaps, of all, but with the element of instability which prevented him from being the critic of two continents, rather than the bard, the humanist, the envoy, the governing wit and dilettante of a more or less provincial clique. There was Longfellow, smiling serenely to music, and the far greater Emerson, with the ice brook's temper, cold, beautiful, healing, his spontaneity and brightness harmonising all too imperfectly with his love of abstraction. There remain the crisp and chirping Doctor Holmes, kindest of little men, who, like Goldsmith and Lamb, "flowered late," poking his head back into the room after a calculated exit, to cap his wit with a stroke of fun, and with him—the last two left of the old group still clinging to a spar—J. G. Whittier.

The unity of the group, as always in such cases, is no doubt to some extent a literary afterthought. The necromantic Hawthorne, for instance, though a neighbour and a friend, was among them, but not of them. Emerson, who spoke of Poe as the "jingle-man," distrusted the dimness and sombreness of Salem. Whitman and Twain were pondered deeply over by Concord and by Cambridge, but to no purpose but that of fear and amazement. Lowell attacked Margaret Fuller without mercy, and would as soon have taken the arm of an elm as that of Thoreau. Emerson confused and puzzled everyone else in more senses than one, but remained true as steel to

* "The Atlantic Monthly." Constable & Co.

Alcott. "I asked Alcott," he once said, "what he would do when he came to the gate and St. Peter demanded his ticket. 'What have you to show to justify your right to live?' I said. 'Where is your book, your picture? You have done nothing in the world.' 'No,' he said, 'but somewhere, on a hill up there, will be Plato and Paul and Socrates talking, and they will say, 'Send Alcott over here, we want him with us.'" And," said Emerson gravely, shaking his head, "he was right; Alcott was right." People, again, were not wanting, of course, who thought the "little man," Holmes, tiresome. Dr. Stowe, conceivably, thought him so when, at the dinner given in his honour and that of his wife, Holmes hammered away at his end of the table upon the thesis that the custom of profane swearing was native to the pulpit, while Lowell lectured the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" at the other end upon the immense superiority of "Tom Jones" over all other prose fiction whatsoever. The cerebration of the autocrat was so rapid as invariably to give Longfellow a headache.

Taken as a whole, however, the group was remarkable for its harmony and magnanimity. The "Atlantic Monthly" was its creation, its masterpiece, its memorial; and certainly not the least permanent one. And it very soon became fully as much the centre of Boston thought as the "Dial" had been in the early forties, or the "Old North" (American Review) for twenty years before that. Francis H. Underwood was the "Atlantic's" first projector, but "James" and "Wendell" (as they called each other) were its master spirits from its start in November, 1857. It is characteristic that a deputation was sent across the water to enlist the leading magazinist of the old country, and the overture was entrusted to that practised hand, James Hannay, with a long paper on "Douglas Jerrold." There were further essays on the "Manchester Exhibition" and on "British India," while an able article by Godwin Parke on "The Financial Flurry" was curiously anticipatory of November, 1907. Emerson provoked the spirit of parody by his poem on "Brama"; but the real piece of resistance was the essay with the Sternean exordium, "I was just going to say when I was interrupted," by the Magazine's good genius and undoubted fairy godfather, Oliver Wendell Holmes.

As in all really good things, there was an element of mystery about the early "Atlantic." The articles were unsigned, and most of them served as excellent riddles, when even the name of the editor was a subject of speculation. The English rate of pay at a guinea a page was fearlessly adopted, and Motley could soon say without flattery that the Magazine was "the best in the English language." This proud position, under the successive directions of Lowell, James T. Fields, Howells, Aldrich, Scudder, Page, and Bliss Perry, it has, for the most part, resolutely maintained. For, while it no longer remains the expression of a provincial city, it remains a conductor in a remarkable degree to certain old-fashioned graces of style, in much the same way as Canada, within the French line, still serves as a conductor to certain phrases and habits of thought of the seventeenth century. In outward display it is as demure and as undemonstrative as an old-fashioned French shop. But, if you want a supply in bulk of the qualities that go to the perfection of the English essay, they will be found with more certainty than anywhere else in an average number of the "Atlantic." By insensible degrees the Magazine has lost its old monopoly as mouthpiece of the Brahmin caste. Abreast to-day in the fullest degree of the newer, Pan-American ideals, it has been able to secure its position only by the maintenance of the highest standard of literary expression attainable; and it has achieved this by sacrificing notoriety to the systematic standardisation of all the matter that it prints. The more particular reward of this is a loyalty to the traditions, the formalities, and the morale of the magazine (illustrated by many amusing stories in its recent fiftieth anniversary number), such as exists between extremely few modern periodicals and their readers. It is not by any means easy, without a continually renewed effort of self-projection, to keep oneself steadily interested in the affairs of a continent from three to four thousand miles away. The first contact between the mind's eye and the "Atlantic's" table of contents is apt, not infrequently, to engender a distinct sense of depression. But the magazine is revenged when, after a tentative nibble, the reader feels himself irresistibly impelled to read it through from cover to cover. Its triumph is complete when he is inveigled still further into examining its old files, which seem to us to help a stay-at-home Englishman better than any other means, perhaps, to understand a little—a very little—of the strange human speculation which we call America.

THE CHARACTER OF VENICE.*

SIGNOR MOLMENTI'S history of the private life of Venice is the only history that gives us a clear and definite idea of the character of the Venetian people. Cut off and alienated from Europe, as much in sentiment and feeling as in the causes of her prosperity and greatness, Venice is scarcely amenable to Western standards of criticism, nor are her motives and history to be gauged by European weights and measures. She is the one exception to the rule of intellectualism in the West. In all other Western States progress has lain along the line of intellect. The civilisations of Greece and Rome, as of the modern nations, have been, or are, intellectual civilisations. The civilisation of Venice was, in the main, a sensuous civilisation, a civilisation, that is to say, more after the Eastern than the Western pattern. From the Renaissance she stood aside. Hospitable ever, she opened her lagoons to persecuted or wandering scholars. She was a ready and luxurious asylum where overworked Paduan students found "the joy of life untrammelled by study." Illustrious men of learning flocked from all quarters to Venice, from the East after the fall of Constantinople as readily as from the West. Thither came Uberti, and extolled the Venetian splendour and wealth in Latin odes. Thither came the coldly critical Erasmus, and Galileo, and Sarpi, Petrarch, and Giordano Bruno, and Tasso, and here, in 1490, was established, but by foreigners, the celebrated Aldine Press, which exercised so marked an influence on the new learning. But though she entertained genius she never bred it. Venice, the most magnificent, the richest, the longest-lived of the Italian States, contributed nothing original to Italian thought. Not a single great reputation, not one man of real intellectual eminence, issued from Venice. In striking contrast to the eagerness of her great rival, Florence, the interest of Venice in the Renaissance was really that of an onlooker. Her attitude is the attitude of an indolent and gracious woman reclining in the shadow of lime trees on an August afternoon, eating apricots and listening to a dispute among scholars.

No, the character of Venice was never intellectual; it was sensuous, emotional, Oriental. It was not only that she drew her wealth and splendour from the East, that, in a time when Europe was plunged in darkness and semi-slavery, she sparkled and glittered in the silks and pearls of Persia and Hindustan, that her very existence hung upon her Eastern trade, that Byzantium was her Mecca, and that all her ideals in matters of art and taste were stimulated by Byzantine example and Byzantine instruction; it was that, as the result of all this, there was nourished and drawn out in the Venetian temperament a strong and unmistakable strain of Oriental feeling and sentiment. There exists, indeed, and has existed from the earliest times, a strong tradition in Venice itself that her population was descended from a colony of Orientals, who in remote antiquity had emigrated from Asia Minor to Northern Italy. However this may be, her Oriental cast of thought is very distinctive. Life for Venice was an emotion, something to be savoured and felt and enjoyed, not reasoned over and intellectually developed. Setting aside her early period of effort, and after the East had got good hold of her, Venice's philosophy of life is Oriental; and it is just this which makes her such an enigma to us Westerners. Florence, the scientific, we can easily comprehend, and Milan, the political, and Bologna, the learned, and Perugia, the devout, and even Naples the pagan; but Venice, the Oriental, Venice, voluptuous and vigilant, indolent and fierce, luxurious and cruel, eludes us.

Perhaps it is because Signor Molmenti is himself a Venetian, one, too, who has dedicated himself to the study of Venetian life and Venetian art, and whose natural love for his city has been deepened by thought and study, that he is able to present Venetian character so effectively. To him the pageantry and splendour of Venice are not the accessories and mere setting of her life; they are the life itself. The daily festivals, the gorgeous colours, the music and warm twilight, the languid, lapping water, the stretching and basking of the luxurious city in the mere delight of sensuous existence, are profoundly illustrative, as Molmenti feels, of what is most characteristic in the Venetian temperament. The life of Venice generally is certainly more matter for painting than literature, and hitherto Giorgione, and Veronese, and Tintoretto have been Venice's best historians. We remember a passage in one of Mr. Berenson's books in which, alluding to the difference in character between Venetian and Florentine painting, he says that, "though we forget the Florentines were painters, they remain great sculptors; and if we forget they were sculptors, still they remain architects and poets, and men of science." With the Venetians it is different. "The significance of the Venetian names is exhausted with their significance as painters." And we may add that the significance, as painters even, of the Venetians, is on this account changed. It is different altogether to the significance of the Florentines. Florentine painting, you can see at a glance, is the expression of an acutely intellectual life. Venetian painting, on the contrary, is singularly lacking in intellect, and compared to Florentine, is dull and almost stupid. It owes its value entirely to the power with which it brings out, by means of deep, rich colours, and a powerful scheme of chiaroscuro, all that was emotional in the Venetian character. It has behind it, not an intellectual but a sensuous life. It is because Molmenti treads in the painters' steps, because he emphasises what they emphasise, and finds important what they find important, that his history also is so truly an interpretation of Venice.

* "History of Venice." By Pompeo Molmenti. Translated by Horatio F. Brown. Part II. "Venice in the Golden Age." Murray. 2 vols. 21s. net.

As for Mr. Brown's translation, handsomely bound in two volumes and enlivened with a number of good photographs, it may be said of it that it has several merits and one grave defect. Its merits naturally arise from the translator's long and close intimacy with the city, which enables him to enter thoroughly into his author's feelings and ideas, and to reproduce them in all their fullness and warmth. Its defect consists in the fact that it is not a full, but only a partial translation. Molmenti is fond of intermingling his text with quotations from diaries and letters of the time he is describing. Such quotations occur every moment, and extend from a few lines to a few pages. For some inconceivable reason Mr. Brown has left all this in Italian; left it, that is to say, in the very language of which he must have assumed us ignorant when he undertook to translate the book at all. Apparently he argues that, though we do not understand Molmenti, we ought to be able to understand Sanudo, Garzoni, Aretino, Beatrice d'Este, and fifty others. He will help us with the former, but with the others we may get on as best we can. Certainly as it stands the book can only be of use to people who know Italian; but people who know Italian are precisely those who have no need of it.

THOMAS HOOD.*

THERE is no reader of Hood but keeps him in affectionate regard. We can still warm our hands at that sunny memory. He takes very high rank among the humanists of the nineteenth century, of whom, indeed, he was almost the earliest. His wit, his punning humour, and his unvenomed satire, were always on the noble side—the side of the defenceless, the suffering, the sweated, and the voiceless. Hood was the man for the under-dog. His few great poems, as Lord Houghton wrote, more than a quarter of a century ago,

"Are no clamorous expressions of anger at the discrepancies and contrasts of humanity, but plain, solemn pictures of conditions of life, which neither the politician nor the moralist can deny to exist, and which they are imperatively called upon to remedy. Woman in her wasted life, in her hurried death, here stands appealing to the society that degrades her, with a combination of eloquence and poetry, of forms of art at once instantaneous and permanent, and with a material energy and variety of which perhaps our language alone is capable."

* "Thomas Hood: His Life and Times." By Walter Jerrold. Alston Rivers, Limited. 16s. net.

He died early, in 1845, at the age of forty-five, but had already made himself known to and loved by great masses of the people, who at that date were not peculiarly bookish; and Houghton tells us that when he himself uncovered the monument of the poet, raised by public subscription in the cemetery of Kensal Green, artisans came from far to view and honour it.

And it is Hood the humanitarian whose memory has best stood the test of time. Mr. Walter Jerrold (a grandson, we believe, of the Douglas Jerrold who knew Hood well, loved, and admired him) is a little too strenuous in pressing his claims as a humorist. "One of the greatest of English humorists of the nineteenth century." This it is quite impossible to admit. Hood was certainly one of the most delightful drolls of his day, a jester of infinite variety, and perhaps of too consummate a facility. But the master humorists of the nineteenth century were men of another order, and it is indifferent kind to seek a place with them for Hood. Take a few names, not altogether at random, yet not too curiously chosen. Lamb (some eleven years Hood's senior, and called by him affectionately "father"), Carlyle, Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, George Eliot, Barham among the great word-twisting rhymesters, and De Quincey, in some respects the subtlest and most original humorist of them all. In this brief list there is humour of many sorts, humour that varies immensely in its quality and scope, but humour that has all of it in some measure perpetuated itself to our own day. Have we, of Hood's humour, any extensive piece which would now be deemed worthy of academic honours?

How far did the punning habit spoil him? A wild and incorrigible gamester he was in this respect, and the pun did at one period run very much to seed with him. A great deal both of his poetry and his prose, which undoubtedly tickled the ear of his own generation, nowadays seems, and in truth is, little better than buffoonery, albeit the humour and even the wit are never very far to seek. On the other hand, it is the merest justice to insist that Hood could and did do most wonderful things with the pun, or the word equivocally used; while his employment of it now and again in the weird or awesome way was not merely in a high degree effective, it was a true stroke of genius. What a strange play of wit, at once colloquial and grim, is in this:—

"Death saw two players playing at cards,
But the game wasn't worth a dump,
For he quickly laid them flat with a spade
To wait for the final trump."

Mr. Jerrold seems to us to be very little in excess of the mark when he says:—

"Examples might be multiplied to show once more that Hood's puns are not word-twistings of the kind that Oliver Wendell Holmes inveighed against in his remarks on what he happily termed verbiage. It is rare, indeed, that there is any wresting of the form or meaning of a word with Hood; he just allows the word with two meanings to fall pat, so that either meaning may be attached and yet his sentence read logically. . . . At times, indeed, though the manner may be that of the humorist and pun-maker, the matter is essentially that of a poet."

He did in his later years modify and simplify his style, but never quite lost (nor seemed willing to lose) the trick of inversion, which he had mastered during his apprenticeship to the "London Magazine"; and thus shackled, he could never perhaps have attained to any perfect utterance in prose. The pun, or facetious word-play, persistently obtruded, does at any rate become as tedious as the euphuism, of which, indeed, it is a form. It remains, unless our judgment is grievously at fault, that Hood has left us no single piece which entitles him to a place beside "the greatest English humorists of the nineteenth century."

It matters not very much. Thomas Hood has a good and enviable place of his own. Apart from the quantity of fantasias that we can still in light mood make merry over, and little pieces of an almost perfect pathos, we have certain gems of his: The "Song of the Shirt," the "Bridge of Sighs," the "Song of the Labourer," and to these shall be added "Eugene Aram"—upon which, were our little social world renewed and re-made throughout, death could not easily settle.

BEAUTIFUL BOOKS.

THE NATURE POEMS OF GEORGE MEREDITH.

With 16 Full-Page Pictures in Photogravure by WILLIAM HYDE. New Edition. Royal 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Hyde's monochrome wash drawings are in some respects the finest things he has ever done; the splendid poetry and his beloved Nature have inspired him doubly, as it were, in these stately pictures."—Manchester Guardian.

THE ART OF LANDSCAPE GARDENING.

By HUMPHRY REPTON. Revised and Edited by JOHN NOLEN, Member of the American Society of Landscape Architects. Fully Illustrated from the Original Plates. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

GREECE AND THE AEGEAN ISLANDS.

By PHILIP SANFORD MARDEN. Crown 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. Fully Illustrated.

A work which should be at once a source of pleasure to those who know Greece, and of some assistance to those who are making their first acquaintance with the fascinating land.

LONDON PARKS AND GARDENS.

By the Hon. Mrs. EVELYN CECIL. Author of "A History of Gardening in England," "Children's Gardens." With numerous Illustrations in Colour by LADY VICTORIA MANNERS. Imp. 8vo, 21s. net.

"No more fascinating and complete study of Nature in town . . . has ever been made . . . Ardent love and long labour must have gone to the making of the book. . . . Lady Victoria Manners has helped in the task by contributing many charming illustrations."—Country Life.

THE GHOSTS OF PICCADILLY.

By G. S. STREET. Illustrated with 12 Photogravure Plates. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Street's volume, happily conceived and choicely written, is executed with equal care and illustrated with fine portraits of the more famous 'Ghosts.'"—Morning Post.

THE STORY OF A BEAUTIFUL DUCHESS.

Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll.

By HORACE BLEACKLEY, M.A. With Photogravure Portraits. 21s. net.

"A spirited picture of a time abounding in curious interest."—Spectator.

VENETIAN LIFE.

By W. D. HOWELLS. Author of "Italian Journeys," etc. New Edition, Revised, and with an additional chapter. With 20 Full-Page Plates in Colour by EDMUND H. GARRETT. 8vo, 16s. net.

WILLIAM BLAKE.

The Poet, The Artist, The Man. With Some Contemporary Accounts.

By ARTHUR SYMONS. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Mr. Arthur Symons, in a triple capacity of biographer, critic, and editor, has everywhere in his most valuable book made good use of a refined intuition and efficient judgment."—Nation.

"A book which we cannot do without."—Saturday Review.

KATE DOUGLAS WIGGIN.

THE OLD PEABODY PEW.

Illustrated with Six Full-Page Plates by A. B. STEPHENS. Each page printed in Two Colours, Crown 8vo. Cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net.

The Bookman says:—"The very title of this book and its size will fill anyone with pleasant excitement who knows the writings of Kate Douglas Wiggin, and when the sub-title is read, 'A Christmas Romance of a Country Church,' imagination will prepare the reader for a touching successor to 'The Birds' Christmas Carol.' This is a village story, a country courtship, a beautiful love tale with humour in it, and a happy ending. It is appropriateness itself as a book for Christmas time."

NEW CHRONICLES OF REBECCA.

Illustrated. 2nd Edition, 6s.

ROSE O' THE RIVER.

With Coloured Illustrations. 2nd Edition, 5s.

MARY JOHNSTON.

BY ORDER OF THE COMPANY.

AUDREY.

THE OLD DOMINION.

SIR MORTIMER.

With Frontispiece to each Volume. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.

THE YOUNGER SET. Illustrated,

THE FIGHTING CHANCE. "

THE RECKONING.

THE MAIDS OF PARADISE.

THE MAID-AT-ARMS.

A YOUNG MAN IN A HURRY.

IN SEARCH OF THE UNKNOWN.

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

IOLE. Illustrated. 5s.

CARDIGAN, Popular Edition, 2s. 6d. net.

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH

RICHARD FEVEREL.

BEAUCHAMP'S CAREER.

SANDRA BELLONI.

VITTORIA.

THE EGOIST.

EVAN HARRINGTON.

ONE OF OUR CONQUERORS.

LORD ORMONT AND HIS AMINTA.

THE AMAZING MARRIAGE.

DIANA OF THE CROSSWAYS.

HARRY RICHMOND.

RHODA FLEMING.

THE SHAVING OF SHAGPAT.

THE TRAGIC COMEDIANS.

SHORT STORIES.

POEMS—IN TWO VOLUMES.

AN ESSAY ON COMEDY.

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. each; Leather, 3s. 6d. net. each, Library Edition, 6s. each.

GEORGE GISSING.

THE PRIVATE PAPERS OF HENRY RYECROFT.

Pocket Edition Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Leather, 3s. 6d. net; Library Edition, 6s.

VERANILDA.

WILL WARBURTON.

THE HOUSE OF COBWEBS. 6s. each.

MISS MARIE CORELLI.

THE TREASURE OF HEAVEN. With Frontispiece Portrait.

DELICIA.

FREE OPINIONS FREELY EXPRESSED. 6s. each.

MR. BERNARD SHAW.

JOHN BULL'S OTHER ISLAND.

MAN AND SUPERMAN.

PLAYS PLEASANT.

PLAYS UNPLEASANT.

PLAYS FOR PURITANS.

CASHIEL BYRON'S PROFESSION.

THE IRRATIONAL KNOT.

Uniform Cloth gilt, 6s. each.

DRAMATIC OPINIONS AND ESSAYS.

2 vols., 10s. 6d. net.

THE PERFECT WAGNERITE.

3s. 6d. net.

ERNEST THOMPSON SETON.

MONARCH, THE BIG BEAR. 5s. net.

ANIMAL HEREOS. 6s. net.

TWO LITTLE SAVAGES. 6s. net.

Each Profusely Illustrated.

NIMROD'S WIFE. By Mrs. THOMPSON SETON. Illustrated, 6s.

MISS MAY SINCLAIR.

THE HELPMATE.

THE DIVINE FIRE.

TWO SIDES OF A QUESTION. 6s. each.

A TALE OF THE WILD.*

ABOUT twenty years ago "The Atlantic Monthly," which has brought to light more literary talent than perhaps any English or American magazine, printed a remarkable novel, "The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains," by Miss Murfree, who took the pen-name of Charles Egbert Craddock. The wild atmosphere of this study of the uncouth, lawless, and cramped life of the Tennessee mountaineers revealed an original talent strikingly in contrast with the smooth, self-conscious, and polished culture of the Bostonian school. But Miss Murfree's novels unfortunately attracted as little attention in England as the delicate, pellucid art of her rival, Sarah Orme Jewett, the New Jersey writer, some of whose short stories hold their own with the best in French literature. It is a great pleasure to find that Miss Murfree is still writing with the same grasp and force of creative passion that years ago placed her among the ten or twelve American novelists worth serious attention. Though the comparison is in many respects inapt, Miss Murfree might be compared with the Brontë sisters in respect to the influence that the wild sublimity of untamed nature in moorland or mountainous scenery exercises over the romantic spirit. And so long as the novelist is true to the spirit of the life he has studied, that efflorescence of imaginative feeling, which is the soul of romanticism, may be welcomed by the sternest realist, who, indeed, has no quarrel with romanticism as such, but only with its haunting shadow of falsity. The strength of Miss Murfree's art lies in its being a genuine human growth of a wild and savage land of mountain ranges, hostile to the petty conceited activities of town civilisation. Her Tennessee mountaineers may be an unkempt, heavy, pathetically unawakened race, but in them lurk those depths of latent passion which underlie the very muteness of nature.

Lloyd and Haxon, partners and joint owners of a travelling Street Fair, find on arrival at Colbury that they have been lured by a smart railroad agent into making the most disastrous move of an unsuccessful season. For they have stranded the company on the confines of the uninhabited mountain wilderness, and with an empty exchequer they have to face the problem of conjuring money out of the pockets of an audience that does not, apparently, exist in this sparsely settled community. However, while Haxon is surly and depressed, Lloyd nerves himself to go through with the losing battle. "If the company had been wrecked on a desert island its case could not be more desperate." In a few swift touches that mark the hand of a practised artist, Miss Murfree suggests the atmosphere of Colbury, this "dead" town with "its future behind it," as the epigram has it, dominated by the wild splendours of the mountainous region with its dense forests, gloomy cañons, arrowy rushing rivers, and sapphire sky. And the inner force of the novel is derived from the crafty contrast of the vast sublimity of nature with the petty and transient interests of the little crowd of human characters that play out a few days' drama in the "Street Fair" in Colbury.

Lloyd, on a walk in the mountains the day of his arrival, comes across a country girl, Clotilda Pinnott, the daughter of a primitive family of mountaineers, an uncouth and stolid race, who have, however, their secret to guard from the inquisitive eyes of strangers. Old Shadrach Pinnott, ostensibly a farmer, has for years carried on successfully an illicit distillery, hidden in the recesses of a vast mountain cave unknown to his few scattered neighbours. The Revenue officers have long suspected him of "moonshining," but have never been able to find the slightest proof against him, and to account for raising his large crops of corn and orchard fruit old Shadrach keeps great droves of hogs. The scene in which Lloyd takes shelter in the log cabin of the Pinnott's, and rattles on in talk with the puzzled, uncouth members of the family who are furtively watching him, while taking him to be a Revenue spy, catches to a nicety the deep suspiciousness and slow-moving craft of the mind of primitive country folk. And the analysis of the inconstancy of Clotilda's feminine heart, when Lloyd, the townsman's open admiration of her face and voice, and invitation to her to do a mountain song and dance in Colbury Street Fair, have opened for her fascinating vistas of the life that awaits her in the great world beyond the frowning mountains, is subtly true. Her lover, Eugene Bailey, who has shot a man in self-defence, and fled to the "moonlighters" to escape a State trial, detects that the accidental coming of the stranger has shifted the perspective of Clotilda's world. He sees that her beautiful eyes grow soft and bright when Lloyd is discussed, and indeed Clotilda feels suddenly tired of Eugene's rustic and savage passion for her, of his menacing look when old Shadrach decides that the opportunity of taking a waggon-load of illicit spirits to the Colbury Street Fair, under the flimsy disguise of selling baskets, is too good to be lost. The violence and savagery of Eugene's nature is well indicated in the scene between the lovers, which is indeed typical of the spontaneity and pent-up force which mark Miss Murfree's style.

So many elements of surprise are threaded into the plot of "The Windfall" that it would be of small service to our readers to follow here the story's development. The strength of the book lies in the sharp effects of light and shade, and in the impressionistic vividness with which both the clash of emotions and the dramatic episodes are handled. There are times when the craving of all of us for romance, when our desire that the limitations of commonplace day to day reality shall be shattered and momentarily annihilated by the surge and shock of the unforeseen passionate forces of nature within and without us, are justified. Miss Murfree satisfies and justifies this craving in us without falling from the true dramatic plane to the lower levels of literary stagecraft. Her characters are convincing because their emotional life springs from the deep centres of human self-interest. Her one fault is that her dramatic imagination, to serve its own purpose, invests her characters with too much clairvoyance and perspicacity; and that occasionally a theatrical element obtrudes itself, so that we feel we ourselves are figures in a Salvator Rosa landscape. But, in general, we may claim that Miss Murfree, a born romantic at heart, is a realist in her close observation of nature. As an example of her skill in description, we quote the passage of Lloyd's first meeting with Clotilda:

"And suddenly he was conscious of motion in their midst. He could not be sure how he had failed to see the figure earlier—or, indeed, had it just come within his range of vision. A girl was standing half in the golden glow, and half in the emerald gloom of the shadow, gazing up wistfully at a bough gently swaying just beyond her reach. As the breeze tossed it, he saw the prize that lured her—a great Indian peach, the last of the season, with all the sweetness of the summer suns, with all the freshness of the summer rains stored within the luscious darkly-red globe. She raised her hand, and made a sudden leap toward it with the lightness, the grace, the agile strength of a deer. The wind brushed the bough beyond her reach, and once more she bounded toward it elastically.

"The indescribable grace of her attitudes appealed to the man whose education, and interest, and business in life were pose. Nothing more ethereally dainty was ever exploited before the footlights. He caught his breath, as, realising that she had not perceived him standing in the road, he gave himself up to staring at her, with a vague sense of a discovery growing upon him. Her dress, rustic though it was, impressed him as crudely picturesque. It was of the coarsest yellow calico, and she held up the skirt in front full of clusters of purple grapes, so overlaid that the rich bunches and tendrils of vine trailed down upon her petticoat thus revealed, which was of a dark red cotton. A short petticoat it was, and showed her feet and ankles; her chaussure was of the flimsiest—a pair of old rubber sandals, that, laced with thongs across her red hose, with only a utilitarian intent of retaining them in place, had contrived to achieve a classic effect; these members were so active, so swift and certain, so deftly used, so elastic of muscle as she skipped and leaped, that the idea of the boards was suggested anew—no première danseuse that he had ever seen could do a "turn" more daintily. She had all the sportive innocence of a fawn.

"... Her voice was crudely loud, but so clear. Every tone was so justly true. The enunciation was faulty beyond any power of description, and at first it made him wince, albeit his own capacities for declamation were of no high order. Then her singing struck him as characteristic—good of its kind, but of a kind never classified. He had an instinct for novelty. The second time she sang the stanza, giving herself up with a sort of joyous abandon to the dance, for now she seemed hardly to hope to reach the peach, he was so entranced with the picture she presented, the exquisite grace of her attitudes, the incomparable lightness and strength of her dancing, her beautiful, symmetrical form, and the strong sweet melody of her voice as it floated out so richly. He noted the contrast of her slender waist and limbs with the full throat—revealed by the bodice of the orange-tinted calico, the edges of which were turned in at the top for added coolness—the deep chest. With the vocal endowments the build assured the singer."

* "The Windfall." By Charles Egbert Craddock. Chatto & Windus. 6s.

Book-Buyers wishing to examine any of these books before purchasing them may, on sending to Mr. T. Fisher Unwin the name of their local Bookseller, have the opportunity of so doing.

STUDIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ITALY.

By VERNON LEE. New Edition, with a New Preface, a Photogravure Frontispiece, and 40 other Illustrations selected by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. Super-royal 8vo, half-bound 21s. net.

"Charming sketches, touched in with the light and sure hand of a master."—Spectator.

THE LETTERS OF EDWARD LEAR. (Author of "The Book of Nonsense") to Chichester Fortescue (Lord Carlingford) and Frances, Countess Waldegrave (1848 to 1864). Edited by LADY STRACHEY (of Sutton Court). With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Three Coloured Plates and many other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

The Westminster Gazette says: "Every page of the Letters is enthralling."
[Second impression now on sale.]

BEFORE AND AFTER WATERLOO. By EDWARD STANLEY, sometime Bishop of Norwich. Edited by J. H. ADEANE and MAUD GRENFELL. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

"In these Stanley Letters there are many vivid impressions of great characters and interesting scenes."—Tribune.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF FRANCE. By EMILE FAGUET. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
[Library of Literary History.]

"It is literally crammed with information; every page is interesting and valuable."—The Spectator.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF THE ARABS. By R. A. NICHOLSON, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
[Library of Literary History.]

"Mr. Nicholson has performed the work he set himself to accomplish with remarkable ability, and his book will henceforth be a standard one on the subject."—Daily Telegraph.

OLD ENGLISH SPORTS. By F. W. HACKWOOD. With 6 Coloured Plates and 32 other Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"A storehouse of information, admirably arranged for inspection, and cunningly set with anecdote and humorous story."—Standard.

MIRABEAU THE DEMI-GOD. Being the True and Romantic Story of his Life and Adventures. By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE, Author of "Court Beauties of Old Whitehall," "A Girl of the Multitude," &c. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"A book which it is difficult to lay aside, and still more difficult to forget."—Daily Chronicle.

A SISTER OF MARIE ANTOINETTE. The Life Story of Maria Carolina, Queen of Naples. By Mrs. BEARNE, Author of "A Leader of Society at Napoleon's Court," "Lives of the Early Valois Queens," &c. Fully Illustrated. Large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"Will be found to be as exciting as any romance—indeed, few romances equal it in interest."—Daily Telegraph.

The BRAHMANS, THEISTS, and MUSLIMS of INDIA.

By JOHN CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Litt., Author of "The Mystics, Ascetics, and Saints of India," "Indian Life: Religious and Social," &c. Illustrated Medium 8vo, 14s. net.

"A most valuable contribution to our knowledge of religious thought in India."—The Times.

MID PLEASURES AND PALACES. By MARY LANDON.

With 16 Illustrations. 6s.

Vivid impressions of Life and Travel in the Far East.

THE MATTERHORN. By GUIDO REY. Illustrated by EDOARDO RUBINO. With a Preface by EDMONDO DE AMICIS. Translated from the Italian by J. E. C. EATON. With 14 Coloured Plates, 23 Pen Drawings, and 11 Photographs. Super-royal 8vo, 21s. net. Fine Paper Edition (limited to 15 copies). Price on application.

"Another of those splendid Alpine books which send a thrill through the heart of the mountaineer, and arouse a mild and fascinating dread in the flat-lander."—Saturday Review.

THE PALACES OF CRETE AND THEIR BUILDERS.

By ANGELO MOSSO, Author of "The Life of Man on the High Alps." With 187 Illustrations and 2 Plans. Royal 8vo, 21s.

"The Illustrations are both numerous and excellently reproduced, and add greatly to the value of an already valuable book."—Daily News.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON. Life and Travel in Peru. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With a Map and numerous Illustrations. Medium 8vo, 21s.

"A living and convincing record of travel and experiences in the South American Republic."—The Tribune.

CHILE. By G. F. SCOTT-ELLIOT, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"An exhaustive and interesting account not only of the turbulent history of this country, but of her present conditions and prospects."—Westminster Gazette.

SECRET HISTORY OF THE ENGLISH OCCUPATION

OF EGYPT. Being a Personal Narrative of Events. By WILFRID SCRAWEN BLUNT. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Second Edition. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

"The real interest of the book lies in the sidelights Mr. Blunt throws upon contemporary English politics, and principally upon Mr. Gladstone."—Daily Chronicle.

THE WELSH FAIRY BOOK. Edited by W. JENKYN

THOMAS. With a coloured Frontispiece and about 200 Illustrations by WILLY POGANY. Small demy 6vo, 6s.

"Adults as well as young people will rejoice in the Welsh Fairy Book."—Atheneum.

THE ENCHANTED CASTLE. By E. NESBIT.

With 48 Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR. Large crown 8vo, 6s.

"We envy the child who is the recipient of a copy of this wholly charming book."—Outlook.

MILLY AND OLLY; or, a Holiday among the Mountains. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. With 40 Illustrations by WILLY POGANY. 6s.

"A better book of its kind could not be desired."—Manchester Guardian.

THE ADVENTURES OF A DODO. By G. E. FARROW,

Author of "The Wallypug of Why," &c. With 70 Illustrations by WILLY POGANY. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

"Mr. G. E. Farrow has not done anything better than "The Adventures of a Dodo" since he created that amusing monstrosity, 'The Wallypug.'"—Daily Graphic.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, LONDON.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

It seems almost a necessity for the writing of successful books for boys that the writer should himself have had an adventurous life. This was largely the secret of the popularity of two of the three authors mentioned in Stevenson's charming dedication of "Treasure Island" "to the hesitating purchaser." "Ballantyne the brave" spent six years in the service of the Hudson Bay Company, while the childhood of "Cooper of the wood and wave" was passed in an environment of forest, traders, and Indians, and in later years he shipped as a common sailor in the merchant service. We learn from "George Alfred Henty: The Story of an Active Life," by Mr. G. Manville Fenn (Blackie, 7s. 6d. net), that Henty's life was as varied and adventurous as those of his two popular predecessors, and indeed his powerful body and hardy air stamped him as a wanderer. He went from Cambridge to the Crimea as an officer in the Commissariat Department, and while there wrote a series of letters which were accepted by the editor of "The Morning Advertiser," who immediately asked Henty to represent his paper during the war. For the next twenty years he was engaged as war correspondent, gathering up a store of experiences which he afterwards turned to good account. He passed through the Italian war, and accompanied Garibaldi in the campaigns in the Tyrol; he took part in Napier's expedition to Magdala; he saw something of the Franco-German war and was in Paris at the time of the Commune; he was with Wolseley in the Ashanti campaign; saw the Carlist rising in Spain; and ended his work as a correspondent by describing the Turko-Servian war of 1876. From that date until his death in 1902 he produced eighty volumes of stories for boys—an average of more than three a year—and he found time for his favourite pursuit of yachting as well. Mr. Manville Fenn, who is himself a successful writer of stories for boys, has written a life of his old friend which every boy will like to read. In a pleasant appreciation of Henty's work he points out that Henty did a valuable service for the boy reader in throwing open for him the big doorway of history. "He would have accuracy if history had to be dealt with, and through all the years during which he was delving for new treasures in the lumber rooms or cellars of the past, he kept up his custom of carefully studying each phase or epoch before he commenced his romance or made ready his mould. He imbibed many tomes to make one." For many a boy history was first made living by such books as "The Cornet of Horse."

* * *

CAPTAIN F. A. DICKINSON is more practised in the use of the rifle and the camera than he is with the pen, and many passages in his book, "Big Game Shooting on the Equator," show signs of haste or carelessness. Perhaps by way of enlivening his pages he introduces a number of jokes, which are less likely to amuse most readers than to irritate them. At the same time, his book will prove useful to sportsmen who contemplate making an expedition in Equatorial East Africa. It contains descriptions of the game most likely to be met with, elephants, rhinoceros, hippopotami, giraffes, lions, buffaloes, antelopes, gazelles, &c., together with short accounts of their habits, and hints about the best methods of stalking them. There is also some useful advice on the necessary equipment, and the game regulations of the British and German East African Protectorates are given in an appendix. Captain Dickinson, while of opinion that the present international game laws are very good, thinks that a number of other animals might well be added to the list of prohibitions, or at least made more expensive to shoot. He also advises that the native hunters should be deprived of their licences and compelled to turn traders or become accredited shikaris to the white sportsmen. "They would then," he kindly says, "live a life of comparative ease in their master's camp, with the certainty of getting their pay at the end of the trip, and would be benefiting the white man into the bargain, which, when all is said and done, is the be-all and end-all of the black man." This is a theory largely held, but not often so frankly expressed, in Africa and elsewhere. Sir Charles Eliot contributes an introduction to the book, which has also a large number of illustrations from photographs.

FROM Anne Boleyn to "Edna Lyall" is a far cry, but Mrs. Aubrey Richardson manages to include both of them, as well as a host of others, in "Women of the Church of England" (Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net). Indeed, the chief fault of the book is that she has aimed at pressing too many figures into her pages. Catherine Macaulay, Elizabeth Carter, Maria Edgeworth, Jane Austen, and Charlotte Brontë, were all eminent women, but the first thing we think of in connection with any of them is scarcely their "churchwomanship." Why not have also included Mrs. Aphra Behn? However, despite her attempt to do too much, Mrs. Richardson has produced an admirable volume. The history of the Church of England has at many points, and usually for its good, been influenced by those whom Mr. G. W. Russell calls "Mothers in Israel," and Mrs. Richardson's roll-call of the English Churchwomen in five centuries brings this fact into prominence. A book of this nature requires above all things to be impartial, and this Mrs. Richardson shows herself even when dealing with such controversial periods as the Reformation, or the middle of the nineteenth century. Her book is an interesting record of the services which women have rendered to religion in this country, and an admirable portrait gallery of many of the worthiest names the English Church can boast.

* * *

THE history of a good many of the suppressed plates referred to in "Suppressed Plates" (Black, 10s. 6d. net), will be familiar to the collector of books, but Mr. G. S. Layard has unearthed several examples, information about which will be gratefully received. His selection has been made with laudable discretion, and the result is a pleasant, gossipy book which both the connoisseur and the layman may read with pleasure and profit. One should add, perhaps, that he does not confine himself to plates that were actually suppressed. There are instances given of those which, like Cruikshank's famous attack on the Duke of Cumberland in 1815, were suppressed in part only, while the last chapter goes so far outside the scope suggested by the title as to deal with palimpsests or plates that were adapted to a second use. The study of palimpsests, by the way, is a fascinating and amusing pursuit that may be commended to the bibliomaniac, who will find the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries rich in this class of plates. In regard to suppressed plates, the principal artists mentioned by Mr. Layard in this connection are Hogarth, Leech, Charles Keene, Cruikshank, and "Phiz," while his authors of course include Thackeray and Dickens. Thackeray's "Marquis of Steyne," the Buss plates to "Pickwick" which were discarded in favour of those of "Phiz," and Edwin Edwards' frontispiece for Omar Khayyam, are prominent among the examples dealt with. Leech's picture of Marion Jeddler eloping with Michael Warden, which still figures in Dickens' least-read book, "The Battle of Life," is an instance of a plate which was not suppressed but ought to have been—for the simple reason that the incident depicted does not take place in the text. It was "concluded" by Leech from a hasty perusal of the earlier pages. The "Danae" of Fred Sandys, which offended the moral susceptibilities of the editor of "Once a Week," and the illustration of "The Two Apprentices" in Du Maurier's "Trilby," which Whistler interpreted as a personal affront to himself, and which was cut out together with the corresponding textual affront—the character of Joe Sibley—are not less alluring because they are up-to-date instances.

* * *

ALTHOUGH the story of Maria Carolina of Naples is without the pathetic dignity that we associate with her more famous sister, Mrs. Bearne's book, "A Sister of Marie Antoinette" (Unwin, 10s. 6d. net), might have been made more interesting than it is. The book is mainly a compilation from the works of previous biographers of Maria Carolina, Mrs. Bearne's chief contribution being a violent hatred for all who took part in the popular side at the French Revolution. "Brutes and ruffians of infamous character and low, coarse manners," "scoundrels who were not only objectionable from their odious habits and customs, and as the suitable representatives of the gang of murderers their masters," "violent caitiff," "pestilent

Oxford University Press

THE OXFORD BOOK OF FRENCH VERSE.

Thirteenth Century to Nineteenth Century.

Chosen and Edited by ST. JOHN LUCAS. Fcap, 8vo. 6s. net; on Oxford India Paper, 7s. 6d. net.

Manchester Courier.—"This volume will make an ideal Christmas gift."

THE RISE OF THE GREEK EPIC.

Being a Course of Lectures delivered at Harvard University by GILBERT MURRAY. Demy 8vo, 6s. net.

Morning Post.—"Few books on ancient literature are more suggestive or more delightful than this."

HEINE'S BOOK OF SONGS.

Translated by J. TODHUNTER.—Extra Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net; on Oxford India Paper, 4s. 6d. net. (Oxford Library of Translations.)

Scotsman.—"In many of his renderings there is little loss of the charm peculiar to Heine's songs, and this little volume is proof of Dr. Todhunter's own scholarship and poetical talent as a worthy tribute to the great German singer."

THE WRITING OF ENGLISH.

By P. J. HARTOG, Academic Registrar of the University of London, with the assistance of Mrs. AMY H. LANGDON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Tribune.—"A most suggestive and encouraging little treatise."

A HISTORY OF MUSIC IN ENGLAND.

By Ernest Walker. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Standard.—"Dr. Walker's book is worthy in every way to rank as the standard work on a most important subject."

Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Caesar.

By T. RICE HOLMRS. 8vo, 21s. net.

THE POETS—GEOFFREY CHAUCER to ALFRED TENNYSON, 1340-1892.

Impressions by WILLIAM STEBBING. 2 vols. (not sold separately). Vol I. Chaucer—Burns; Vol. II. Wordsworth—Tennyson. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 8s. net. On Oxford India paper, in one vol., 10s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"Should be read with interest and sympathy by everyone who loves good poetry."

CAMPBELL'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS.

Edited by J. LOGIE ROBERTSON. Crown 8vo, from 3s. 6d.; on Oxford India paper, from 5s. (Oxford Poets Series.)

POEMS OF WILLIAM COLLINS.

Edited by CHRISTOPHER STONE. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; lambskin, thin boards, gilt extra, 3s. 6d. net. (Oxford Library of Prose and Poetry.)

THE WORLD'S CLASSICS.

Printed on ordinary or thin paper. Nearly 150 Volumes Now Ready. Cloth, 1s. net; Sultan-red leather, 1s. 6d. net; and in eight superior bindings.

PROSPECTUSES POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

London: HENRY FROWDE, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, E.C.

ROSSETTI FRA ANGELICO REMBRANDT BELLINI

The above are the new volumes
just published of

MASTERPIECES IN COLOUR.

The wonderful new series of volumes giving the great pictures in their full colours. Only 1s. 6d. net.

EVERY BOOKSELLER KEEPS THEM. The FAVOURITE CHRISTMAS GIFT FOR 1907.

Hundreds of Testimonials agree that the plates are marvellous.

ROMANCE OF HISTORY

A NEW SERIES
HISTORY FROM THE PICTURESQUE STANDPOINT
ILLUSTRATED IN COLOUR
THE FIRST VOL. READY—

THE NETHERLANDS

By MARY MACGREGOR, 6s. net.

Illustrated in colour by A. D. McCORMICK.

The Volume is uniform with CANADA in the "Romance of Empire" Series, which has been received with acclamation as a book for young people, full of fascination and instruction.

THE SEA-SHORE,

BY THEODORE WOOD.

Forty-eight Coloured Plates by J. H. KELMAN.

PREPARED SPECIALLY FOR CHILDREN.

THE CHEAPEST COLOUR BOOK PUBLISHED.

JUST READY, 2s. 6d. net.

The volume forms one of the "Shown to the Children" Series, which has become as popular as the "Told to the Children" Series, under the guidance of the same Editor, LOUEY CHISHOLM. The other volumes already published are—

BEASTS. Forty-eight Reproductions in full colours from Percy Billingham's drawings. Simple and extremely interesting text by Lena Dalkeith.

Miss Dalkeith is as lucid as Mr. Billingham.—Daily News.

BIRDS. Forty-eight Reproductions in Colours from J. A. Henderson's drawings (72 varieties). Text by M. L. C. Scott.

One of the best monographs on birds published for many a day.—Manchester Courier.

FLOWERS. Forty-eight Reproductions in Colours from J. H. Kelman's drawings (150 varieties).

Texts by C. E. Smith.

May be said to combine a school and country holiday between its covers.—The Bookman.

The volumes are prettily bound, 2s. 6d. net.

OLIVER CROMWELL

HAS BEEN ADDED TO THE SERIES CALLED

THE CHILDREN'S HEROES.

Edited By JOHN LANG, 1s. net, and 1s. 6d. net.

Each volume has 8 coloured pictures, by some well-known artist.

Bold type. Simple language. Beautiful bindings.

The Series is as popular as the "Told to the Children" Series.

"They will cultivate a taste for good literature and biography, and give untold pleasure to all young readers."—British Weekly.

"Bright reading and genuine entertainment."—The Bookman.

VOLUMES ALREADY ISSUED ARE:—

- | | |
|----------------------------|---------------------------|
| 1. David Livingstone. | 8. Lord Clive. |
| 2. Captain Cook. | 10. Christopher Columbus. |
| 3. Nelson. | 11. Stanley. |
| 4. Sir Walter Raleigh. | 12. Bishop Patteson. |
| 5. Chalmers of New Guinea. | 13. Robert the Bruce. |
| 6. Sir Francis Drake. | 14. Lord Roberts. |
| 7. General Gordon. | 15. Joan of Arc. |
| 8. Abraham Lincoln. | |

London: T. C. & E. C. JACK, 16, Henrietta Street, W.C.; and Edinburgh.

fellows," and "wretches now terrorising France," are a few flowers of speech to be found upon a single page. Apart from this invective the book is readable enough. In her earlier pages she gives some pleasant glimpses of the home life of Maria Theresa and her children at Schönbrunn and Vienna, and the account of Lady Hamilton's friendship with Maria Carolina, though it contains nothing new, presents Nelson's mistress in what we believe is a true light. Mrs. Bearne regards Maria Carolina as innocent of the worst crimes with which she has been charged, but when all is said she remains a hard, imperious, and vindictive figure upon the pages of history. The book contains a number of illustrations, many of them taken from interesting contemporary sources.

* * *

THE aim of "The Bible Beautiful," by Miss Estelle M. Hurl (Sisley, 7s. 6d. net), is to trace the development of Bible illustration from the rude frescoes of the catacombs to the work of such artists as Burne-Jones, Ary Scheffer, and Tissot. The plan was a good one, and Miss Hurl has carried it out well. She has been at pains to explain the symbolism of a great many of the pictures reproduced in the volume, and to find Biblical authority for many of the incidents described. Three useful appendices contain translations of some famous hymns of the Middle Ages, and other selections from medieval literature which are helpful towards an understanding of the pictures. The book is attractively turned out, and many of the illustrations are from pictures not commonly reproduced.

* * *

THE most attractive feature of "Sidelights on Chinese Life," by the Rev. J. MacGowan, of the London Missionary Society (Kegan Paul, 15s. net), consists in the illustrations, of which there are twelve beautifully reproduced in colour from pictures by Mr. Montague Smyth, together with a large number of photographs. Mr. MacGowan has little that is new to say about the Chinese. He repeats what may be found in a number of other books, such as the origin of the custom of binding girls' feet, the fortitude of the Chinese in bearing pain, their tenacity of purpose, their literary training, and the strange contradictions in their character. His chapter on the Chinese farmer opens up an interesting problem. The Chinese farmer, he says, is second to none in all the world, and yet it may be assumed as an undoubted fact that fully seven-tenths of the whole nation are in hopeless debt, from which they will never be able to release themselves as long as they live. This Mr. MacGowan sets down partly to the small size of the great mass of the farms, and partly to the readiness of the Chinese to borrow at ruinous rates of interest.

* * *

MR. STUART MASON has compiled "A Bibliography of The Poems of Oscar Wilde" (Grant Richards, 6s. net.). It gives particulars as to the original publication of each poem, with variations of readings, and a full list of all editions, reprints and translations, together with notes on the uncollected poems, a useful list of magazines containing contributions by Wilde, and a number of illustrations. We have also received a reprint of "The Fortnightly Review" article "The Soul of Man," which has just been issued by Mr. A. L. Humphreys (3s. 6d. net).

* * *

"THE POETICAL WORKS OF THE REV. H. F. LYTE" has been published in one volume by Mr. Elliot Stock (6s. net). Some of Lyte's hymns are among the most popular that have ever been written. "Abide With Me," "Pleasant are Thy Courts Above," and "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven," as well as a number of others, have a place in nearly every hymnal. His other poems, though not of high rank, have charm, and show delicacy of feeling and occasionally technical skill. His longest effort was "The Battle of Salamanca," which won the Chancellor's medal at Dublin University. Like many other writers of religious verse, Lyte attempted to render the Psalms into English metre, and his "Spirit of the Psalms" is a respectable performance. Many people will be glad to have his collected poems in this tastefully produced edition, to which there is prefixed a biographical sketch by the Rev. John Appleyard.

* * *

Two attractive books on Italy published by Messrs. Chatto & Windus are "Tuscan Feasts and Tuscan Friends"

(5s. net), by Miss Dorothy Neville Lees, and Professor Isidoro del Lungo's "Women of Florence" (7s. 6d. net), translated by Miss Mary C. Steegmann, with a preface by Dr. Guido Biagi. Miss Lees' volume consists of a number of impressions of Tuscany, its landscape and its people, simply told, and evidently the work of one who has thorough knowledge of her subject. The sketches of the lives of the peasants are full of charm. Professor del Lungo's book is a study of the social and political influence of women in medieval Florence. It grew, as Dr. Biagi tells us, out of a number of detached speeches, first delivered as mere academic orations and afterwards expanded into lectures. Its interest lies in the fact that it furnishes us with a number of domestic details usually not to be found in the works of historians, but necessary to a proper appreciation of Florentine history. Both books can be recommended, Miss Lees' as giving an interesting picture of everyday life in the Tuscany of to-day, Professor del Lungo's as supplying a number of vivid glimpses into the Florence of the past.

* * *

THE series of "Masterpieces in Colour" published by Messrs. Jack now includes "Reynolds" and "Velazquez," by Mr. S. L. Bensusan, "Turner" and "Romney," by Mr. Lewis Hind, and "Greuze," by Mrs. Eyre Macklin (1s. 6d. net each). They aim at giving a brief account of the work of each artist together with reproductions in colour of some of his most famous pictures. Judging from the volumes already issued the undertaking is likely to be successful. The publishers have chosen competent critics to write the essays which accompany the pictures, and the reproductions are the best we have seen in books published at anything like so low a price. The volume on Turner is particularly well done and contains some excellent examples of colour printing.

* * *

PROFESSOR WESTLAKE's important work on International Law, of which the first part "Peace," appeared in 1904, has now been completed by the publication of "Part II: War" (Cambridge University Press, 9s. net). The learned author most wisely delayed publication until he could complete his survey by a chapter on The Hague Conference of 1907, which will no doubt be extended and enlarged when a second edition becomes necessary. For a text-book Professor Westlake's book is perhaps rather too dogmatic, and for the general reader it is too concise. The author never allows himself elbow room. The long excursions of mixed history and argument which make Twiss and Halleck and Nys comparatively readable, are wanting in this hard and dry exposition. Nevertheless, Professor Westlake's treatise is of great value, for he is accurate, erudite, and acute. Perhaps the treatment of the proposal for exempting private property at sea from capture and destruction in time of war (the most unfortunate topic handled in the book) displays Professor Westlake at his worst. The interests of commerce and shipping, the opinions of economists, reformers, and statesmen, are ignored. A few pages of logic-chopping are all that seems to be required to erect such objections to the reform as will satisfy the crusted conservatism of the jurist and the natural dislike which every fighting man naturally entertains for anything that will hamper or limit his precious right to plunder and destroy.

* * *

AMONG the reprints of the week are Palgrave's "Golden Treasury," to which one hundred additional poems, including Fitzgerald's Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, have been added, and "The Poems of George Herbert," with an introduction by Mr. Arthur Waugh (Oxford University Press, 2s. each volume); Ruskin's "A Joy for Ever" and "The Two Paths," in The World's Classics (Oxford University Press, 1s. net); the fourth volume of Mr. G. A. Aitken's excellent edition of "The Spectator" and Browning's "Dramas and Dramatis Personæ" (Routledge, 1s. net each volume); a beautifully illustrated edition of "The Life of the Fields," by Richard Jefferies (Chatto & Windus, 5s. net); neat little copies of Fielding's "Voyage to Lisbon" and a selection from Froude's "Essays" (John Long, 6d. each volume); a second edition of Mr. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt's "Secret History of the English Occupation of Egypt," containing special appendices on controverted topics (Fisher Unwin, 15s. net); and the seventh edition, rewritten and revised, of Mr. Filson Young's "The Complete Motorist" (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net).

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

VOL. I. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Eversley Tennyson.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols., Vol. I. Poems. With Portrait. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

BY THE LATE LORD ACTON.

The History of Freedom,

AND OTHER ESSAYS. Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

Historical Essays and Studies.

Edited, with an Introduction by the same. 8vo, 10s. net.

LEAVES FROM THE NOTEBOOKS OF

Lady Dorothy Nevill.

Edited by RALPH NEVILL. With Portraits. 8vo, 15s. net.

William Allingham: A Diary.

Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and D. RADFORD. With Portraits in Photogravure. 8vo, 12s. net.

The Man-Eaters of Tsavo.

By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF

Thomas Henry Huxley.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net, also limp leather 3s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.]

Is Mars Habitable?

A Critical Examination of Professor Percival Lowell's Book, "Mars and its Canals," with an Alternative Explanation. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S. Extra Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Highways and Byways in Kent.

By WALTER JERROLD. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

Pall Mall Gazette:—"Mr. Jerrold and Mr. Thomson have given us something with which it will be very pleasant to spend some of the coming winter evenings. The illustrations alone are worth twice the money charged for the book."

Silas Marner.

By GEORGE ELIOT. With Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with gilt edges, 6s. [Cranford Series.]

Cranford.

With coloured Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Poetical Works of John Keats.

Edited with Introduction and Notes, by WILLIAM T. ARNOLD. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Also in limp leather, 5s. net. [The Globe Library.]

The Muse in Motley.

Poems by HARTLEY CARRICK, M.A. With a Foreword by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

MacMillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan.

Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Third Edition. With new Appendix (1907), 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., LONDON.

THE AUTOMOBILIST ABROAD.

By FRANCIS MILTOUN, Author of "Castles and Chateaux of Old Touraine," "Cathedrals of Northern France," &c. With Illustrations and Decorations by BLANCHE McMANUS, a number being in full Colour. 8vo, boxed, 10s. 6d. net.

PRANKS IN PROVENCE.

By PERCY WADHAM, A.R.E. With Cover Design by Cecil Aldin. Profusely Illustrated. 5s.

"This delightful volume . . . the pictures alone make it a desirable possession."—Literary World.

A MIRROR OF FOLLY.

By HAROLD WINTLE. 6s.

"A powerful novel of modern society."—Spectator

"Admirable indeed—an entertaining novel."—Daily Chronicle.

SI MIHI?

By "EGOMET," Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

A volume of thoughtful, personal essays, by a new writer of very considerable promise.

NINEVEH AND OTHER POEMS.

By GEORGE SYLVESTER VIERECK. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 5s. net.

Mr. Vierck is a poet who will have to be reckoned with seriously. The son of a German father and an American mother, he has "listened to the music of two worlds." This volume is his introduction to English readers.

The following books by E. H. LACON WATSON:

CHRISTOPHER DEANE. A Story of Life at Winchester and Cambridge. 3s. 6d.

HINTS TO YOUNG AUTHORS. 2s.

THE BARONY OF BRENDON. 6s.

THE MAKING OF A MAN. 6s.

THE TEMPLARS. 6s.

REFLECTIONS OF A HOUSEHOLDER. 3s. 6d. cloth, 4s. 6d. limp leather.

BROWN, LANGHAM & Co. LTD.

NEW VOLUME OF

MASTERS' "GREAT CHURCHMEN" SERIES, 3s. 6d. each.

WILLIAM LAUD.

By the Rev. W. L. MACKINTOSH, M.A.

ALREADY ISSUED.

RICHARD HOOKER.

By Very Rev. VERNON STALEY.

RECOLLECTIONS AND LETTERS OF THE REV. W. H. E. MCNIGHT. By his Niece, EDITH THOMPSON.

"It was well that the story of this brave, clear-seeing, and energetic cleric should be put into print."—Glasgow Herald.

PLAYMATES: or Studies in Child Life.

By Rev. H. MAYNARD SMITH, M.A. Author of "In Play-time," and "Church Teaching at Home." Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 2s. 6d. net.

SUNDAY EVENINGS WITH THE Children. By Rev. W. J. FERRAR, M.A., Vicar of St. Philip's, Bethnal Green, E. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 1s. 6d. net.

A BOOK ON MODERNISM.

FUNDAMENTAL CHRISTIANITY:

An Essay on the Essentials of the Christian Faith. By BARTON R. V. MILLS M.A. Limp cloth, 1s. net.

BY THEIR FRUITS.

Daily Readings of the Thoughts of Others on "The Fruits of the Spirit." Selected and arranged by ELIZABETH SNUSHALL, with a Preface by the Hon. and Rev. JAMES ADDERLEY, Vicar of Saltley. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 2s. 6d.

DEVOTIONAL GLEANINGS FROM THE

Writings of the late CANON CARTER. 2s.; leather, 2s. 6d.

This collection of Canon Carter's prayers has been compiled from various sources. The larger number of these consists of the very beautiful devotional perorations with which he so often ended his sermons and spiritual instructions.

NEW AND REVISED EDITION.

THE BEAUTIFUL FACE.

A Tale. By ELIZABETH HARCOURT MITCHELL. 3s. 6d.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PRÆPARATIO."

With Preface by the Rev. GEORGE CONGREVE, of the Society of St. John the Evangelist.

A DAY-BOOK OF SHORT READINGS.

For Use by Busy People. Advent to Trinity and Trinity to Advent. 2 vols., crown 8vo, cloth gilt, each sold separately, 6s. net each.

"We are inclined to think the volume before us the very best we have met with. To each day is given two pages of full and sober Catholic doctrine, closing up with an 'analysis' of the reading, a summing-up of the reading for the memory to dwell upon during the day. We have examined it carefully and are able thus to recommend it."—Church Times.

MASTERS & CO., 78, New Bond Street, London, W.

The Week in the City.

THE last week of November and the first week of December, though marked by a few disagreeable incidents in America and Germany, showed a distinct recovery in the stock markets, and the American list especially gained substantially all along the line. The recovery, I think, originated in a pretty general belief that the premium on currency was about to vanish, and that the New York banks would revert in a few days to cash payments. Unfortunately, the effect on sentiment produced by the Government's relief plan has not lasted, and neither the enlargement of the bank note issues nor the importations of gold have been sufficient to displace the de facto currency of depreciated cheque notes based on inconvertible clearing-house certificates. This week, therefore, has been one of reaction and anxiety. The New York Press is at its wits' end to explain why all its hopeful prophecies have been disappointed. It is now only too clear that from a currency and banking point of view the panic and crisis of 1907 will prove to have been more widespread and incurable than any of its predecessors. Alike in scale and duration, this catastrophe surpasses anything of the kind that we have seen in modern times.

NEW LIGHT FROM WALL STREET.

An interesting letter from a New York broker was quoted in the "Times" City article of Tuesday, which not only threw the blame on the financial magnates, but also threw doubt upon their present solvency. I am told that the writer is a man of the highest character, as well as of undoubted knowledge and sagacity—of which, indeed, the letter leaves no room for doubt—and if he be correct, it is difficult to put any limit to the sensational developments which may be in store for New York. I advise those who are interested in the matter to read the following quotation very carefully:—

"Up to seven years ago Wall Street and the Stock Exchange were synonymous terms, but since then a higher atmosphere of finance has been created, in which our great financial leaders lived and had their being. They looked down upon the Stock Exchange and its denizens as an inferior order. This country, and probably the world at large, does not realise that such a higher atmosphere has been established, and they attribute our present condition entirely to the Stock Exchange part of Wall Street. This is a great mistake. So far as the Stock Exchange is concerned, we have had the most drastic liquidation there during the past year that any class of business ever suffered, until I think it is safe to say that loans of New York banks to Stock Exchange houses are not 20 per cent. of what they were three years ago, and the constant wonder of us poor benighted Stock Exchange people is that, notwithstanding the enormous liquidation we have suffered, and the enormous amount of loans we have paid off, the aggregate loans of the New York banks have never been reduced. The conclusion is irresistible that the Stock Exchange has been looted for the benefit of those who live in the higher atmosphere, and that it is loans to this class which the banks cannot collect that has brought them to suspension, and until these loans are liquidated, there cannot be any solid foundation upon which to base a new era of expansion."

Thus the abuse of credit has brought all kinds of American businesses on to a sort of cash or paper currency basis. The New York broker is naturally alarmed at the immediate prospect, though he has "unbounded confidence in the ultimate solvency of this country and the good sense of the people." But in the meantime, and for the moment, if all classes of businesses have to suffer such a contraction as Wall Street, no one can estimate how low the value of securities may sink. "Everybody who is in debt now is in danger, and it does not make much difference how many securities or what assets he has. Individuals and corporations must sacrifice their securities and their assets to pay maturing obligations." He fears "many failures and much real suffering before the turn comes."

THE POSITION TO-DAY.

The apprehensions excited by this letter are not allayed by the latest telegrams. The premium on currency has been higher than a fortnight ago. The reports of the New York City Banks, published on Tuesday, in response to a summons issued by the Comptroller of the Currency, "revealed a heavy impairment of resources in the case of one or two establishments on which the pressure has been specially severe." There is talk of "consolidating" these weaker brethren. A flutter has also been caused by a rumour that the State Banking Department is about to issue a call for reports from the State banks and trust companies. It would seem that the authorities are beginning to feel that public confidence in the sound banks can only be established by an inquiry which will reveal the weakness of the unsound ones and result in their elimination. It is to be feared, therefore, that a considerable crop of failures and suspensions is in prospect before any return to cash payments can be announced by the solvent institutions.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

Happily here at home trade remains wonderfully good in spite of dear money, but the prospect of the 7 per cent. bank rate lasting over Christmas is decidedly alarming. It will certainly mean the reduction of many dividends, especially in merchant businesses which depend so much on cheap money. The Board of Trade returns for November prove that business is as active as last year, and, though the profits of the manufacturers may be less, the wages of the work-people are more. Fortunately, the prices of commodities as shown by the index number are still falling. I should fear that the December returns will show a set back; but we may be thankful that the country is so well off compared with the United States and Germany. But how will the Tariff Reformers explain this puzzle?

LUCELLUM.

CLOISTRAL MUSIC.*

WOULD the monk, whose ideal of earthly felicity was "in angello cum libello," in "Hoexkens ende Boexkens," "a little book in a little nook," have called this fascinating octavo a little book? Mr. Montmorency has here grouped together the various forces, religious, political, and literary, that were responsible for the appearance of the "Imitatio Christi"—that aloe flower produced by centuries of bitter devotional introspection. The compiler assumes, and gives detailed reasons for the assumption, that Thomas Haemerlein, of Kempen, who died at the age of ninety on July 26th, 1471, at the close of a long summer day, after compline, was the author. Many of the curious woodcuts and pages of original manuscripts are here admirably depicted by the aid of photography. We are shown a mine of information about a little treatise known as "Musica Ecclesiastica," a name derived from the cadence of the text, and the canor or divine music that sustained this prince of mystics. Thomas did not expect rest or peace in life; therefore, says his biographer, he found it. One of the most interesting chapters is entitled not the "contents," but "the Content of Imagination." Souls very diverse indeed from that of Haemerlein have been touched to finer issues by the perusal of his little book. Mr. Montmorency reminds us how this "cloistral music" appealed to Thackeray, Carlyle, Comte, Gladstone, Renan, George Eliot, and, above all, to Matthew Arnold. The importance of the work on our days, when undeniably a wave of mysticism is passing over Europe and America, is well put by the author in the following lucid and suggestive extract:—

"The age of Thomas à Kempis was one of contrasts, vivid and significant. On the one hand we see atheism avowed and shameless; on the other an intensity of belief that would seem to make reasonable doubt poor and naked. We see a visible Church, claiming to base its authority on its corporate position, its immense wealth, and its immemorial traditions. We see, in fact, that it is supported by an invisible Church, which preserved the faith that alone makes the existence of a Church tolerable. . . . Mysticism is now as widespread, as deep-rooted, as when Gerson and Haemerlein taught and thought. Europe, and the Churches of Europe, have before them much the same problem that was before them in the fifteenth century. How will they solve it? Will practical mysticism conquer once more, as it conquered four centuries ago? Will all-prevailing Doubt take the place of the unwavering Faith that alone rendered modern Europe possible?"

Mr. Montmorency's scholarly volume ought to send all lovers of the "Imitatio Christi" back to their old favourite with increased zest and enlarged minds. The problem of its authorship has aroused a controversial bitterness very alien from the sweetness of the book. People have squabbled over the writer's identity, and forfeited his unmistakable message of inward peace. "Tolle, lege!"

* "Thomas à Kempis: His Age and Book." By J. E. G. de Montmorency, LL.B. With twenty-two illustrations. Methuen. 7s. 6d.

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears

Omar Khayyam (modernised).

is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

John Player & Sons,
Nottingham, will forward
Testing Samples
post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0442

MAPLE & CO

ARE SPECIALISTS
FOR COMFORTABLE

CLUB & LOUNGE CHAIRS & SETTEES

Inspection invited, or Illustrated
Catalogue of Chairs sent free

LARGEST STOCK IN THE WORLD

LONDON PARIS BUENOS AIRES

L. & N. W. R.

CHRISTMAS & NEW YEAR EXCURSIONS

FROM

Euston

and other London Stations

TO	DATE
IRELAND - - - -	Dec. 23
SCOTLAND (including Carlisle) - - - -	Dec. 24 & 31
Liverpool, Manchester, Blackpool, English Lakes, and Leeds Districts -	Dec. 23 & 24
Bolton, Blackburn, Colne, &c., and North Stafford- shire District - - -	Dec. 24
North, South, and Central Wales and Cambrian Lines - - - -	Dec. 24
Birmingham District -	Dec. 24 & 26

For full information and particulars of Local Excursions obtain Pamphlet at any of the Company's Stations or Town Offices, or write to the Enquiry Office, Euston Station, London, N.W.

FREDERICK HARRISON,

December, 1907.

General Manager.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

VISIT CALIFORNIA

THE LAND OF SUNSHINE, FRUIT, AND FLOWERS,

And Travel
by the Southern Pacific Company's Routes.

luxurious trains leave New York and New Orleans daily, provided with Dining, Sleeping, Observation Cars, etc.
MAGNIFICENT NEW PASSENGER STEAMSHIPS, 10,000 tons, leave New York for New Orleans
weekly, offering a delightful route between those Cities. THROUGH TICKETS issued.

Apply, RUD FALCK, General European Agent, Southern Pacific Co.
LONDON: 49, Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 22, Cockspur Street, S.W. LIVERPOOL: 25 Water Street

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Telephone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,

CATALOGUES
POST FREE.

Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible."

CASH DISCOUNT,
3d. IN 1s.

"Lectern Lesson Book," "Priest's Pocket Bible," "Daily Service Book," &c.

Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE!

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

BOOKS.—A Catalogue of finely printed modern Books, choice editions, limited issues and large paper copies, post free on receipt of p.c.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.

CHOICE BOOKS

are presents which give the most lasting pleasure.

The book-lover will find a mine of wealth in rare and choice editions in my Xmas Catalogue, sent free on request.

FRANK HOLLINGS, Great Turnstile, Holborn.

APPOINTMENT.Darlington Training College.

LECTURER IN ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Wanted in January a RESIDENT GOVERNESS to teach English Literature. Salary, according to qualifications, from £80 to £110, with lodgings, board and washing. Application forms, which should be returned on or before December 19th, may be obtained from "The Principal."

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.*C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.*LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road.

Miss Tye.

Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.THE HOTEL METROPOLE.

E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL.

H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.ST. ANN'S HOTEL.

First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.THE TORS HOTEL.

Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.BEACH HOUSE HOTEL.

S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.DELLERS CAFE.

Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.THE WHITE HART HOTEL.

Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street.

Wm. Russell.

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.CLEVELAND HOTEL.

J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill.

C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.THE PRINCES CAFE.

Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL.

Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.GOODBODY'S CAFES.

And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.SPEEDWELL HOTEL.

A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence.

Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL.

Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of an ASSISTANT MISTRESS to teach Experimental Science and Botany, at the Eltham Secondary School for Girls. The person appointed will be required to commence work after Easter, or, if possible, earlier.

The commencing salary will be £120 a year, rising by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than the minimum stated above will be allowed if the successful applicant has had satisfactory teaching experience.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, London County Council Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, January 13th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME.

Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,

Victoria Embankment, W.C.

December 12th, 1907.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Camb.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.

Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.

Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.

Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER,
B.A., Camb.

CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

NEW YEAR GIFTS

Are much Needed by The ORPHAN WORKING SCHOOL and ALEXANDRA ORPHANAGE,

Which provides a Home and Education for 500 Fatherless Children.

Founded 1758. HAVERSTOCK HILL, LONDON, N.W.

Patrons: His Majesty The King.

H.M. Queen Alexandra

SUPPORTED BY VOLUNTARY CONTRIBUTIONS.

An annual subscription of One Guinea entitles to two votes at each Half-yearly Election. Information will be gladly given by the Secretary, to whom contributions should be sent.

Bankers: THE LONDON JOINT STOCK BANK, Princes Street, E.C.

ALEXANDRA GRANT, Secretary.

Office:—73, Cheapside, London, E.C.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

MR. ALSTON RIVERS' LIST OF XMAS BOOKS AND OTHER OF HIS SUCCESSFUL PUBLICATIONS

THOMAS HOOD: HIS LIFE AND TIMES

By WALTER JERROLD, WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS, INCLUDING TWO IN COLOUR AND A PHOTOGRAVURE FRONTISPIECE. DEMY 8VO, GILT TOP, 16s. NET.

"It is one of the many merits of Mr. Walter Jerrold's new 'Life of Thomas Hood' that he tries to recover for us the conception of a serious poet, whose true fame was obscured by the excellence of his fun. Many other points deserving of notice stand out in the latest biography, making it a valuable contribution to literature."—Daily Telegraph. "It has remained for Mr. Walter Jerrold to give the subject the research necessary for an adequate Biography."—Daily News. "The present work should afford a solid foundation for a Hood Revival."—Tribune. "There is no better book on him than this."—Scotsman. "Has rendered a real service to literature in his handsome tribute to the memory of one of the bravest and wittiest spirits of his time."—Dundee Courier.

THE HUMAN HARVEST

By DAVID STARR JORDAN. IMPERIAL 16MO, 2s. NET.

It demonstrates that far greater attention is paid by leading Scientists across the Atlantic to the maintenance of physical efficiency than on this side, and deals with military selection and its effects.

THE BOOK OF LIVING POETS

EDITED BY WALTER JERROLD, ARTISTICALLY BOUND, 7s. 6d. NET.

A dainty volume of special interest, since it contains selections from the work of our leading contemporary poets.

SOME CHILDREN'S GIFT BOOKS.

SARAH THE VALIANT

By THEODORA WILSON WILSON, AUTHOR OF "THE MAGIC JUJUBES," ETC., WITH EIGHT SUPERB ILLUSTRATIONS. 3s. 6d.

"A girl's story which we can confidently recommend."—Liverpool Courier.

THE ZOO: A SCAMPER

By WALTER EMANUEL, WITH FIFTY ILLUSTRATIONS BY JOHN HASSALL. 1s. NET.

"Full of laughter from cover to cover. . . The fun never flags for a moment."—Westminster Gazette. "A source of infinite delight to childhood and old age, and all that lies between."—Punch. "Probably one of the most successful picture books of the season."—Daily Graphic. "There is humour on every page, laughter in every drawing."—Daily Telegraph.

THE TRUANT FIVE.

By RAYMOND JACBERNS, AUTHOR OF "THE NEW PUPIL," ETC., WITH SIX STRIKING ILLUSTRATIONS. 3s. 6d.

"A very fresh, natural, and wholesome tale for young people."—Church Times.

ONE DAY A GIPSY;

OR THE LITTLE GIRL WHO WANTED TO SEE PETER PAN. A CHILDREN'S PLAY IN FOUR ACTS BY GEORGETTE AGNEW; SET TO MUSIC BY PHILIP LESLIE AGNEW. Fcap, 4to. 3s. 6d.

"Another great attraction from this house is 'One Day a Gipsy.' . . . A dainty little effort and should be popular in many Theatres Royal Back Drawing Room this Christmas says the Standard.

SOME SUCCESSFUL NOVELS.

FURZE THE CRUEL.

By JOHN TREVENA, AUTHOR OF "A PIXY IN PETTICOATS," ETC. THIRD IMPRESSION. 6s.

"An elaborate picture of rural Devonshire life. . . . A powerful and certainly an extremely conscientious piece of work."—Daily Telegraph. "One of the most vivid and powerful books of recent years."—The Bystander. "Is undoubtedly a great book."—The Academy. "Zola might have written 'Furze the Cruel,' had he been an Englishman."—Glasgow Evening Citizen.

THE MEDDLER.

By H. DE VERE STACKPOOLE AND W. A. BRYCE. ILLUSTRATED. 6s.

"One of the best humorous yarns we have met for a long time."—Daily Chronicle. "It would make an owl grin."—Dundee Courier. "A farce which, so to speak, rolls the reader on the floor and hilariously thumps him."—Daily Graphic.

THE LORD OF LATIMER STREET.

By JANE WARDLE, AUTHOR OF "THE ARTISTIC TEMPERAMENT." 6s.

"Enhances the author's already high reputation."—Tribune. "Certainly fiction of an high and unusual order."—Morning Leader. "New and noteworthy novel."—Manchester Guardian. "A thoroughly entertaining story."—Reader. "A jolly and human book, and we are glad to have read it."—Morning Post.

MR. MEYER'S PUPIL.

By EVA LATHBURY. WITH SUPERB COLOURED FRONTISPIECE. SECOND IMPRESSION. 6s.

"Bright, lively, and distinctly original."—Daily Telegraph. "As clever and brightly written a story as we have read for a long time."—Daily Mail. "An abundance of wit and in the prettiest vein of light comedy."—Sunday Times.

THE ADVENTURES OF COUNT O'CONNOR

IN THE DOMINIONS OF THE GREAT MOGUL. EDITED BY HENRY STACE. 6s.

"He is gifted with a vivid imagination, a good literary style, and humour."—Glasgow Herald. "Remarkably bright and vivacious."—Standard. "An abundance of adventures for readers who like to hear of hairbreadth 'scapes in picturesque surroundings."—Daily Telegraph.

ALSTON RIVERS, LTD., CHATTERTON HOUSE,
BROOKE STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C.

The Nation

Vol. II., No. 12.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	417	Crime and Punishment. By Tighe Hopkins	435
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		The Noise Nuisance. By Frederick Verney, M.P.	436
The Real Enemies of Liberalism	420	Hood's Poetry. By C. E. Maurice	436
Mr. Haldane's Ideas	421	The Entente in Forestry. By Charles Hancock, B.L.	436
London and Its Unfed Children	422	Japan in Korea. By Saul Sang Lee and James Hunchu Song	436
The Law Court as a Theatre	423	"The Ruin of Macedonia." By A. P. Irby	437
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Poor Law and Old Age Pensions. By Canon Arthur W. Jephson	437
The Successor of Newton	425	Cattle Driving. By "Onelately returned from Ireland"	438
The Diary of a Revolution	426	The House of Lords and the Referendum. By G. L. Bruce	438
The Lights	427	POETRY:—
SHORT STORY:—		Mary at Dawn: A Christmas Song. By L. Studdiford McChesney	438
Sarah Bennet's Possession. By W. F. Harvey	428	REVIEWS:—
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	430	The Bishop of the Revolution	439
Books to be Read	430	Robert and Clara Schumann	440
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		The Priest as Biographer	440
An Order of India. By Henry W. Nevins	431	A Social Diary	441
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		The Virgin Birth	442
The Helpers	432	To-Morrow in the East	443
MUSIC:—		NOVEL OF THE WEEK	444
Bach's Mass in B Minor	433	BOOKS IN BRIEF	446
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		THE WEEK IN THE CITY	448
The Size and Cost of the Fleet. By "Retrenchment"	434
The Decline of the Oxford Movement. By G. K. Chesterton and "A Reader"	434

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

WE understand that there is no truth in the suggestion that the Prime Minister's state of health is such as to suggest the desirability of his taking a Peerage and conducting the Government from the House of Lords, a position from which, it is unnecessary to say, it is impossible to conduct any Liberal Government. The story would seem to be a revival of the proposal made on the formation of the Government that Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman should go to the Peers, instead of remaining in his natural place as the Leader of the House of Commons.

* * *

WE hear that the predominant Protectionist Party in the Opposition considers that Mr. Balfour's speech at Birmingham finally commits him, not merely to their view of the economic question, but to a repudiation of the Free Trade section of the Party. They insist that while Mr. Balfour, in his public speeches and in his more confidential remarks at the smoking concert, deprecated a form of excommunication of the Free Trade section, he insisted that it was time for these gentlemen to come into line with the general body of the Party, or to suffer the consequences. This would necessarily imply the exclusion of all Free Trade candidates from Tory or Unionist platforms at the next election. The question is, how many of the Free Trade Unionists are now ready to lay down their arms, as at Birmingham they were practically required to do, and on what terms their surrender will take place? We believe that the Protectionists count confidently upon securing Lord St. Aldwyn and Lord Londonderry. They think the former would be ready to adopt, say, a 5 per cent. tariff directed against foreign goods. Lord Londonderry, while refusing to support taxes on imported food, is quite willing to erect a low tariff wall against the foreigner. Lord Robert Cecil has already yielded half the Free Trade case, and Lord Hugh Cecil belongs to a family which has never led forlorn hopes. The Protectionist Party, therefore, considers the battle with Free Trade in the ranks of the Unionist body at an end, and Mr. Balfour to be definitely and finally their captive.

* * *

MR. HALDANE has made a series of speeches, partly in promotion of his army scheme and partly as a contribution to general politics. We comment elsewhere on these latter pronouncements, which include an extraordinary revival of Jacobite doctrine (or shall we say a mixed Hobbes-and-Hegel doctrine?) concerning the Monarchy. Mr. Haldane stated at Hampstead on Saturday week that the King possessed under the Constitution a power of initiative, and that "the better, the greater the sovereign, the more initiative could he and did he show, his greatness consisting in the knowledge of how to adequately interpret the wishes and the spirit of his people." In this sentence Mr. Haldane seems to us to commit an almost equal outrage on the English Constitution and the English language. He went on to say that among the King's many gifts his "great quality was capacity for taking the initiative and acting in complete harmony, not only with his Ministers, but with Parliament and the people." He further reiterated that the Constitution gave "freedom of initiative to the man who knew how to identify himself with the whole and the whole with himself," while mere "general decisions" were reserved to Parliament.

* * *

WE note that the important correspondent, "Civis," in the "Times," declares with truth that this speech reaffirms Bolingbroke's famous doctrine of the "patriot King," and that by the universal consent of our Constitutional writers, ending with Mr. Haldane's colleague in the Cabinet, Mr. John Morley, the theory of "initiative" violates the fundamental principles of English liberty, based as they are on the responsibility of Ministers, and sets up pure "absolutism." This is our own contention in an article written before the letter of "Civis" appeared. We are bound to say that Mr. Haldane's speech creates a strange situation. Unless his Constitutional doctrine is disavowed, we do not see how he can feel happy in a Liberal Cabinet.

* * *

THE American Fleet, consisting of sixteen great battleships, divided into two squadrons of four divisions, steamed out of Chesapeake Bay in single file on Monday last. The imposing procession was headed by the President's yacht, "The Mayflower." Mr. Roosevelt took formal farewell of the officers, but a more meaning demonstration awaits it on its arrival at its new headquarters on the Pacific coast. The Asiatic Exclusion Leagues are organising and extending their influence, and the greeting to the navy will give an immense stimulus to the anti-Chinese and anti-Japanese movements in the Pacific sea-board. A national character is now to be given to the dangerous and determined local organisations, and America will be fortunate if physical attacks on Oriental immigrants are avoided. These the Federal Power will be powerless to stay, while it cannot avoid responsibility for them.

* * *

THE Church of England has called in the lawyers to help her to contract out of any obligations to the State which she may have incidentally acknowledged in the conduct of her training colleges for teachers. The question whether the Trust Deeds of these colleges permitted the introduction of students as to whose religious faith no questions were asked, either as day students or as residents in hostels and boarding-houses, was submitted to three eminent counsel, the first of whom was Sir Robert Finlay. The answers, which are very elaborate and apply specifically to many colleges, justify the practical exclusion of all non-Anglican students save as day students, in whose behalf no extra expense has been incurred. All non-Anglican occupants of hostels or boarding-houses on which money—in the main public money, be it noted—has been expended, are liable to exclusion, on the ground that such expenditure is in the nature of a breach of trust. The Primate, in making this announcement to Mr. McKenna, also forwards him a batch of resolutions passed at the Training College Conference, declining to comply with the August regulations of the Board of Education, and therefore allocating public funds to private and sectarian uses. Under these circumstances, Mr. McKenna has only one course to follow. That is to procure the withdrawal of these funds, and to leave the Church to maintain her "doctrine and discipline" out of her own purse.

* * *

SIR EDWARD GREY and Mr. Asquith, speaking on Thursday, both tendered strong support to Mr. Birrell in his refusal to take a step on the road to coercion. Both declared, in almost identical terms, that his policy in this respect was the policy of the entire Cabinet. Mr. Asquith added that cattle-driving should and must be put down, for it was "reprehensible and unpatriotic," but that he did not believe that it was approved by any "responsible" Irish leader, "lay or clerical." Sir Edward Grey emphasised the old Liberal doctrine that the aim of government in Ireland was to increase "the sense of responsibility in the people themselves," and that coercion weakened it.

* * *

SIR EDWARD GREY spoke moderately on foreign affairs. He saw no reason even in the German programme, impelling us to rush into fresh naval expenditure, though we might be unable to continue to reduce it. The cost of armaments was one of the most serious of European questions, but we would not go further than other nations. He declared for complete reliance on the European Concert for the settlement of Macedonia, and described the effect of the Anglo-Russian Convention as a check on a forward frontier policy, and on forcible British and Russian intervention in the domestic affairs of Persia.

* * *

LORD KELVIN died on Tuesday at his house at Largs, at the patriarchal age of 83. We describe his place in the world of science elsewhere; here it is enough to chronicle his honours. The son of a Professor of Mathematics at Glasgow, William Thomson associated that city with some of the greatest achievements of modern science. He held his own professorship for 53 years, within which period he had almost filled the world with his inventions, had enormously advanced our knowledge of the laws of heat and motion, had made ocean telegraphy possible, and had given new life to the study of applied mathematics. His material rewards were a peerage and the Order of Merit, combined with many distinctions to which foreign nations and academies contributed. He united a closely observant and highly practical genius with full control of what has been called the "scientific imagination." He was a man of great simplicity of mind and habit. Perhaps the least successful part of his wonderful life was his work as a lecturer. He is to be buried in Westminster Abbey.

* * *

An obscure and as yet undecided crisis has broken out in Persia. The Shah, whose attitude towards the Constitution, despite the fact that he has four times sworn to observe it, is undoubtedly hostile, dismissed the democratic Cabinet, and arrested its chief members. The Premier, Nasir-el-Mulk, who wears a British decoration, was rescued from violent vengeance by the British Legation, which suggested exile as a compromise. Meantime, the Parliament, sitting in permanence, demanded explanations from the Shah. His followers gathered in the square before the Palace, while the democratic party entrenched itself round Parliament House. The latter appears to be the more numerous and determined, and the Shah shows signs of yielding. The ex-Premier's banishment has already been cancelled. The Shah is evidently too weak to carry out a coup d'état. But he is obviously strong enough to frustrate the Parliament, and it is difficult to see how, after this abortive conspiracy, they can hereafter trust him. It is no doubt the fear of provoking foreign intervention which prevents them from deposing him. Early in the week an ominous communiqué announced that Russia and Great Britain were concerting measures to deal with the crisis. Later a more reassuring statement has disclaimed any thought of armed intervention.

* * *

THE Government having been asked to appoint a clergyman of marked characteristics to the Bishopric of Chichester has replied by appointing a gentleman of no special characteristic at all. Dr. Ridgeway, the Dean of Carlisle, and brother of the Bishop of Kensington and of Sir West Ridgeway, is a man of judgment and of moderation in temper, and he is known as a preacher, safe rather than brilliant, to a large West End parish. He has no literary record, and the plausible object of the appointment to a diocese like that of Chichester is to secure a conciliating force in a district where the High Church movement is aggressive and is fiercely opposed.

* * *

THE reaction is running its disastrous course in Russia, and Finland is likely to be the next scene of its exploits. A former lieutenant of the terrible General Bobrikoff, a certain General Seyn, has been sent there as Governor. The dismissal of the sympathetic Governor, M. Gerhardt, is said to be imminent, and his successor is likely to be some violent reactionary, like General Reinbot or General Kaulbars. In the present temper of the people resistance is probable. We discuss elsewhere the heavy sentences passed after a mere form of "trial" on the Social Democratic members of the Second Duma. Three notable personalities have been seized this week. Professor Michael Anitchkoff, a distinguished Sociologist who has lectured in Oxford and published a notable book in English, entitled "War and Labour," has been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment; the veteran Socialist leaders, pioneers of the "To the People" movement, Madame Breshkowsky and Nicholas Tchaykowsky, are now in the "St. Peter and Paul" fortress. The fact that the latter, an exile long residence in England, has many connections among English and American literary men will, we hope, suggest to M. Stolypin the wisdom of avoiding extremes of vengeance.

* * *

THE Roumanian Parliament is now considering important agrarian reforms. Some two-fifths of the total cultivated area belongs to small proprietors; but nearly half is owned by large landlords, frequently absentees, who let their land to middlemen—generally Jews financed from Galicia. The peasants' methods of tillage being primitive, they must supplement their incomes either by renting and working more land or by agricultural labour on the large estates. The contracts are made in the winter, when their stock of food is running short, and they will agree to any terms to get an advance. The middlemen's oppression of them led to the fierce revolt of last spring: and the Liberal Ministry, which took office when the peasants were believed to be marching on Bucharest, has now submitted its scheme. A central purchase fund is to aid existing Land Banks: peasants' associations are to be set up to facilitate land-purchase—with a special provision against sub-division below five hectares (about twelve acres): communal pastures are to be provided: district committees, representing employers, labourers, and the Government, are to fix the terms of labour contracts, including a local minimum wage: and perambulating courts are to see that the terms are kept. No middleman is to hold for sub-letting more than 4,000 hectares (about 10,000 acres)—a provision easily evaded—and, in case of further disturbances, the village public-houses are to be municipalised. This hits the Jews hard, and may, therefore, be popular, but the landlord party predict compulsory purchase, and denounce this, and the proposed interference with free contract, as Socialism, just as if they were English or Scottish. They suggest improved agricultural education, with prizes for new crops—which are not likely to be won by peasants. And, as the compensation to be awarded for damage during the revolt is limited to 15,000,000 francs, and given only as an act of grace, opposition is not likely to abate.

* * *

THE trial of Robert Wood for the murder of Emily Dimmock ended on Wednesday night in a verdict of not guilty. This was inevitable, for the case for the prosecution, which the Judge described as based on circumstance and suspicion rather than direct proof, broke down or weakened at nearly every point. No evidence associated him with the murdered woman during the hours of the morning when she met her fate, and his own alibi, sworn to by his father and brothers and strengthened by a respectable witness, accounted for his movements between his leaving her company and midnight. On the other hand, his identification with the man supposed to have been seen in St. Paul's Road in the morning hours was destroyed in cross-examination. The remains of the charred letter found in the fireplace could only have shown a closer personal acquaintance than Wood admitted, even had the hostile reading of it by Sir Charles Mathews been free from doubt. The prisoner showed extreme coolness and resource in the witness box, and declared that he felt no fear during the trial. The ineffectiveness of the case and, we are bound to add, its sensational conduct by the Crown turned this unpleasant young man into a popular hero, and an enormous crowd welcomed the verdict of acquittal, and might have torn the hostile witnesses in pieces had he been condemned to die. The prisoner, who had sketched the Judge while the jury were deliberating, himself led the cheers which it raised for his brilliant counsel, Mr. Hall. He also gave Mr. Hall Caine his signature on a copy of the "charred letter." Such incidents are, we think, unprecedented in criminal trials.

* * *

LORD CURZON unveiled a monument to Clive in Merchant Taylors' School on Saturday, and delivered a panegyric of the hero of Arcot and Plassey. Clive was a master-spirit among men, raised above the common surge of humanity, as a lighthouse is raised above the waves of the sea. He had all the qualities of a great commander of men, and he founded both our military Empire in India and its Civil Service. Lord Curzon followed in Clive's case the line of unqualified eulogy which Lord Rosebery lately applied to a less attractive Empire-builder. His trickery of Omichand was justified by necessity, and the fact that without it the British cause in India would have failed. Is that also an excuse for Clive's acceptance of bribery? And are great and attractive human figures, like Clive and Nelson, made to live in the imaginations of men by the process of describing their faults as virtues?

MUCH ill-informed talk is at present afloat as to the deterrent effect of heavy penalties in cases of serious crime. In last week's "Spectator" we have this fallacy treated as if it were an established axiom. We are assured that "the fear of heavy penalties is often the exact deterrent which he (the criminal) requires to dissuade him from seizing sudden opportunities for evil." As to the truth of this, let us consult the official criminal returns and not our own a priori suppositions. Commenting in 1895 on the decrease of crime the returns say that "this remarkable decrease goes on pari passu with a still further reduction in the length of sentences." If heavy penalties are such a deterrent, lighter penalties must be a corresponding incentive. But so far from this being the case, lighter penalties are accompanied by a decrease of crime. Here is another instance from the last issued criminal returns. Sentences to penal servitude of ten years and over in the year 1905 "were not one-fifth the proportion of what they were in 1883." This decrease of long sentences has been accompanied by a great diminution in the number of persons tried for indictable or serious crimes. In 1881-5 the annual proportion of persons tried for serious offences amounted to 225 per 100,000 of the population; in 1901-5 the number had decreased to 175 per 100,000 of the population. Facts of this kind, drawn from official sources, utterly destroy preconceived theories. Another fallacy is that capital punishment for murder is in this country an inexorable law. As a matter of fact, for the last ten years at least, of the number of criminals sentenced to death for murder, little more than one-half were actually hanged. How does the theory of the inexorability of capital punishment stand in face of a fact like this?

* * *

ON Wednesday Professors Hobhouse and Westermarck delivered their inaugural addresses as occupants of the new Chairs of Sociology in the University of London. The establishment of these chairs—the first University recognition of the study of Sociology—marks an important educational advance. It is true that most people have slight ideas of what subjects may be, or rather may not be, included in the domain of sociology, but Professor Westermarck's lecture on "Sociology as a University Study" did something not only to define the subject, but to show its practical utility. His remarks upon the amazing ignorance of the customs of non-European peoples shown by those sent to rule over them were particularly well-timed. Professor Hobhouse dealt with the roots of modern sociology—political philosophy, the philosophy of history, the growth of the sciences such as biology, and specialisations within the field of sociology itself, such as economics and modern anthropology. He claimed that the comparative method in the study of jurisprudence, religion, and ethics had furnished sociologists with a new set of data. We regret that these lectures have been given only meagre reports in the daily newspapers.

* * *

THE first of the test matches in Australia has been won by the Commonwealth, after a battle fought with great stubbornness. Australia's first innings, and England's second both yielded 300 runs, and Australia had to make 274 runs in order to win. This they did, for the most part on a fairly good wicket, with two men to spare. The English eleven had the best of the weather, but only one of its players, Gunn, who was a mere chance addition to its strength, played a first-rate game at the wickets. Australia showed greater grip and coolness, but the game is not decisive of merit, for the English captain, Mr. Jones, who is probably the best living leader of an eleven, and one of the two or three best living cricketers, was absent.

Politics and Affairs.

THE REAL ENEMIES OF LIBERALISM.

IF, as seems probable, the Miners' Federation will decide to join the Labour Party, how will the result affect Liberalism? Nominally, there will be a transfer of a number of votes to a party which is really independent, and sometimes really hostile. Certainly it is of real moment that the Government should be confronted with an independent party sixty strong in the House of Commons, and, by every reasonable calculation, far stronger, proportionately, in the electorate. On the face of the facts, the situation might seem to be one of no small danger to the future of Liberalism. But those who look below the surface, whether they regard the actual play of forces in the House of Commons, or whatever they consider the basic social principles to which progressive parties, under whatever name, are bound to appeal, will, we think, recognise that the new situation is one which a Liberalism that is resolutely led, and has faith in itself, can face with perfect confidence. On the one hand, the accession of new and larger forces to its ranks means moderation and responsibility within the Labour Party itself. As its numbers grow, and its weight in the counsels of the nation increases, the new party will more and more dissociate itself from the mere wrecking measures which naturally appeal to those who know themselves to be a hopeless minority. The advocacy of extremes for the mere fun of the thing will be dismissed for the childishness it really is, and the party as a whole will settle down to the more prosaic but more useful work in which its best leaders have long shown themselves to be skilled hands, of making the best of the political world as it is, of discovering in every relation not merely the best ideally, but the best that can be obtained, of working with those who are prepared to work with them, and reserving their denunciations for those who are resolute in opposition.

If, indeed, the opposition between Labour and Liberalism were rooted in the nature of things, these considerations could hardly console us. But we have never believed this to be the true line of cleavage in politics. The Labour representative may hold what academic views he pleases about the nationalisation of the means of production; but while he is practically working for old-age pensions, for the taxation of site values, for the feeding of school children, for the abolition of religious tests, for the reduction of extravagant military expenditure, for a more humane and just Colonial and foreign policy, he is, for all Liberals who put the ends of politics above the means, not the enemy but the friend in need. He is the ally against that devitalised Liberalism which is hypnotised by society, paralysed by the officialism of the circumlocution office, cowed by the social prestige and long political preponderance of the routed enemy on the Bench opposite. The standing problem of democratic politics in England is to overcome the vast forces, economic and social, rather than political, which support the rule of class and of wealth. These forces meet us, first in the constituencies, where they at least call themselves by their right name—Conservatism. But when the battle is won in the electorate, it is renewed in the clubs and drawing-rooms, in the editor's study, and the Government offices. Triumphant democracy is attacked in detail. The new Minister, fresh from his pledges to the constituency, or on fire with great purposes of social amelioration, is confronted with the bland immovability, the urbane incredulity, of a type of permanent official. All his pet theories, he finds, have long since been examined and exploded by this courteous and deferential encyclopædia. His most cherished scheme is to be found, dusty with age but neatly docketed, in the pigeon-hole of discarded plans. His nominal subordinate politely disbelieves that he can mean anything so absurd, and points out that such extravagances may be pardonable in men like So-and-So—his pet enemy—who will never attain to Cabinet rank. But a man like the new Minister, with his solid powers, his judgment, his discrimination, will readily see the overwhelming practical objections to anything which—though this, of course, is phrased differently—will jolt the official machine out of its comfortable rut. The result is fore-ordained. The Permanent official retires to his arm-chair, permitting a slight smile to flicker about his lips, and murmuring, "I have seen four-and-twenty leaders of revolts." The leader of men, the champion of forlorn hopes, the apostle of social enthusiasm, issues from his office a converted being. He returns to his constituents "a practical man," the exponent of the judicious and the tentative, the austere censor of young persons with enthusiasms.

In the House of Commons, confronted with the awful presences of Mr. Balfour and Mr. Chaplin, men who so long held sway and still form an imposing row as they sit by Mr. Arnold-Forster and Mr. Walter Long on the Front Opposition Bench, he assumes an humble, almost an apologetic, attitude. He pleads for recognition, as one of their order, and justifies himself by the very modest character of his proposals. Some Bill he must bring in, something must be done to gratify the rank and file—that, surely, Mr. Balfour will remember from his own experiences. But his proposal makes the very least change possible. The concession to the democracy is the smallest that can be made. Expenditure has, perhaps, been cut down, but the amount is really trifling, and Mr. Arnold-Forster may fairly be asked to overlook a merely nominal fulfilment of an election pledge. Something must be done for the unemployed in a world of unreasoning sentimentalists; but it shall be nothing that the Charity Organisation Society can seriously condemn. Old-Age Pensions have a force behind them that a Cabinet Minister cannot wholly disregard. But what is contemplated is really nothing but a slight modification of the Poor Law. It has been promised by an oversight, which shall not occur again, and the promise shall be fulfilled in the way which will give the very minimum of annoyance to gentlemen opposite. Perish the whole poor of England rather than cut a single gilt button off the uniform of a single Grenadier Guard.

For our part we see no reason for the apologetic tone and the minimising expressions used by exponents of democratic measures. We believe that those who employ them misread the signs of the times. "Society" still controls the Government offices, the Press, and the clubs, and through these engenders a specious public opinion which by no means represents the real tendency of feeling among the masses. This feeling is far more clearly shown at the by-elections, and the evidence of these elections is that the movement is not towards more conservatism, but towards more democracy. Public opinion demands organic social changes, and, to take a single example, the more it is told of any scheme of Old-Age Pensions that what is intended is very modest and very tentative, and will effect very little, the less it is inclined to respond with enthusiasm. The result is that the real forces on which Liberalism rests are dispersed. The keenness is chilled, and indifference, like a dewless night, descends upon a Party which can only maintain itself against contact with social pressure by strong and living convictions. It is this mood, not the advance of Labour, which is the real danger to Liberalism. If the Party will shake itself out of this doubting attitude and throw itself whole-heartedly on the real forces making for democratic progress, if it will show itself not as hampering and minimising, but as leading and urging on the course of social advance, there need be no fear for the future of Liberalism.

MR. HALDANE'S IDEAS.

MR. HALDANE's personality is certainly one of the most interesting, if not the most attractive, in our politics. It is many-sided, and it is picturesque. A citizen of the modern world, Mr. Haldane also suggests, intellectually and physically, some high-placed Abbé of the eighteenth century, a sinuous, bustling, many-sided figure, who played at Versailles the agreeably varied parts of courtier, churchman, statesman, and man of pleasure. Mr. Haldane has even the churchman's traditional gift of utterance, and that, we know, is a fluent rather than a precise and illuminating form of speech. If he is not an orator, he is a talker of the type which many Englishmen like and are accustomed to admire, and if he has as yet accomplished no great thing, he has undeniable powers of work. They enable him to combine the pursuit of politics, law, metaphysics, and society, and to dazzle a world not over-given to strenuousness with a sense of ease and brilliancy of accomplishment, of a genial, smooth, and adroit personality, good-tempered and pleasantly cynical, after the Palmerstonian fashion, and playing in a masterful way with a great variety of subjects. Not that Mr. Haldane's ideas are strikingly original. His philosophy at least is old; his Imperialism is certainly not new; part of his Army Scheme seems to date from before the times of James the Second.

But the immediate question is whether Mr. Haldane's ideas are Liberal and Radical ideas. Some of them at least are undeniably German; others strike us as almost Jacobite. Mr. Haldane seems to us to figure English society of the future as organised on some new model of German efficiency, and at the same time retaining, and even extending, the domain of regal and aristocratic privilege, the machinery of class distinctions, the luxury of habit, that characterise it to-day. The monarchy plays a considerable part in these sketch-plans of Mr. Haldane. It was a little surprising to find the King advised to lay on the shoulders of the Lords-Lieutenant, by way of personal speech and contact, duties and responsibilities that can only be attached to them by Act of Parliament. But Mr. Haldane proceeded on Saturday to speak of the Monarchy in terms which might have been applied with some point to the Kaiser, but were out of place as a description of an English King. One hardly knows whether to regard this as serious constitutional doctrine or merely a dexterous revival of the almost lost art of the courtier. If the former, we think that Mr. Haldane's resignation is due to his colleagues and to the Liberal Party; if the latter, we think that flattery so gross ill accords with the position of an English Constitutional Minister. Mr. Haldane informed us in his speech at Hampstead that the greater the Sovereign the greater the initiative he could and did show, "this greatness consisting in the knowledge how adequately to interpret the wishes and the spirit of his people." We should have said that "initiative" was the very power which the Constitution denied to the King and reserved to his Ministry, and that the "harmony" between the two Powers, of which Mr. Haldane spoke, depended on the extent to which the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament veiled the acts and will of the Monarch, and gave him a security that no King, with a Sovereign Parliament such as ours, could obtain without it. It is indeed no kindness to an excellent, and we should say, most impartial Monarch, to credit him with powers which he does not possess, and acts—such as the settlement of the railway dispute, that we saw attributed to him the other day in more than one newspaper—with which he has had no concern.

Mr. Haldane's ideas of constitutionalism are strange enough, but his theories of Imperial defence are of more immediate import, and in this connection we must say at once that we are unable to reconcile the speeches of the heads of the two departments of War with the defined and accredited policy of the Government as a whole. Lord Tweedmouth tells us that we must have no "cheese-paring" with the Navy. We hope that Lord Tweedmouth does not mean by this loose phrase that there are to be no economies in the service. If he does, he places himself in conflict with Sir John Fisher, who has assured us that large economies are both possible and proper. But Mr. Haldane opens a still more forbidding prospect. For he tells us that the time may come when we may not be able to maintain the two-Power standard of strength for the Navy, when, indeed, we can no longer depend "wholly and absolutely" on naval strength, and must look for defence from invasion to some such land force as his Territorial Army provides. Mr. Haldane does not tell us what are the grounds for this suggestion of an unfavourable position for the British Power. They cannot be diplomatic, for our relations with all the rival sea-Powers of the world but one—with Japan, France, Italy, and the United States—are relations either of actual alliance, cemented by military conventions, or of close friendliness, based on definite understandings and exchanges of views. These trifling matters, these moral re-arrangements of national forces, appear to be above the notice of a Liberal statesman. But Mr. Haldane's reasons for expecting a decline in British sea-power are remarkable, for he discovers a connection between it and population. Taking the two most progressive populations among our rivals in sea-force—those of Germany and of the United States—he asks how we, with a population of forty-four millions, can hope to maintain a two-Power standard against a combined mass of 160 millions.

On this argument, or implied argument, we have some criticisms to make. The first is—what connection is there between sea-power and population? Has Mr. Haldane heard of Athens and of Holland? Does he consider that their sea-power was in proportion to their population? Or what connection had the sea-power of Spain with its population? On Mr. Haldane's theory the great sea-Power of the modern world ought to be not Great Britain or Japan, but China. In fact, we all know that a large number of elements, moral and material, enter into sea-power, which Mr. Haldane has not even considered—such as the character and wealth of a people, the extent of its sea-board, its position on the map, the developments of its trade, and the course taken by the ever-shifting currents of world-commerce. But we have a more serious quarrel with Mr. Haldane on his general theory of home defence. Hitherto, as the "Morning Post" points out, he has been in explicit agreement with the memorable speech in which Mr. Balfour, speaking as Prime Minister and Chairman of the Committee of Imperial Defence, adopted, in the main, the conclusions of the "Blue-Water School," and accepted the guardianship of the Fleet as the supreme, and virtually the only, guarantee of the safety of these shores from invasion. Who can doubt such a conclusion? A land force might, indeed, prolong the struggle for a few weeks after the supremacy of the Navy on the seas had been broken down, but it would be fighting for a starving people and for a lost cause. No contribution to such an issue could be made by Mr. Haldane's territorial levies, whether it took six months to fit them for service against Continental troops or whether it took six days. Mr. Haldane talks easily about the possibilities of a "lodgment" on these shores. The last "lodgment" took place, for the nation's good, in 1688, when the wind, which then governed the motion and fate of ships, was all against the defending fleet, and all for the invading one; and when the invader was fully conscious of the fact, and based all his plans on his knowledge of it, that three-fourths of the nation were on his side. How do these conditions apply to such an invasion as Mr. Haldane projects, and how, so long as British policy remains as unaggressive as it is to-day, and her sea-power as intact as all reasonable citizens desire it to be, can a statesman who calls himself a Liberal raise such phantoms of the imagination, and give them such unseemly shape?

LONDON AND ITS UNFED CHILDREN.

NEARLY a year ago a Bill became law which designed to place upon a scientific basis the treatment in the elementary schools of necessitous children. That Act definitely established a certain position. Public money could be spent, at the demand of the local authority, upon the provision of kitchen, canteen, cooking utensils, and all the apparatus for the feeding of children who were prepared to pay for the cost of the food. Charity—if it pleased—could pay this cost instead of the individual parent. A special section of the Act decided that, where charity proved inadequate and necessitous children existed, the cost of the food could be found from public funds. A special rate could be levied, which in no case was to exceed a halfpenny in the pound. The original Bill, as drafted, allowed this rate to be levied in specially necessitous areas. That definition would have excluded London and other wealthy centres from its operations. It was changed in Parliament to empower the rate in districts where there are necessitous children. The definition of such children is an elastic one. It does not define them as "starving" or as "hungry." It does not limit its scope—as some witnesses before the Select Committee desired—to children who are necessitous "through no fault of their parents." It includes within its operations the child who is habitually underfed or wrongly fed, as well as the child faced with sudden complete privation. It includes the child of the drunkard and the wastrel, as well as the child of the decent unemployed. It empowers the local authority to feed all children who, by reason of their ill-nourished condition, are unable to obtain that advantage from the education they are receiving which otherwise they might enjoy. It does not propose, however, to stop at that promiscuous feeding of good and bad alike. After feeding, it designs investigation. A complete machinery is established for pursuing the indifferent and criminal parent. While looking to a far more complete apparatus of food supply than that previously provided by charity, it desires to eliminate that worst feature of modern charitable effort, which so often, in its blindness, fills the rich with good things and sends the hungry empty away.

The Act was fought by a small but energetic company, through all-night sittings, as the thin end of the wedge of Socialism. Feed any child out of the municipal funds, it was said, and you must feed all children out of the municipal funds. Charitable aid and rate-aid cannot live amicably side by side. It is probable that the promoters of the Act were under no delusion in this matter. It was necessary to suggest that charity should continue to contribute, lest charity should prove indignant at being rudely thrust aside. But all experience demonstrates that immediately public funds are called in, or may be called in, the flow of charitable bequest automatically ceases. Men realise that they are no longer contributing for direct philanthropy. They are contributing to prevent the levying of a rate. They are contributing, that is to say, in order to relieve the lesser burden which might fall on their immediate neighbours. The resident in one house of a terrace gives his subscription in order that all the other residents in that terrace may be excused. It is impossible to arouse enthusiasm in such a cause. The fact was demonstrated by the similar transformation in the case of the unemployed. Considerable sums were advanced by the charitable each year until the Unemployed Act was passed. That Act levied a halfpenny rate for machinery and organisation. Immediately the supply of charitable funds ceased. The Act itself lay derelict until a sensational appeal from the Queen to the Empire as a whole brought a spasmodic and substantial response. Such an appeal could not be repeated. The following year it was necessary to vote a national grant to keep the Act working. The same transition is inevitable in the case of the children. It is inevitable, but those who dislike it struggle against it with some vigour; and in the intervening time are responsible for a considerable amount of remediable suffering. The majority of local authorities, which include poor districts within their boundaries, have decided to adopt the Act, and to work it efficiently. Eighteen of the big cities, including Birmingham, Manchester, Norwich, Sheffield, and Brighton, have already commenced operations. Others are applying to the Board of Education for permission to begin. None of these are Socialistic Town Councils, and many would have preferred to retain the old system. But they recognise the intention of Parliament on the matter. The question of large policy is not a matter for the municipality. The wisdom or unwisdom of the free feeding of children is a national question. To the municipality belongs the humbler task of deciding whether any children in its schools are necessitous, within the definition of the Act. If so, its duty is to feed them—either at the expense of charity or at the expense of municipal funds.

In this progress one municipality has held stubbornly aloof. It is the one in which this question is probably of more importance than in all the rest combined. London, the centre of the greatest aggregate of wealth in Europe, is also the centre of the greatest aggregate of poverty. In the evidence tendered concerning underfed children before, first, the Committee on Physical Deterioration, and later the Select Committee upon this particular Bill, more than three-quarters of the evidence of pressing need came from London. Here, if anywhere, the Act should have been worked to the limits of its powers. It is not a city which need cry out at the incidence of a halfpenny rate; not a poverty city like West Ham, its less fortunate neighbour, staggering under impossible accumulations of low-grade life. The London County Council this week refused to apply for the levying of the rate or any portion of it. It is resisting the adoption of the Act on a point of policy, while declaring that its resistance is established on a point of fact. The policy is the disapproval of municipal expenditure for the provision of food for necessitous children. The fact affirmed is that there are no children in the schools of the "necessitous" character defined by the clauses of the Act; or that charity is proving, or could prove (with suitably worded appeal), adequate to their satisfactory treatment. A few weeks ago such an appeal was issued by the Chairman of the London County Council. It alternately cajoled and threatened: cajoled in the name of the starving children, threatened (as an alternative to subscription) the imposition of a halfpenny rate. The demand was for fifteen thousand pounds; the response was less than a hundred and fifty. Official statistics, received from the various elementary schools of London, have revealed the complete collapse of the charitable system. The head teachers were asked to name the total of necessitous children, the total of children receiving meals, the number of meals supplied. The results are almost farcical in their revelation of inadequacy. One school in Bethnal Green revealed 152 necessitous children, of whom 61 children were being "fed"—one meal a week: starvation mitigated once in seven days by one crowded hour of glorious soup and pudding. Another showed 168 necessitous children, with no feeding at all for them; another 180, in similar condition; another 338. Large numbers revealed the provision of meals one, two, or three days a week. Upon the general total received up to date over six thousand children are returned as necessitous with no provision of any kind for meals for them. The percentage of necessitous who are being fed has slightly risen in the latest weekly returns; but at the same time the number of meals given per child has decreased; showing that the teachers are not receiving more bread-and-butter, but trying to cut it thinner in order to make it go further round. Councillors are moved to tears by stories of children who faint (during the Bible lesson!) for lack of food; or mothers who write to ask if their children can go home early because they have at last earned sixpence and now can provide them with a meal. But to those with imagination sufficient to convert dispassionate statistics into terms of flesh and blood, these aggregates of thousands will tell a story more eloquent than any of those specific cases of misery which alone can stimulate the dulled mind of apathy.

The children will, of course, be fed. The newspapers are taking up the question. There is talk of further charitable appeals, of a Mansion House Fund, of various persons in exalted places coming to assistance with eloquent appeal. It cannot be sufficiently emphasised, however, that those who contribute to such funds are in reality contributing to the maintenance of the less satisfactory system which is doomed to eventual extinction. It might be better indeed that the children to-day should suffer and starve for a time, if alone by their suffering and starvation can the welfare of their successors be guaranteed. Our method of dealing with necessitous children has long been a disgrace to our civilisation. A thousand competing churches and charities have each issued their plaintive appeals. A thousand tiny random and competing organisations have distributed their contributions in random and careless fashion. Sometimes the children of cunning parents, themselves eluding the responsibilities of labour, will obtain five or six substantial meals a day, while beside them the children of hard-working and decent poor are starving in silent misery. Some boil up soup in disused chapels. Some fling the children tickets for fragments of fried fish negotiable at tiny and horrible fried fish shops. Some leave the children to devour the food provided like wild beasts in the public streets. The spectacle of these coagulations of starved and stunted children being fed in squalid and dolorous surroundings is a spectacle which excites disgust as well as compassion. From all this dreary chaos the Provision of Meals Act is designed to lift the unfortunate children. It sets itself to teach manners as well as meals; to provide food in clean and orderly fashion; to prevent overlapping; to pursue the whining vagabond who dispatches his children hungry to school while he sleeps off the effects of his drunken orgy; to seek out those reluctant cases which to-day do nothing to proclaim their poverty and only reveal themselves when the child physically collapses for lack of food. In conjunction with the Medical Inspection which comes into force next January, it provides a physical Charter for the children of the poorest classes in England. If worked for a generation fairly and energetically, it should transform the whole condition of our slum areas, and produce an historic effect upon the problem of the unemployed and unemployable. In face of such opportunity, the delay which may be caused by some struggling stupidities, some imperfect and unequal charity, is a delay which is evidence less of human indifference than of human folly.

THE LAW COURT AS A THEATRE.

It is disconcerting to serious people—people who are chiefly interested, let us say, in religion, philanthropy, politics, or art—to reflect, as they must reflect, that there are three questions in which nine out of ten Londoners have interested themselves during the last week.

The first is, "Will the Druce grave be opened?" the second, "Will Wood be acquitted of the Camden Town murder?" the third, "Which eleven will win the Test Match?" Two of these questions have been answered; when the third has been settled, millions of our fellow-citizens will feel that their zest in life has sensibly abated. This is not surprising. Crime, Mystery, and Sport represent three enduring attractions for human nature in the state which we call civilisation. All suggest the unknown, the problematical, what the painter calls the "clear-obscure." Two of them reveal the under-world, the world where men and women live secretly instead of openly, and defy either the law or the acknowledged code of morals, or both. Social observers go down into this dim existence, and bring up specimens of its population for examination under the social microscope. Missionaries try to reform it. But for the most part we leave it to the police. Not even the broad humanity of Christian teaching stimulates the respectable world thoroughly to explore the depths of city poverty and vice, or to afford them substantial relief.

All the more necessary therefore is it, when some serious crime drags the people of the under-world into the light, that the serious person should scrutinise the forms of society that prevail there, and the means which the law adopts for dealing with them. Unfortunately, the whole atmosphere of the Law Courts, when these exciting and mysterious cases appear in them, is charged with sensationalism. We have not quite attained to the theatricality of the Court at Monaco engaged in trying the Gooids, where the judge allowed a photographer to open the proceedings with a flashlight, and an entreaty to the audience, including the prisoners, to look cheerful—"Messieurs, le sourire, s'il vous plait." But we are not far behind. The authorities of the Courts both in the Camden Town and the Druce trials opened it to all sorts of celebrities—literary, social, theatrical. Wood was permitted to sketch the Judge who was trying him for murder from the dock during the moments when the jury were deciding his fate. By some means, which we hope did not imply the connivance of the police or the prison authorities, he was allowed to send some of these sketches to newspapers of the Harmsworth type. These newspapers, again, took a leading part in the disclosure of evidence. They were actually allowed to print facsimiles of the incriminating postcard. They published minute descriptions of the prisoner, that were read by witnesses who were asked to identify him. So far as in them lay, they soaked the air with their impressions of the case, now with prejudice against the prisoner, now with hints and suggestions in his favour. This levity and irresponsibility were carried into the trial. Many of the witnesses revealed a tone of extreme callousness. One low man, fresh from a prison cell, made a joke about the police. Everybody in court laughed. The judge laughed, too. The man whose evidence looked at one time like hanging the prisoner seemed quite indifferent to its bearing. The prisoner appeared the most insensible of all. He greeted his friends in Court with a nod or a wave or his arms, and talked like a descriptive reporter. He pencilled a sketch of an actress who had smiled at him, and wrote underneath: "Miss ——— favours with a smile."

It is unfortunate that the Crown itself failed to supply an adequate measure of dignity and restraint to the trial. There are some features about every public prosecution which strike us as of a doubtful character—the engagement of high professional skill in a criminal trial against the prisoner, leaving him to take his chance of engaging a defender of equal merit, the virtual forcing of the accused person into the witness-box, and the giving of the last word to the prosecuting barrister. But if these features are to stand and the State is to intervene as a hostile force, that force must surely be used in moderation. But how was the case against Wood organised and set up? If he himself is a witness of truth, the police committed perjury, the dreadful kind of perjury which puts into the mouth of the suspected man phrases that, in their very vagueness and double meaning, suggest guilt. But even if the evidence of the police were true in substance, their method of collecting it was open to grave question. One witness who identified Wood stated that he had just seen another witness go up and shake hands with him. Another—a criminal under sentence—stated that the police threatened him and "frightened him to death" when they took him from his cell and asked for a statement. Hardly less objectionable was the carelessness with which the hostile evidence was constructed and interpreted. The special correspondent of the "Daily News" noted that the identification of McGowan pointed to a big man, with broad shoulders, a man with a marked walk, and a man who wore a dark overcoat. It was presently proved that Wood's overcoat was a light one, that he was slight in build, and that his walk was quite normal. It may be true that the prosecution abated its tone as its case fell to pieces. But its earliest line, the way in which it dragged its ragged regiment of witnesses from the slums, the pot-houses, and even the prisons, reflected gravely on the discretion and humanity of its conductors. There is no greater danger to a State than an untrustworthy police service, and we think it high time for the Government to take account of the recurring evidence of its demoralisation. Furthermore, we are convinced that much of the morbid excitement that hangs round a trial like that of Wood arises from the fact that it is, in truth, a kind of game, a game played for a human being's life. This, again, makes against a trial in a judicial—i.e., a fair and calm—atmosphere. In the Wood case everybody knew that if the prisoner were convicted, he must, like the wretched girl he was accused of killing, die a violent and sensational death, and as the belief in his innocence grew, he became a kind of popular hero. Public opinion, which in the end governs the workings of criminal law, roughly intervened. The tone of some of the less reputable of the Crown witnesses was resented, and they and others, whose evidence was probably fair, were threatened, and even visited with physical violence. Anonymous letters poured into the Court, and the Judge was unable to repress them, or to control the action of the turbulent crowds in the streets. A kind of mob law prevailed, whipped up by the sensational reports of the trial, and threatening an actual outbreak in the event of a verdict hostile to the prisoner. These things suggest that a revision of the law of punishment for homicide is wise in itself, and that it would act as a preventive of the growing theatricality of our criminal courts, and a sedative to the hysterical passions that they foster.

Life and Letters.

THE SUCCESSOR OF NEWTON.

WHEN at the beginning of the twentieth century we find ourselves, even in England, assailed by the demands of various obsolete systems of thought, which were supposed to have been buried three or four hundred years ago, and when, moreover, we find these demands very largely conceded by the people, we are compelled to ask ourselves whether the astonishing progress of scientific discovery has produced any effect whatever on the mind of the average man or woman. Does the great stream of science flow by in a narrow channel, leaving its environment absolutely untouched and dry? Innumerable instances might be cited to justify a pessimistic answer to the question. But the death of Lord Kelvin shows very clearly that such an answer is far from the truth. There was not a respectable newspaper in England which on Wednesday last did not treat the departure of this great man as the chief event of the day in the world's history; all the ordinary items of news, the doings of kings, and the commotions of politics, were shown in their essential littleness when compared with the achievements of a great man of science.

To find the intellectual equal of Lord Kelvin, we must go back to Newton and Galileo; and it is beside them that he will take his place in history. Yet a comparison between these great ones is a matter of extreme difficulty. Newton was enabled to start at a point farther on the road of science than Galileo, and Kelvin at a point still more in advance of Newton's. We must remember that when Galileo started, the science of Force, commonly called Mechanics, can scarcely be said to have begun its existence: he had to create its beginnings. Beyond the work of Galileo, Newton found little to hand except the observations of Kepler on the motions of planets round the sun—observations unconnected together, and unaccounted for by any law; haphazard phenomena, as it were, although discovered by marvellous care and pertinacity. From these Newton divined the science of Dynamics, reducing them to order, and showing their connections in the work which is probably the greatest construction of the human mind, "The Mathematical Principles of Natural Philosophy," commonly called "The Principia." This work, considering the enormous field of knowledge which it created, might well have been the labour of many men of genius working for more than a century. Our wonder at Newton's achievement is greatly increased if we reflect that almost nothing can now be done in mathematical physics without the aid of the calculus, and Newton had to invent this himself, as a weapon for attacking the problems of Nature, presented in celestial mechanics and optics. Well, indeed, did he merit the splendid epitaph accorded to him by Pope:—

"Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night:
God said, Let Newton be!—and all was light."

All was not light, however. When Newton went, "The Mathematical Principles" remained, but the "Natural Philosophy" disappeared. Thus fared "The Principia" for a time. The man who had once more to join mathematics to the actual phenomena of experience, and to use it again as a means of investigating, interpreting, and even discovering, the phenomena and secrets of Nature had yet to appear; and he appeared in William Thomson. The "Natural Philosophy," or applied mathematics, which succeeded Newton as the expression of the principles of the "Principia" was, at any rate in England, very largely of a hopeless kind: it expressed itself in the form of the typical Cambridge problem of three generations back, and even at the present day it is not extinct. The usual humorous illustration of this kind of applied mathematics which in the same problem postulates "a heavy fly of weight W and an elephant whose weight may be neglected," is not a very great exaggeration. To this kind of thought the work of Lord Kelvin dealt a deadly blow; and if we were asked to state in a few words his distinctively great work, we should reply that he re-joined the principles of mathematics and the realities of Nature. At the same time he extended enormously the field of investigation. Newton had applied his mathematics mainly to the motions of large celestial bodies, although he worked also among the corpuscles which he supposed to be the cause of light; Kelvin, too, worked in both fields, but his mathematics revelled among the atoms, the magnets, and the currents and oscillations of electricity.

The first work of Lord Kelvin that appealed to popular recognition was done in connection with the early Atlantic cables. It might seem at first sight to the general reader that, once the mechanical difficulties of laying down a cable across the bed of a deep ocean were overcome, the sending of a current, and therefore of messages, to America, must follow just as easily as if we were telegraphing through an overhead wire to Edinburgh from London; but it is not so. Airy, the Astronomer Royal, who had already lost for England the sole credit of deducing the existence of the planet Neptune from mathematics, said that no cable could be laid across the Atlantic: Thomson was of a different opinion, and the cable was laid. This cable soon failed, for reasons which had nothing to do with those alleged by Airy, and which are of too technical a nature to be explained here. Speaking generally, the difficulty of sending a current of electricity along a submarine cable compares with that of sending one along an overhead wire pretty much as the sending of a stream of water along a canal which has a large number of side outlets compares with the sending of a stream along the same channel devoid of all such outlets. The first is a slower process than the second. Thomson was the first to investigate the laws which govern the passage of an electric current along an ocean cable; he traced the whole history of the electric wave from the moment at which it was sent into the cable by the telegraph operator who depressed the key, to the instant at which it was received in America. He showed that, for the purpose of our being able to send anything like twenty words per minute, the receiver must be content with the very feeble current which first reaches him, without waiting even during the fraction of a second required for the current to reach him at full strength. This, of course, necessitated the use of a very delicate receiving instrument, and, more than this, the sweeping out of the cable of all that unused portion of the current for which the receiver of the message could not wait. Thomson fulfilled both conditions, inventing for the purpose his marvellously sensitive mirror galvanometer, and, later, his siphon recorder, the principle of which is used in many other connections. To him, therefore, ocean telegraphy owes its existence. But the mathematical investigation here involved led also to the clear exposition of the laws of those electric oscillations, afterwards experimentally investigated by Hertz, which are the foundation of ether (or wireless) telegraphy. This alone would have been a great achievement for any one man. For it Thomson received the "honour" of a knighthood. English Governments do not consist of men having much knowledge of, or even sympathy with, physical science; but even an English Government could not withhold distinction from the man for whom the highest earthly honour is undying fame and the reverence of the best of mankind. No man ever had so many splendid monuments erected to his memory. Every physical laboratory in the world is full of his instruments, and his discoveries and inventions are incessantly in the view of all students in every branch of science—celestial and molecular dynamics, heat, electricity, and magnetism. Wherever the most delicate machinery for measurement is required, there is the name of Kelvin found.

Those who have had the privilege of hearing him, whether at a meeting of the British Association, or when he spoke from the chair of the Royal Society, must have been struck with the extreme simplicity and directness of his mind. If he wanted an explanation of something contained in a paper read before him, he did not hesitate to ask as a child would ask; his questions went to the root of the matter, and he was never satisfied until everything was made perfectly clear. He lived the same age as Newton, accomplished transcendently great work, and left behind him an unrivalled school of mathematical physicists, inspired by his genius—Rayleigh, J. J. Thomson, Larmor, and others—the greatest glory of Cambridge and of England. But the whole scientific world was his pupil, and the impress which he has left on physical science must remain as long as the world lasts.

THE DIARY OF A REVOLUTION.

THE tyrant who wished that the people had only one head that he might strike it off might in quieter moods have realised that a representative system offers a very fair substitute for his unattainable ideal. It is, one suspects, in much this spirit that M. Stolypin regards the First and Second Dumas. Here were gathered a microcosm of the Russian people, some of its stoutest hearts and most defiant tongues. In a single building, all known, unarmed, he had under his hand the personification of all the tendencies in Russian society which he wished to suppress. Here were no fugitives eluding him with false passports and assumed names, but public men who would neither strike nor flee. Next week he will open the great process against the 139 ex-Deputies of the First Duma, who signed the famous Vyborg manifesto, which urged Russians to adopt the tactics which our ancestors pursued towards Ship Money, and to starve a Government which defied the people. It will be a grandiose occasion, for the 139 include the Speaker of the House, professors, princes, landowners, advocates, all the pundits and pillars of society who form the Cadet party, as well as the mere rabble of Labour members and Socialists, who are usually condemned in a less regular and spectacular manner. The Third Duma, skilfully packed and sedulously terrorised, may debate to its heart's content the stirring question whether or not it lives under an autocracy. The question will be answered in another building and proved upon the persons of the first pioneers of a Parliamentary system.

No day without its line; no week without its victims. The present week has sealed the fate of the fifty-five Deputies who formed the Social-Democratic party in the Second Duma. Some fled betimes; but thirty-seven, disdainfully brave, preferred to wait their trial and endure the worst. It was because M. Stolypin had determined to find some pretext for destroying the Second Duma, that he invited it to deprive the entire Social Democratic Party of its Parliamentary immunity. The Cadets saw the snare, appointed a committee to investigate the charge, and decided that if the Duma were to die, it should die with dignity, and at the same time with a due regard for all the niceties of procedure. While the telephone hummed with threats of dissolution, a Committee solemnly investigated the evidence. The Social Democrats were accused of conspiracy to overturn the State by means of a gigantic military conspiracy. In a sense the charge was true. Like every Socialist party, the Russian Social Democrats are working for the overthrow of the existing régime, and their ultimate programme, no doubt, includes the idea of an armed revolution on the day before the dawning of the millennium. On that pretext Mr. Hyndman might be charged to-morrow with high treason, Herr Bebel and all his colleagues in the Reichstag flung into prison, and M. Briand torn from the ministerial bench to face a capital charge. In no other sense were these deputies guilty, and it was because their Liberal colleagues had decided to refuse their surrender that the Second Duma was dissolved. It is, doubtless, true that the Russian Social Democrats would lead an armed rising to-morrow, if they were assured of money, equipped with arms, and certain of the neutrality or alliance of the soldiery. But they have neither money nor arms. The soldiery is as yet only very partially sympathetic, and the whole tendency of the party is to concentrate on the peaceful work of organisation, straining their meagre resources to send a few members to the Third Duma in the teeth of a monstrous franchise law, and using up the energy and the courage of their adherents in an effort to build up Trade Unionism. But in the eye of the law it was crime enough that they contemplated any change in the existing régime. The penal code promises at least Siberia to any member of an illegal organisation "formed to overthrow the existing form of government in some more or less distant future." Their offence was not conspiracy but a belief in the possibility of change.

The autocracy has had a long experience of political trials, and it has adapted its methods to circumstances. Time was, in the halcyon days of the Tsar Liberator, when even political assassins were sent before a jury. That practice was stopped when Vera Sassulitch was acquitted, after attempting to murder the brutal General Trepoff, first of that ill-omened name. Thereafter "politicals" went before removable judges. But after "the trial of the 193," the pioneers of the heroic "To the people" movement, whose idealism Tourgenieff depicted half in satire, half in sympathy, in the wonderful pages of "Virgin Soil," Felix Volkhovsky faced his judges, and in a speech of mingled irony and denunciation won the sympathy of the people before the silence of Siberia closed over him. From that day onwards trial has usually been dispensed with. But when the authorities are minded to make work for the lawyers, they take care to judge in secret. The Social Democratic deputies, accordingly, were "tried" in camera. They paced their cells while their fate was decided, nor were they even represented by counsel. The Third Duma meanwhile debated solemnly whether or not it lives under a constitution, and in the Bourses of London and Paris, high finance wondered how much it would be asked to lend in proof of its faith in the re-establishment of order.

Some days hence the exile's train will start on the long stages to Siberia, carrying with it the thirty-seven who are condemned, some for life, some for long terms of years, to imprisonment and then to exile. It is barely five months since these men were in London, shaking hands with "comrades" in our own Labour movement, revelling in their few days of freedom, marvelling a little that they were watched by Scotland Yard, and delighting in the sympathy of private friends and kindly audiences. One among them, at least, left the memory behind him of a great personality—Tsere-telli, a Georgian Prince who disdained to use his title, and mingled with little Jewish tailors from the ghetto of Warsaw and Russian workmen from the slums of Petersburg. His bearing, his manners, his handsome presence and great physique, were worthy of the superb race of mountaineers and warriors who had elected him to mock the legend of the unchanging East. He had found in Socialism the religious stimulus which made missionaries and martyrs of the first Christians, and he will tread the road which is hallowed by the footsteps of so many of the most enduring souls in Europe. The Russian stepmother-State is true to her traditions. She exiled Tourgenieff, she imprisoned Dostoevsky, she excommunicated Tolstoy. For three generations she has stamped out the talent, the courage, the energy which might have made her the greatest of European lands. She stands to-day by her past.

But these are only a few of the victims whom M. Stolypin has picked from the First and Second Dumas. In addition to the Social-Democrats, 33 Social-Revolutionaries and nine members of other Left-Wing groups are in prison or exile. And all the while the gallows creak and the prisons fill for less celebrated victims. In two years of "constitutionalism" some 2,717 persons have been condemned to death by court martial, and 18,271 by judicial process to lesser penalties—figures which take no account of the tens of thousands dealt with by administrative process. In the angry period between Plehve's death and the Moscow rising, the average number of capital sentences for political crime was only eighteen per month. Between the first and second Dumas it rose to 211; after the second Duma it stood at 159. And yet there is no slackening in the zeal of protest and the passion for self-immolation. The young men and women go out to die, certain of the end, without the money that might ensure escape. They die under pseudonyms, leaving behind them not even a name which comrades will cherish or glorify. The newspapers record the hanging of some desperate missionary. The "circles" shudder and shake their heads over the strange name. Months afterwards, when the young man whom they had cherished and honoured under another name fails to return, the whisper goes round that his was the promise and the courage which ended in that anonymous noose. Without a grave, a name, or a place in history, they will still face torture or living burial or an inglorious death. There was a time, during the dull reign of Alexander III., when it seemed that the revolution had been crushed, because the generation of idealists who led it had been literally exterminated. But those were the days when ideas were the monopoly of the educated class. To-day the Social Revolutionaries have roused the peasants; the Social Democrats are transforming the towns. There are millions to hang where before there were thousands, and the very familiarity with death only makes it seem the normal end of the life of a free public man in Russia.

THE LIGHTS.

SEEN from afar, they light the sky with a warning crimson flare. They meet you on arrival with a blatant discomposing glare of crossed and intercrossing beams, which thrust right up to the windows of the cab, so that the mind involuntarily contracts. Even from the midst of them you can see the glow above, as if the city burnt.

Blazing, twinkling, glimmering—they burn out pieces of the gloom, in mass and in myriads of little shining points, and light the Big Grey City to a more feverish unrest; for where they burn, men and women play and work and sin in crowds and solitudes.

They illuminate the city's form, so that it shines in miles of glittering outlines, or stands out in black sharp silhouettes against the flare.

They mark the contours of familiar streets with bent and twisted lines, and reveal new curves and unsuspected dips, which are not noticeable by day. They fix the vanished outlines of the high buildings with ranged and ordered squares, which glimmer in the sky, faintly, by reason of the drawn blinds. And they prick out brilliantly the river's course in great sweeping curves, which loop together the dim cross lights of the bridges with dotted chains of light. The open spaces they surround with flickering belts of twinkling moving points, confused as the shore lights of a coast-town seen at sea.

They make the pavement a ghostly lighted way, on which your shadow comes from behind, grows black, and, lengthening, dies away in front, only to follow and catch you up again. For as you walk you pass through varying flares, and always in front is the blazing tangle of massed, conflicting lights of a main thoroughfare at night, or the fusing perspective of the silent streets—flashing, glaring, twinkling; for they burn in sympathy with varying moods.

The reflections intensify the lights. Down the straight vistas of the main streets the road lights flare at spaced intervals, and then converge in tapering lines of light, and the houses in the middle distance seem on fire. The shops throw out a cross-reflected blaze, and the crowds move in dark relief, like men at work before open furnace doors; while the traffic comes out of the beyond, black moving things with gleaming eyes, growing into form of flickering light and shade, and lighting in turn the roadway as they go. Even the jewels at a woman's throat pick up and throw a glint, as the passing cab comes into an immediate zone of light, and a twisted shadow of the wheel plays for a moment on the hansom door.

But beyond the wonder of their mere effects is the haunting allurements of all the tangled life-stories that they suggest; for they half-disclose so much.

In the crowded busy streets they blaze out, making the passing faces ghastly masks of black shadow and sharp-cut lines; and expressions seem more expressive in the lurid glare.

Girls smile, shyly or with their eyes, oblivious to all but their companion, and you seem to hear the lover's flattering words, or read her danger in her upward gaze. Women smile, and all the hideous undercurrents of a city's vulgar sin stare out at you from hard, hungry, piteous eyes, which belie the trained, deceiving smile, and force sad thoughts of what they are and how they came to be. Men laugh, beaming with the flush of wine, but the cruel lights show up deep lines of care, which tell of struggles only momentarily forgot. Youths guffaw in mild traditional dissipation, but some of the distorted faces show clearly the want of will to give it up in time, and conjure up the gradual unresisted going under.

Also the lights reveal the frowns in shadowed furrows on the face. Frowns of sharp-faced schemers, talking fiercely in ominously guarded tones; frowns on the lighted faces of escorted women stepping out of cabs which tell of some crisis stormily discussed during the drive; frowns of the solitary ones who stride along, studying the pavement a little way in front with the blind concentrated stare which sees only some trouble to be faced; and the stealthy envious frowns of sunken men.

The lights show these and more. They glisten on the tears in a girl's staring eyes, as she hears the man's excuses and learns that he will not keep his word. They show gay foolish love in lighted motor cars, and hate in the gutter seeking for the ends of cigarettes, and fear in the furtive eyes of driven women. They flash on the look of cunning, and the leer of lust in brutalised drink-battered faces; and they light up the blind sickening struggles of tearing women settling a long vendetta. They betray misery and weariness in crowds, waiting for omnibuses, or huddling down in sheltered places for the night; and occasionally they light a gleam of quiet joy. But principally they light the darker side of life, because they light the streets.

For in the brilliant places the blazing flaming glare throws flash-light glimpses on many lurid faces, and each face shows the picture of a life—the sinister, mysterious, pathetic lives of the City of The Great Unrest.

Even in the quiet streets they illuminate some little bits of life. They expose the secrets of carriages and cabs, and reveal the lingering oblivion of a kiss, or the tense profile of the man who leans to plead; they disclose the stiff boredom of the resplendent pair who drive to a function they must attend together. They show the well-dressed ruffian of the town slink into the slum public-house to meet a lower member of his trade, and they light the half-hid shimmer of an evening dress, as the dainty lady visits the pawnbroker at night for some mysterious urgent need. They catch the flash of little jewelled hands, and the glitter of a buckle on a shoe, as they who have supped in splendour leave for home with laughing farewell words; and just across the road they glimmer on the dark embankment queue of slouching derelicts, waiting their turn for doles of bread and soup. They flicker momentarily on the averted face of a woman hurriedly escorted by a man from the half-closed door of bachelor chambers, to the shelter of a waiting cab.

From the windows the lights shine out in varying squares of light, countless reflections of countless homes—big brilliant windows, faint-lighted windows, and solitary un-blinded lights—suggesting mirth, and sickness, and homeliness, and toil.

For the lights—the shifting, scintillating lights—stand for the crowded mysteries of London life, and all the things that happen after dark. So that they fascinate the mind until it tries, and fails, and tries again, to grasp at least something of their illimitable bewildering significance. This is the glamour of the lights.

Short Story.

SARAH BENNET'S POSSESSION.

Risingham farm stands on the sky-line of one of the great whale-backed Berkshire Downs. Its roof of tile, red once, but weathered now by rain and softened by lichen, seems ever in keeping with the soft browns and greys of the short, sheep-trimmed grass.

Half-a-mile along the Roman road stands Risingham Castle, from which the farm had taken its name; a great square piece of land, surrounded by ditch and rampart, with a view of hill and valley, ploughland and pastureland, for close on fifty miles.

I first learned to know the farm because it was the home of Frank Dicey. Here he came to spend the week or fortnight's leave that was given him, before his ship set out once again for the other side of the world, and from the farm, only two years ago, he married the youngest of the Three Princesses.

The Three Princesses were his cousins. It was he who gave them their names, in the days before Grimm had been buried with the last of the school-books in the lumber room at the back of the barn. In accordance with the unwritten law of Fairyland, they were known in age order as the Wicked, the Ugly, and the Beautiful.

They, like Frank, were orphans; and their parents dying almost before the children could remember, they had been brought to Risingham by their great aunt, Mrs. Bennet (Sarah Bennet she would have called herself in the plain Quaker fashion), who had ever since been a Fairy Godmother to her nieces and nephew.

I remember the old lady best as first I saw her, dressed in the delicate lilac coloured silk of a bygone age, with the large Quaker bonnet, a purple aureole, enclosing her face.

Her delicate hands, on which the veins showed clearly, seemed wonderfully frail; but she was a woman of unlooked-for strength and energy, with a voice clear and distinct, that changed when she spoke in Meeting to a musical treble.

This woman, a saint in true communion with those of old, was closely associated with a series of unusual occurrences which spread over a period of five years, and which, for all I know, may have been going on for a much longer time. In themselves they seem disjointed, perhaps insignificant. Taken together they form a tragedy.

* * *

It was a late September evening, dark, for the harvest moon had not yet risen behind the downs, and with the faint scent of the cornfields in the air. I had met Frank Dicey in Southampton that afternoon, and now at nine we were climbing the last hill that separated us from the lights of Risingham Farm.

We stopped on the ridge, and as we waited we felt something of the wonderful peace which dwells on the downs, where the sky seems more open and the earth more remote than among the mountains or in the plains.

Then as I looked, I suddenly saw a lantern flash half a mile to our right, by the dew pond.

When Frank was a boy, he and the youngest Princess had saved their pocket-money all the summer to buy a little signalling lamp, and when autumn came they went about in the evenings flashing their badly-spelled messages from hillside to hillside.

"I expect she wants to speak to you now," I said. "You needn't mind me; it's a language I can't understand." "Take down the letters," he answered, "as I tell you them."

It was certainly an unexpected message; part of it was undecipherable, but what Frank made out read as follows (I omit a preliminary string of oaths):—

"This is . . . trying to get into communication. Why the devil won't you answer? I wish to say—"

The point of light had ceased to move. It remained steady for a minute, and then went out.

I looked at Frank curiously.

"Some joke?" I suggested.

"I suppose so," he answered.

It was evidently a joke he did not appreciate. It was not until we had been welcomed and fed that Frank remembered.

"Who was it signalling down by the dew pond an hour ago?" he asked.

No one had been signalling. They had all been busy in the kitchen except Aunt Sarah, who had been down with the lantern to see that the paddock gate was closed.

Frank said he must have been mistaken. "But I'm blest if I am," he added when the others had left the room.

* * *

I was at Risingham Farm in the September of the following year. It was Sunday, and the others had gone to Meeting, leaving me to profit by their absence by indulging in the luxury of a pipe.

From the steep down-side, where I lay, I watched them leave the Meeting House, the old lady leading the way with the Wicked and Ugly Princesses on either side, and Frank and the Beautiful Princess bringing up the rear.

They had had a quiet Meeting, Frank said; no one had spoken, with the exception of Aunt. She had preached about heaven; had, in fact, given a general description of it, from which it seemed that it was just the place for a friend of his, a Bond Street jeweller, who had designed his own house on not dissimilar lines.

I asked leave to accompany them to the evening Meeting. "Aunt generally makes her biggest score in the second innings," said Frank, but he was reproved for levity.

There are times when nothing is so impressive as a Quaker's Meeting. That September evening was certainly one.

The lamps had not been lit—there was no need for them. The silence was unbroken. Now and then across the open door, for the day had been warm, a bat flitted.

Sarah Bennet sat alone in the minister's gallery; the outline of her bonnet was almost lost against the dark oak of the wainscot.

At the end of half-an-hour, just as Frank had produced a pencil and paper to begin a sketch of his cousin's profile, she spoke.

She took as her text those terrible words of the Gospel:

"And beside all this, between us and you there is a great gulf fixed; so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence."

She described to us a battle-field, not beneath an English sky, but a battle-field, burnt and scorched by a tropical sun. She pictured the agonies of the wounded, their unslaked thirst, the unmasking of the beast in those who conquered, the terror of the defeated. She told how all the while, in the blue, birds were singing, oblivious of all.

And with this as a picture, she spoke of Hell.

Yet from beginning to end her voice never changed from the sweet yet monotonous treble chant. She never raised her eyes from the gallery rail on which she leant, which her thin blue-veined hand clasped tightly.

When we left the Meeting House, the red disc of the moon was just showing, over the tree-tops. Neither Frank nor I spoke till we were in sight of home. Then he said:—

"I remember talking with a fellow once, about those accidents in coal mines. He was an insignificant little chap with spectacles and a stutter, but he knew how to talk. I told him afterwards that he had a morbid imagination. 'Oh, no, I haven't,' he said, 'I was shut in the pit once for four days. I'm talking about what I've seen.' That's what I felt when I heard Aunt Sarah." Then after a pause, he added, "It's curious, you know. On the face of it her description of heaven ought to have been the best."

* * *

The night outside was dark and gusty, a night that made the small room with its large fire more than usually comfortable.

The blinds had not been drawn, for, unlike most ladies, Sarah Bennet had no objection to see the shadowy branches of the laurels, as they tapped against the pane; and the country people liked her the better, for the light of the lamp as it stood on the table by the window served as a beacon for travellers who otherwise might have fancied themselves alone on the broad back of the Downs.

We had been seated around the fire, talking. Frank and the youngest Princess in the corner where the shadows were longest, while I held a skein of soft grey wool for the old lady to wind. It was the Wicked Sister, who, having finished her book, suggested a game. I forget what we played, but I remember Frank did not win. I think he was busy drawing the Beautiful Princess. She did not admire the likeness, though he was certainly clever with his pencil. "I could do better with my eyes shut," she said.

"Very well," he replied. "Let us see who can make the best portrait of anyone in the room without looking."

"Turn out the lamp," said Margaret, "and we'll begin."

The flickering light of the fire had for the time being died down; the flames curling under a huge log of wood were too intent on searching for a hold to show themselves except in sudden darts and flashes.

Mrs. Bennet sat in her high-backed chair slightly turned from us, looking into the garden beyond. A pencil and paper lay on her lap, but her hands were folded.

"Well, is it to be anyone in the room?" asked the youngest Princess. "That rules out Frank, he being nobody. I think we might be allowed a little more light."

For three minutes no one spoke.

"Time!" said Frank. "Light the lamp, and let's see the results. Give me the papers, and we'll guess who they are. So you've been drawing, Auntie?" he said as he took her sheet. "I thought you had gone to sleep."

Frank's was the first portrait we saw—a most spirited sketch of a goose. "You see," he explained, "if I am to be snubbed by being called nobody, I must have my revenge."

Then the rest followed, amusing caricatures, for the most part unrecognisable.

Suddenly Frank started up.

"Who in the world is that?" he said. He held in his hand the piece of paper that had lain in Mrs. Bennet's lap. On it was a drawing, as cleverly executed a sketch as I have ever seen, of a man, a young man, dressed in an officer's uniform of half-a-century ago. He was kneeling with his hands clasped. His features, coarse as they were, were cast into an expression that seemed to demand pity. It was not entirely a black and white drawing; for on the side of his coat was a little patch of red, put in with coloured chalk. There was a little pool of red on the ground on which he knelt.

Frank looked puzzled. "I never dreamed you could draw as well as that, Auntie. But it was to be someone present in the room!"

Mrs. Bennet was still gazing out into the night.

"Well, children," she said, "what have you been playing at? Francis, what is that thou hast in thy hand? Bring the lamp a little nearer."

We stood watching her impatiently. She had placed the spectacles on her nose, and had taken up the paper in her hand, when suddenly her face blanched and she let it drop with a cry. "Henry!" she said, in a deep voice that we hardly recognised, and then again "Henry!" She stood up trembling, and walking to the fire, thrust the paper into the flame.

Then she turned round.

"Francis," she said, "I must ask thee never to draw that man again."

* * *

A year afterwards we were seated once again in the little parlour. The girls had been singing, and Frank had taken their place at the piano. He sat down with a sailor's confidence and began to play; he said he had forgotten the name of the piece, but I think I recognised it as coming from an opera.

Mrs. Bennet had a strong affection for Frank. She had paid little attention to his cousins while they sang, but as soon as her boy began to strum, she left her work and stood behind him at the piano, while her foot beat time to the music.

I should say, while she tried to beat time to the music. For she had no ear for either time or harmony.

I noticed that as he went on Frank looked perplexed, nor was he playing as well as he was able. He stopped abruptly. "Come outside," he said: "the room is stifling."

"You don't happen to know the Morse Code?" he asked. "If you did I think you would be more surprised than you are at present. I wonder how long it took her to learn it?"

"What on earth are you talking about?" I said.

"I'm not quite sure," Frank replied, "but when you thought Aunt Sarah was marking time to the music, she may have been doing so; but at the same time she was spelling out a message to someone in the Morse Code."

"What was it?" I asked.

"Oh, utter nonsense," he replied.

"Present arms! Fire! No, damn it. Why won't you hear me? I shall be done for unless you——"

"I don't know how it ended, for I couldn't play any more."

We went inside again. Mrs. Bennet was reading her Bible in the high-backed chair by the fireside.

"I am afraid thou hast caught cold, Frank," she said. "I will go into the kitchen and make thee some camomile tea."

* * *

The last link in this chain of strange occurrences was given me the following September, the year of Frank's wedding.

We were at the breakfast table, and I had just finished telling an absurd dream in which I encircled the island of Corsica in a flying machine.

"Thy dream seems to have been very curious," said Mrs. Bennet, "but I had one last night that I believe I may say was even more so. In my dream I was present at a large ball; I think it must have been a ball, though I never attended one in my life. Everyone wore beautiful white dresses, and we all drank soup out of large china bowls. I had begun to drink mine, when someone pushed me violently from behind, with the result that I spilt the whole of the contents of the basin over my dress, and I am sure must have ruined it. At the same time I heard an odd voice behind me say: 'Yes, Sarah, it was I who did it, and for the last fifty years I have been trying to apologise.' I looked round to see who it was speaking in so unusual a manner, and thou canst picture my surprise when I saw a monkey—I think it must have been a monkey—dressed in men's clothes and standing at my elbow."

"There was something so human in the pathos of its look that I burst out laughing. The poor animal seemed quite offended, and slunk away to the sideboard, where the waiters were serving soup. It turned round once, and with a snarl that showed all its teeth, muttered 'Too late,' and then was gone." And Mrs. Bennet laughed.

* * *

Each of the occurrences that I have narrated impressed me more or less forcibly at the time, but I should probably soon have forgotten them if I had not heard the story which, to my mind, links them together.

When Sarah Bennet was a girl, she had loved and married a Captain in the Engineers. He was clever, with a love of poetry and literature unusual in one of his profession, but his nature was wild and dissolute. He was cruel, too. I heard only yesterday a story told of him, that dealt with the sacking of a Burmese village; it was only part of a story, too, for the peppery Indian colonel stopped the teller before he was half way through.

The Captain married his bride against the wish of her parents, taking her from her quiet country home to the shabby misery that waits on life in a garrison town.

At the end of six months the regiment was to move, but he deceived her as to its destination. She awoke one morning to find that her husband had left with his company for India, while she, with hardly a shilling to pay for the next meal, was saddled with his bad debts. Through the kindness of the members of her Society, Sarah Bennet was able to return home, and there she lived with her parents, trying to forget that she had ever left them.

No tidings ever came to her from her husband. She had thought of him as dead long before she read in the paper the brief notice of the action in which he was killed.

When the little that remained of Captain Bennet that was not carnal, passed into the unknown, he realised, as his wife had never realised, the extent of the evil that he had done. He tried with all his power to let her know his sorrow, tried perhaps with all the more success, because his soul was not far removed from earth. But as of old, there was the great gulf fixed, the unbridgeable abyss between good and evil.

W. F. HARVEY.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THE news that we are soon to have two new books from M. Anatole France is sure to excite the liveliest interest. One of them, which is called "Penguins"—a strange title for a book of essays—will contain studies in religion, philosophy, and literature, written in the wonderful style blended of irony and sympathy, of which M. France is the greatest living master. The other book, a novel, is not yet finished. It is understood to be more realistic in method than anything M. France has yet written.

WE learn that Mr. Bernard Shaw is at work upon an essay on religion, which will be published early in the new year. The essay is an amplification of the lectures given by Mr. Shaw during the present year at the City Temple, Essex Hall, Kensington Town Hall, and elsewhere. Like all Mr. Shaw's utterances, these lectures gave rise to a storm of controversy, and doubtless he will take advantage of the coming volume to expostulate with his critics in a characteristic preface.

ANOTHER piece of Shavian literature is a pamphlet called "The Sanity of Art: An Exposure of Some Current Nonsense About Artists Being Degenerate," which will be issued in a few days from the office of "The New Age." This is a reprint of a criticism of Max Nordau's "Degeneration," contributed by Mr. Shaw as a letter to a New York journal called "Liberty." It is probably unique among letters to an editor, since it occupied practically the whole of the number of "Liberty" to which it was contributed.

INSTEAD of the annual volume of "Sociological Papers," issued by the Sociological Society, the organ of the Society will in future be a new quarterly, "The Sociological Review," the first number of which will be published on January 15th, by Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes. The Review will be edited by Professor L. T. Hobhouse, whose name guarantees the authority and power of the issue. Among the articles to appear in the first number are "Suicide: A Chapter in Comparative Ethics," by Professor Westermarck; "Criminology," by Dr. Douglas Morrison; "Sociology and History," by Professor H. A. L. Fisher; "The Method of Comparative Religion," by Mr. R. R. Marett; "Unemployment," by Mr. W. H. Beveridge; "Problems of Cities," by Professor P. Geddes, and a general article on the scope of the Review by the editor. It is hoped to make "The Sociological Review" the mouthpiece of the whole sociological movement in this country, and it will contain, amongst other features, a full account of contemporary books and periodical publications which deal with sociological problems.

MR. MURRAY announces a book of travel by Mr. R. F. Johnston, the British District Officer at Wei-hai-wei, which describes a remarkable expedition. Mr. Johnston journeyed from Peking through the lesser known parts of Szuchuan and Yunnan to Bhamo in Burma, and thence to Mandalay, unaccompanied by an interpreter and, for the most part, living on the same fare as his coolies and muleteers. Despite the hardships necessary to five months' almost solitary travel in those regions, Mr. Johnston's only illness was an attack of fever lasting only a few days. His book contains much fresh information about the natural resources of the provinces of Western China and the religious and social customs of their inhabitants.

THE probability that electoral reform will occupy the attention of Parliament in the near future gives interest to the announcement that Mr. Fisher Unwin has a book upon the subject in active preparation. It is by Mr. Joseph King, and is called "Electoral Reform: An Inquiry into our System of Parliamentary Representation." Mr. King deals with the problems of the Redistribution of Seats, Manhood Suffrage, Female Suffrage, the Referendum, the Second Ballot, Proportional Representation, Bribery and Corruption, the Expenditure of Candidates, and other similar questions. A feature of the book will be the full discussion of the practice and experience of foreign countries and of our own self-governing colonies.

THE volume in the Walter Scott Company's series "Makers of British Art," which will follow that on Richard Wilson (now in the press) deals with the Life and Works of Sir J. E. Millais. The author is Mr. J. Eadie Reid, and his work aims at presenting a concise picture of Millais in his dual character of artist and man. Curiously enough, the only book devoted to this subject, that provides anything like a complete biography of the painter, is the standard "Life and Letters," compiled by Mr. J. G. Millais, although excellent critical appreciations, notably those of Sir Walter Armstrong, Mr. Spielmann, and Mr. A. L. Baldry, have been issued in a less expensive form. In Mr. Reid's book, as in the others of the same series, the biographical interest is kept well to the front. With respect to Millais' black and white work, care has been exercised in collating materials scattered over a wide field, in order to present a clear, though necessarily brief, survey of this phase of his activity. Millais' black and white, by the way, is no more than touched on in the "Life and Letters," although his fame as an illustrator is considered by some almost to surpass his reputation as a painter.

THE first number of "The Neolith" has just appeared, and the projectors are to be congratulated on an excellent beginning. A feature of literary life in France is the number of periodicals that exist for the purpose of advocating progressive literary and artistic views. Hitherto such periodicals have met with small encouragement in this country, but judging from this opening number, "The Neolith" deserves to succeed. The drawings by Mr. Frank Brangwyn, Mr. E. J. Sullivan, and Mr. Raven Hill are excellent, and have been reproduced in admirable style. Among the literary contributors are E. Nesbitt, Mr. Selwyn Image, Mr. Gerald Gould, and Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, who is represented by a fantastic story, "Aerial Football: The New Game." There are also some good verses by Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

THE mistakes of schoolboys at examinations are always refreshing. We take the following examples from a list in a recent number of "The University Correspondent":—

"The Complete Angler" is another name for Euclid, because he wrote all about angles."

"Sir Arthur Wellesley, son of Pitt, founded the Wellesleyan chapel people."

"During the Reformation every clergyman was compelled to receive 39 articles."

"The masculine of heroine is kipper."

"A problem is a figure which you do things with which are absurd, and then you prove it."

"Opus est maturato—a middle-aged man wanted."

"Æquo atque parato animo moriar—I shall die in prepared spirits and water."

"Un chef d'œuvre—A clerk of the works."

"Les hors d'œuvres—The unemployed."

"Caerulea puppis—A Sky terrier."

"Amatory verses are those composed by amateurs."

"Income is a yearly tax."

"The dodo is a bird that is nearly decent now."

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"A History of the Minorities, London." By E. M. Tomlinson (Smith, Elder, 18s. net.)

"The Works of Tennyson." Annotated by Hallam, Lord Tennyson. Vol. I. (Macmillan, 4s. net.)

"Greece and the Ægean Islands." By Philip S. Marden. (Constable, 12s. 6d. net.)

"Thyrsis and Fausta, a Pastoral; with other Plays and Poems." By Rosalind Travers. (Elkin Mathews, 3s. 6d. net.)

"John Glayde's Honour." A Play in Four Acts. By Alfred Sutro. (French, 2s. 6d. net.)

"Catholicism and Independence." By M. D. Petre. (Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.)

"Ancestors." By Gertrude Atherton. (Murray, 6s.)

"Villiers de l'Isle-Adam; L'Écrivain et le Philosophe." Par Henri Chapoutot. (Paris: Delesalle, 3fr. 50.)

"Le Problème du Style." Par Remy de Gourmont. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France, 3fr. 50.)

"Poitiers et Angoulême." Par H. Labbé de la Mauvinière. Collection de Villes d'Art Célèbres. (Paris: Renouard, 5fr.)

"Jean des Brebis on le Livre de la Misère." Nouvelles. Par Emile Moselly. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit, 3fr.)

"Prinzess Eliza Radziwill, Ein Lebensbild." Von Oswald Baer. (Berlin: Mittler, M4.)

Letters from Abroad.

AN ORDER OF INDIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Even during the Diwali festival, which is the Christmastide of Indian children, when brothers and sisters meet and illuminate the steps and window sills with tiny lamps—even during this holiday of peace and goodwill, half the homes of Poona have remained shut up and dark. The plague is going up and down the city again, as it has been going from one season to another in the last ten years. In ten years it has reduced the population by 40,000 souls, or nearly one third. At present it is not in a bad form, and takes only twelve or fifteen a day; but one remembers the panic when a single case of plague was reported in London. So a great many families have gone to live on the open ground outside the city, and there they endure fate and celebrate family joy in any hut of canvas, sacking, matting, wicker, tin, old boxes, boards, or branches which they and the British Government can manage to rig up between them. Many have even transferred their shops, and the general effect is like a scrappy Derby Day, without the races.

Beyond one of these "Health Camps," as they are fondly called, on the west of the town, a cluster of modest stone buildings is rising, that embodies one of the most significant movements of the time. It is the growing home of the "Servants of India Society." Here already dwell about a dozen young men who have taken a vow to devote their lives to the cause of their country in a religious spirit. When the buildings are finished, there will be room for about thirty. Each member remains under close training for five years, but out of those five years he spends two in travelling to various parts of India, to study the people's needs. Like the monastic Orders, they all take vows, the most important being that no one shall earn money or seek advantage for himself, or take up any personal quarrel, and that each shall regard all Indians as brothers, and labour for the common good, without distinction of caste or creed. There is also a vow of personal purity; but marriage is not forbidden. In fact, there is a provision that every full member, after his novitiate, should receive from the Society a fixed income of £3 6s. 8d. (Rs. 50) a month, with an extra allowance for the insurance of each child as it comes.

The object of the Society is to promote the political education and national advancement of the Indian people. With regard to the British Government, I had better quote its own regulations:—

"Its members frankly accept the British connection, as ordained, in the inscrutable dispensation of Providence, for India's good. Self-government on the lines of the English Colonies is their goal. This goal, they recognise, cannot be attained without years of earnest and patient work and sacrifices worthy of the cause."

The Society will train men to promote the national interests by all constitutional means, especially by creating among the people a deep and passionate love of the country, by organising political education and agitation, by promoting co-operation among the different communities, by assisting education, especially of women, and by the elevation of the depressed classes.

The merely learned side is represented by a large library, already containing all the great works on India, and a selection from the histories of progress and freedom in all countries, from England herself, right down the glorious roll, to the Russia of last year.

The founder and head of the Society is one of the few Indians whose name is known in England to two or three people outside the half-dozen who give some of their attention to Indian affairs. Mr. Gokhale is a Mahratta Brahman of the highest caste, and, like a true Brahman, he has devoted his life to poverty and thought. He is now forty-two—a man of the highest education and European learning, but, before all things, a statesman who for years has advocated constitutional and social reforms quietly and with temperance. I hardly suppose an adequate report of his last week's speech against the Seditious Meetings Bill before the Viceroy in Council at Simla has reached you, for misrepresentation by the telegraphic agents is one of the scandals of India, and Mr. Gokhale himself has an excellent proposal that the Liberal papers at home should club together and keep a correspondent to supply them with news approximately true. But I have a verbatim copy of the speech, and I wish you could publish it as a model of controlled conviction and an overwhelming plea for the rights of freedom as they have hitherto been understood by the English people. I will quote only one significant passage. Speaking of the "malignant activity of certain unscrupulous correspondents," he said:—

"The saddest part of the whole thing is that the Secretary of State for India has fallen a victim to these grievous misrepresentations. Possessing no personal knowledge of the people of this country, and overwhelmed with a sense of the vast responsibilities of his office, he has allowed his vision to be obscured and his sense of proportion to be warped. From time to time he has let fall ominous hints in the House of Commons, and more than once he has spoken as though some great trouble were brewing in India and the country were on the eve of a dark disaster. My Lord, in these circumstances, the passing of a Bill like the present and in such hot haste, is bound to have the effect of confirming the false impression which has been already created in England, and this cannot fail to intensify and deepen still further the sense of injustice and injury and the silent resentment with which my countrymen have been watching the course of events during the last few months."

"The worst of all is," said Mr. Gokhale, as we walked round the buildings of his young Society, "many people are beginning to lose faith in English integrity and sense of justice. Since Lord Ripon's departure more than twenty years ago, the type of Englishman that comes out here seems to be slowly declining. It is unfortunate that our Congress movement should have coincided with the past twenty-two years of violent reaction and Imperialism in England. You can hardly imagine how unendurable our life became at the time of the Boer War. The insolence of Anglo-Indian papers towards our people goes beyond all bounds; yet the 'Civil and Military Gazette,' which is the worst offender, has only received a mild remonstrance from headquarters. During the last three years of Lord Curzon's time we were kept in a state of perpetual irritation. Then came our high hopes from Liberalism, and our violent disappointment."

"I think in the last year that manners have mended, and Lord Minto himself is very much the gentleman. But this cry of 'sedition' has now been raised, chiefly with the object of keeping up the military expenditure. Also, there can be no genuine peace as long as the Partition of Bengal is maintained in its present form. It is too late to reverse that vindictive error, but modification would not be difficult. For the rest, our party, as you know, are Moderates and reformers, not obstructionists; but we are not likely to join in denouncing the Extremists, who are, after all, our own people, and have the same great object in view."

"For immediate reforms, we should be content with an enlargement of the Legislative Councils (though not with Mr. Morley's new suggestion of giving more power to land-owners), together with some control over the Budget by the Indian members; a gradual extension of education, till it becomes free and compulsory, even in the villages; the complete separation of judicial and executive functions in the Civil Service; and an improved position for Indians in the public services in general. On all these points we are gradually going forward, and in spite of the twenty years of reaction, which, unhappily, continue owing to the ignorance of Liberals in England, we have not a doubt that we shall prevail. The worst is, as I said at the beginning, that, under long provocation, many of our young men are losing faith in England's integrity and sense of justice—the two main qualities that could be urged for the maintenance of your power."

We were passing the rows of two-roomed cells, monastic but sufficient, in which the consecrated Knights of the new Order of India will spend their time in training. By devotion, and by the deliberate rejection of prosperity, the Order springs from the natural instincts of a people whose highest caste has through long ages followed poverty and wisdom. But as I thought of the future to which such a Society may possibly lead, I recalled the words of an Anglo-Indian lady on the ship: "To us in India, a pro-native is simply a rank outsider." And so I returned to the city of the plague.—Yours, &c.,

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

Poona, November 9th, 1907.

Present-Day Problems.

"THE HELPERS."

THE Guild of Help, which is spreading rapidly in the North of England, is a modern movement which is not without significance. It is a manifestation of the general awakening of the social conscience, a practical expression of the common desire for social betterment. Although the impulse of the movement is primarily philanthropic, it cannot be dismissed as belonging to the category of ordinary charitable efforts. And, on the other hand, all rational thought assigns a field for voluntary enterprise which even advanced Socialists will admit can never be occupied by the State. It is in this domain that the activity of the Guild of Help seeks expression. If we are to welcome State control in departments of social service hitherto dependent on voluntary support and activity, each step in that direction provides additional evidence that to official administration must be added the vivifying force of voluntary work. The contribution may be uncertain in quantity and quality, but the value lies in its personal and spontaneous nature. This applies with particular force in regard to departments concerned with the lives and the homes of the poor. The public official whose work consists in supervising thousands of homes or of persons, may be enlightened and inspired with the highest conception of his duties. But he just misses the sympathetic attention to details, the sensitive response to the individual characteristics of each case, necessary to complete success.

The Guild of Help raises a large army of voluntary workers, who are taught this co-operation with civic officials. The ideal is that the poor-law officer, the health visitor, the school doctor, even the county-court official, shall be supported in his work by a private citizen, who shall be on terms of friendly intimacy with the family or individual concerned. Many happy results may be expected from such co-operation. The spirit of enthusiasm, which in the official may fade with added years of service, can be preserved by contact with ardent voluntary workers. On the other hand, the energies of the private worker are focussed, directed, and made more effectual.

It is contended that no citizen is justified in delegating his civic responsibility to a handful of public officials or charitable agents, but that it is his duty to understand the government and the administration of his city, and to co-operate with it to the best of his powers. A relationship with the civic authority in practical work deepens this sense of personal responsibility. Moreover, it has been found in Bradford that the attitude of the workers towards cases in which vice or moral weakness is a contributory cause of the distress has altered. With a recognition of the fact that the community in its own interest must deal with the morally unfit equally with the physically unfit, the old classification of "undeserving and deserving" is obliterated, and it soon becomes apparent that the former really constitute the more serious and urgent problem.

But the question arises: How is it possible to find so large a number of trained workers? The Guild of Help goes on the principle that there is no training equal to experience, and the chief qualifications it demands from its "helpers" are readiness to work, and willingness to follow direction. In constitution it is democratic, and it is free from the delusion that the superior person necessarily makes the best helper. Many helpers have been trained, and many more are learning their work.

Early in 1904 the first Guild of Help was organised in Bradford, and since then similar methods have been adopted in twenty-five English towns, including Halifax, Bolton, Sheffield, Sunderland, Peterborough, Plymouth, and Manchester.

As pioneer in the movement, the Guild of Help operating within the area of the Bradford Poor-law Union (population 228,625) furnishes a fair example of what is being attempted, with some trifling modifications, in both larger and smaller towns throughout the kingdom.

The purpose of the Guild is "to unite citizens of all classes, both men and women, irrespective of religious or political opinion," for certain objects, but chiefly "to provide a friend for all in need of help or advice." For this purpose the city is divided into districts, each in charge of a district head, with a band of helpers working under his direction. As cases of need arise, he selects a suitable helper to visit the home week by week, and to advise and assist until the difficulty is removed, and a lasting relationship is established. Some helpers have only a single family to look after, and no one is entrusted with more than four at any one time. In this way persistent and intelligent attention is focussed on each case. The helpers in each district meet fortnightly to exchange information, and to discuss methods. To these meetings are brought the case books, which constitute a continuous record of the circumstances of each family, and of the efforts made to help them. After each meeting, the case books are sent to the Central Office to be copied, and are then returned to the helpers to be continued. Thus, while the actual work is decentralised, and full local and personal responsibility is accepted for the care of each case, a current record of the whole operations of the Guild is available at headquarters.

The helper is provided with a handbook containing a classified list of the social and charitable agencies of the city, both public and voluntary, and he is instructed to consult his district head in every emergency so that there shall be no excuse for delay. On an average five hundred workers are thus engaged in Bradford.

The district head is the pivot of the whole effort, and on his tact and enthusiasm much of its success depends. He is assisted by a local honorary secretary, and between them they must attract new helpers, encourage and stimulate each worker, and watch constantly the progress of each case. It is necessary to enlist the interest of the local clergy and ministers, to establish intimate relations with all social workers in the neighbourhood, and to secure the sympathy of those who are in a position to give material help for special cases. In Bradford there are forty district heads, including many leading professional and business men.

The Executive Committee consists of a large representation of the District Heads, together with co-opted members selected for their influence and activity in social work. In addition to the general administrative control, they are engaged in efforts for the closer co-ordination of the social agencies of the city, the provision of new resources to meet specific needs, and in moving public authorities to deal with questions relating to public welfare. In a word, their aim is to see that there are no gaps in the social and charitable administration of the city. In Bradford they have been instrumental in floating companies to provide Land Settlement for Unemployed Men, and for Slum Property Management, while matters such as the appointment of Probation Officers for Juvenile Offenders, the Care of Infants and Provision of Milk, Residential Training Homes for the Blind, the Education of Crippled Children, have all been pressed forward effectually.

At the Central Office is a paid staff consisting of the General Secretary and two lady assistants, and a voluntary staff of twelve clerical assistants, two of whom attend each afternoon in order to copy the case books.

There is no house to house visiting, but cases are notified to the Central Office through a variety of channels; the Poor Law officials, the Health Visitors, and the School Medical Officer account for a large number, and, in addition, many are sent in from private sources.

It is not easy to describe the methods adopted in trying to raise a family to self-dependence and self-support. Where material help is needed, the Guild acts as a clearing-house for all charitable agencies, deriving assistance for each case from the most suitable source, or, if the particular need cannot be met by any existing agency, making a direct appeal to benevolent persons on behalf of the particular case. Experience shows that the response to such an appeal is more generous and sympathetic than that which follows a request for a subscription. But it is less easy to trace the action of personal influence, and the whole spirit of the Guild implies reliance on moral support and friendly encouragement rather than on material assistance, the latter being valued only as a means to an end. This attitude has been encouraged from the beginning, and there is no relief fund connected with the organisation. The Helper is chiefly concerned in establishing a friendship, and when that is secure, he finds innumerable opportunities for suggestion, encouragement, and help. He visits at least once a week, and some cases have been so followed for two years or more. The average number of active cases, that is, cases it is considered wise to report upon in writing, is about five hundred. In addition, there are many old cases with which the Helpers keep in friendly touch, although they are not considered as needing active attention.

A very close relationship has been established with the Poor Law Guardians and their officials, and the co-operation of the Guild has been requested by this department with regard to a variety of cases. Patients discharged from the Poor Law Sanatorium for Consumption, both men and women, are notified to the Guild, and the Helper is required to see that the patient in his own home continues as far as possible the conditions under which he has been living at the Sanatorium. The prejudice against open windows on the part of the home people must be overcome, a separate bedroom arranged for if possible, or at least a separate bed secured, and, most difficult of all, occupation in the open air or under reasonably healthy conditions must be sought. The patient not unusually needs moral bracing after the long period of partial idleness, and this of necessity implies constant visiting. When it is stated that the average cost to the ratepayer of each patient admitted to the Sanatorium is about £40, it will be seen that some form of after care is of economic importance.

Music.

BACH'S MASS IN B MINOR.

WHETHER a composer of religious music need be a religious man is a subject which has always been dear to academic discussion. Those who believe in art for art's sake—a cry which artists themselves have seldom raised—are of opinion that religious emotion is only a form of artistic emotion as far as the art-creator is concerned. The answer depends largely on what we call religion. Rossini's suave and sensuous melodies are the last word in religious ecstasy to some minds; to others the "Stabat Mater" seems a kind of sacrilege. Gounod's "Redemption" is even accepted as religious music. On the other hand, those who will not worship the sentimental style of Rossini or Gounod are entranced by the theatrical picturesqueness of "Parsifal," and yet it is conceivable that Wagner's religious emotion may seem hysterical to those who admire Bach. It is not a matter of creed but of temperament. Bach himself was, at any rate, a religious man in the narrower sense. He had given up a great deal of his life to the service of his church; he was a close student of the Bible; and in character and mind was a musical Martin Luther. To his simple eyes he was no doubt writing an orthodox religious work when he composed his Mass in B minor, but it is not difficult to believe that the artist in him was unconsciously erecting a monument to his own genius, for it is inconceivable that he should have thought this great Mass would ever be given as part of the ordinary liturgy at the Leipzig churches of St. Thomas and St. Nicholas. Parts were separately sung, as was the custom, but that does not explain why Bach should have composed and compiled so gigantic a work. It is, at any rate, a monument to his genius, and in many ways is a standard by which we may measure religious music, for here you will find no petty expression of a mood, no mere theatrical picturesqueness, and none of the sensuous mystery which many composers have mistaken for religious feeling. The Mass in B minor is a mass for all mankind. Probably written as an expression of a creed, the genius of the composer has lifted it far above liturgies or rituals, so that it appeals to the innate sense of religion in every man, whatever his belief or disbelief may be.

The performance the other day by the Huddersfield Choir at the Queen's Hall brought out both the grandeur of the music and its simple tenderness. In London we are not accustomed to such performances. Now and then the Mass is sung with great difficulty, and one has been most impressed by the efforts made by the choir and soloists. Done in this way the Mass in B minor seems a rough-hewn, inarticulate work of art, through which the composer endeavoured to express something greater than his means would allow. Nor is it difficult to see why this should be so. In a modern work the music is more specially characteristic of the moods and ideas it is supposed to express, and it is possible for a choir to make a kind of spurious effect. And, of course, in a modern work there is always the orchestral background.

But in Bach's Mass the emotional effects are obtained by absolute music. There is very little that is descriptive or objective. For instance, the "Cum Sancto Spiritu" is practically composed to a fugue. If sung tamely but with precision it will remain a fugue, but if the right emotion be put into it, and the singers are capable of their work, it rises to such a vivid and imposing climax that it becomes an act of heroic worship. The same subjective expression is to be found in the "Credo in Unum Deum" and the "Et Resurrexit." To the modern musician it may seem strange that florid vocal runs should find a place in a religious work. In modern music they would be considered an absurd affectation. Yet in Bach's hands these runs were wonderfully expressive of exultant joy. And then consider how he bent every form of music to his purpose; how he wrote a Chaconne which is one of the noblest things in all music; how he was able to weave a Passecaille into the "Crucifixus" of this very Mass in B minor.

The great impression made by this titanic work should give us pause. If music has advanced so much, how is it that the Mass in B minor still appeals to all classes of musicians, and to the general body of amateurs, with irresistible force? To say that Bach was a great genius does not explain everything, for genius or not we have still to face the fact that the means by which this old music uplifts our imagination are very different from the means by which modern music achieves the same aim. According to all theories, we ought not to be able to listen to this music. It must be confessed that the writing for solo voices, with the vague meandering accompaniment of wood-wind, is a trial to the spirit. The ear rebels against the sharp contrast of these interminable solos with the vital, organic strength of the choruses, and, indeed, Bach has shown the limitations of an age which had not begun to treat the human voice as distinct from an instrument. The history of the polyphonic school of vocal composition is a strange commentary on the growth of the art. From complexity to simplicity seems an unnatural step. And quite as unnatural was the manner in which instrumental writing learnt much from vocal writing, and the voice in its turn was taught much by the instrument. It is still more strange that Bach's choruses should seem so full of emotion, although they were written from the "absolute" music point of view. In the "Et Incarnatus" and in the "Crucifixus," with its solemn diminuendo at the close, we have a modern descriptive touch, it is true. With a fuller and more expressive orchestration they might have been written by a genius of to-day, who recognised the imaginative and suggestive force of simplicity. Yet these numbers, beautiful as they are, have not more emotion than the choruses in which Bach employed all the formal devices of musical construction that his mind could invent. It looks as if music has its own way of conveying feeling, and is not to be judged by the canons of æsthetic right and wrong. In theory it is quite wrong, for instance, that the words of a mass should be bandied about in a fugue until they are lost in a maze of sound. The world has rebelled against this procedure in opera, and for the sake of what is called dramatic truth we have lost the emotional effect of concerted music.

But it must be pointed out that although these purely musical devices do destroy the sense of the words which are caught up by them, the spirit remains and is magnified. The "Sanctus" of the B minor Mass is an instance of this. Its opening is calculated for impressive grandeur of sound, but the second part of the number is a fugue remarkable for its brilliant and florid passages. Now, in theory this should sound as a piece of massive academic writing, but when you hear it finely sung, with energy, precision, and expression, it conveys in mighty sound the very spirit of the immortal words to which the music is wed.

Letters to the Editor.

THE SIZE AND COST OF THE FLEET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The usual cry raised by persons in close association with contractors, or by editors in search of sensation and circulation, is now going up that the Naval estimates ought not to be reduced. They are only ten millions more than they were ten years ago. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's Admiralty only throws ten millions more into the sea than Lord Salisbury's; only takes ten millions more from the pockets of the people for the Navy; and the extra cost is easily provided by the sugar and tea duties (or if you like by the income tax). And how cheap it really is when one considers the security! But then, on the other hand, Mr. Haldane says there is no security; and things are so bad that he too must spend eight or nine millions more than, say, Lord Lansdowne did in 1898, and must introduce a sort of moral compulsion into volunteering which will lead (as the National Service League tells us) gently and by easy steps to a proper system of conscription.

As a matter of hard fact and dry reason, the present level of expenditure, both for Army and Navy, is utterly uncalled-for, whether we view it from the point of view of preparing for war, or enjoying the fruits of peace. Take the case of the Navy, which is usually supposed to be a hard nut to crack.

1. In 1898 there was a very possible combination of France and Russia against us, and this combination was far stronger in proportion to the British Navy at that time than is the German Navy now.

2. The German Navy is considered by good authorities to be only about a quarter the strength of ours, taking all factors into consideration—the size, speed, and age of battleships and cruisers, &c., &c. Why should we be terrified then if the German Navy Estimates for a year or two should be two-thirds of our own? We are informed that the German authorities have recently prepared a memorandum, which they are showing to their National Liberal Imperialists, according to which the Germany Navy is less than a quarter the strength of ours. They are also aware that the present Liberal Government is responsible for one of those "secret" memorandums, in which the policy of destroying German commerce is coolly avowed as a valuable weapon. How much mischief this document has done will never be known; its author was doubtless unaware of the simple fact that almost every German merchant ship would be insured in Great Britain, and that the policy of destroying merchant ships and merchandise at sea would never be tolerated by civilised opinion.

3. The German Navy Estimates, if continued at the present height would, in the course of four or five years, create a Germany Navy about half the size of ours. But they have already helped to produce a huge deficit, and something very like a financial crisis in Germany. The country is groaning under taxation. The Centre Party and the Socialists are making louder and louder complaints. The Radical Wing of the Bloc is uneasy and almost mutinous. The Conservatives are not enthusiastic about the navy, and will not hear of direct taxes, while the National Liberals (who are the German Jingoese) will not hear of indirect taxes. Everything points to the present naval estimates being cut down this year, or to the Government coming to grief; and in any case there is no likelihood of the German naval expenditure being maintained at this height much longer. The split in the German Navy League is highly significant, and the defection of the Bavarians and Southern Germans shows how strongly the current is running in the south against the Government's naval extravagances. It is clearly our policy to reply by reduced estimates, and make it plain that in a few years' time, if the Germans show any sign of really challenging our predominance at sea, we shall be ready to lay down two vessels for every one laid down by Germany. We shall then (thanks to our moderation and economy) be able to outbuild and outclass Germany with the greatest ease.

This brings me to a point which is now always forgotten, and has been quite untouched by his Majesty's present advisers since they took office, though they spoke about it a good deal while they were in Opposition. The point is a vital one, and it has never been better put than by Disraeli in the spring of 1857, when he joined with Gladstone and Lord John Russell in an attack on the naval and military estimates of that year because they showed an excess of three millions sterling (not twenty) over those of 1853, the year before the war. Disraeli said: "I hope that the glory of the late war will not induce the people of this country to sanction extravagant military establishments. I will express my opinion that with due economy and with able administration the more you reduce the burdens of the people the greater will be your strength when the hour of danger comes." These words ought to be pondered by every Liberal Member of Parliament between now and the next Session. If he is worth his salt he will refuse to be a party to the continuance of this burden. And if he makes it plain that he will give effect to his pledges in the lobby, a way will be found to give official expression to his opinions. Otherwise the Budget of social reform and the remission of popular burdens will prove a fiasco; for trade and revenue are on the down grade, and unemployment is slowly but surely creeping forward.—Yours, &c.,

RETRENCHMENT.

London, December 17th, 1907.

THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One more word and we will embrace and part. You will be relieved to hear that your mistake belongs to the fruitful, not the fruitless class of mistakes. Your second note to my second letter really shows up the chief blunder of our time; it shows it up so clearly that I can hardly believe that you do not see it yourselves. It is the source not only of the weakening of Christianity but of the decay of democracy and the frightful danger of Liberalism.

You have got it into your head that "development" is in some way opposed to having a "cast-iron creed." Exactly the opposite is the truth. You cannot possibly have any development unless you do have a cast-iron creed. For instance, Euclid has a cast-iron creed, and therefore Euclid develops proposition after proposition, book after book, rider after rider. Geometry could go on for ever. But you will not help geometry to further flights by questioning its axioms. On the contrary, question a dot in one of its axioms and Euclid will break down suddenly and cease in the middle of a proposition; to the joy of many happy schoolboys.

This is so universally true that I would rather take any example than that of religion. Take politics. Your True Christianity perpetually reminds me of True Free Trade; which dogmatists and coarse fellows call Protection. It reminds me even more of the way in which Lord Rosebery and the Liberal Imperialists tried to nobble Liberalism just before the South African War. You and I (who were, I hope, pro-Boers) were always being asked to "develop" Liberalism. Lord Rosebery said to us exactly what you say to Catholics; that we had antiquated doctrines and wore "phylacteries." And you and I answered Lord Rosebery exactly as I answer you. "We are quite willing to develop Liberalism, but, hang it all, there is some Liberalism to develop." According to Lord Rosebery and the rest the next development of Liberalism was to cease to be a Liberal. So, according to you, the next step in Catholicism is to cease to be a Catholic.

It is a pleasant thought that most of the people on this paper took the Catholic view of Liberalism, while Lord Rosebery took the Modernist view of it. He thought that the Liberal creed could change its meaning. He thought that being a Liberal might some day mean being an Imperialist, just as you think that being a believer may some day mean being an unbeliever. We believed, for instance, in national self-government, but we admitted that we had only recently learnt to apply it to Irishmen and to Boers. The Liberal Imperialist idea of progress was expressed in doubting Nationalism itself and wondering whether all the imperial oppressors had not been right from the time of Xerxes.

In everything, in short, there are two opposite kinds of progress. We wanted to go on and fulfil our ideals. Lord Rosebery wanted to go back and question them. Anyone is free to use this second method with regard to anything; he can call it development, or he can call it apple dumplings, if he likes. But he must not use the name of Newman or the name of Euclid. He must not apply it to democracy or apply it to Catholicism. A man who is always going back and picking to pieces his own first principles may be having an amusing time; but he is not developing as Newman understood development. Newman meant that if you wanted a tree to grow you must plant it finally in some definite spot. It may be (I do not know and I do not care) that Catholic Christianity is just now passing through one of its numberless periods of undue repression and silence. But I do know this, that when the great flowers break forth again, the new epics and the new arts, they will break out on the ancient and living tree. They cannot break out upon the little shrubs that you are always pulling up by the roots to see how they are growing.

The plain mental fact for us here is that you cannot develop any ideas except from fixed axioms, which must not change their meaning. But in conclusion I cannot help expressing my mystification at your strange answer to my third question. You take an alleged Syrian thaumaturgist in the time of Tiberius, and you affirm that this man is still living and conscious in the universe and important enough to receive all our devotion. And then you say that this is not a creed. Surely the test is quite simple. Go out into the street and ask the first good, jolly Agnostic you meet what he would call it.—Yours, &c.,

G. K. CHESTERTON.

P.S.—Touching what Anglo-Catholics “appeal to,” you can find it in the earlier works of Newman (of whom you may have heard), and in the whole literature of the Oxford Movement, which you were supposed to be criticising. It is about Councils.

[We are glad that Mr. Chesterton at last shows some appreciation of the idea of development in religion, though he must surely be aware that no proper comparison lies between the development of Euclid’s propositions from the axioms and the development of Christianity from its earliest forms and records.—ED., THE NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think that one of the surest signs of the decline of the Oxford movement is to be seen in the fact that the defence of it should have fallen into the hands of Mr. Chesterton. We all admire Mr. Chesterton as a lively paradoxical and amusing literary critic. He is quite admirable in this department, and in his own amusing and paradoxical manner he has often something really valuable to say.

But when he leaves ground on which he is at home and attempts to teach philosophers, theologians, and historians not merely on matters of opinion but, what is infinitely more important, on matters of fact he ceases to be amusing and becomes ridiculous.

It is not with you but with Dr. Lightfoot that he is quarrelling when he disputes the assertion that the spirit of Christianity is to be seen at its best in a Personality and not in a Creed. Mr. Chesterton seems to be fond of the principle of authority. Will he maintain in this matter that his opinion is of greater weight than Lightfoot’s? It is personalities not decrees of Trent or Thirty-nine articles which move the souls of men.

It fills Mr. Chesterton with despair to be told that Creeds change their meaning. Let us illuminate his mind with a simple example. The decay of the Ptolemaic and the rise of the Copernican system has completely changed the meaning of several clauses of the Apostles’ Creed among Christian communities who use it in public worship. “He descended into Hell; He ascended into Heaven” cannot be repeated in the same sense by the twentieth century as they were by the fourth or fifth. If a Creed containing such clauses is to be retained at all it must be treated symbolically not literally. In this case a Copernican meaning must be read into a Ptolemaic formula. What applies to the cosmology of Creeds applies more or less to their metaphysics and their historical assertions. The value of Creeds does not reside in their cosmology or their metaphysics or their historical statements; it is to be found in their religious content. This I took to be the meaning of your article.

Finally, it may interest Mr. Chesterton to be told that the Christian Church has got no Catholic Creed. The Athanasian and Apostles’ Creeds are not the standards of the Eastern Church, and the Nicene Creed as used in the East is rejected by the Churches of the West. If Christianity is a Creed it must be in a perilous state, for none of the so-called Catholic Creeds are really Catholic, that is to say universally accepted by Christendom.

Other points might be mentioned in which Mr. Chesterton is equally at sea. But enough has been said to show that he should leave theology alone, and stick to matters on which I for one always listen to him with delight.—Yours, &c.,

A READER.

Reform Club, Pall Mall, S.W.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are one or two points I will venture to glance at in your admirable article, “Crime and Punishment.” You are severe on what is known as the indeterminate sentence, because this sentence is “entirely out of harmony with the general principles of English law.” English law, taken in the mass, and considered as the law of the twentieth century, is perhaps not so supremely fine an affair that we must or need condemn offhand proposals not compliant with its general principles. Since the law began, one of our principal concerns with it has been to mend it; and it has usually been less important to make new schemes reflect old laws than to modify old laws in accordance with new ways of thinking. There is a useless and cruel form of the indeterminate sentence, and there is a sensible one. I would shut no man up without the hope of release, which is the indeterminate sentence at its worst. A prisoner confined on these terms is deprived of every motive but that of suicide. But if, in giving him a maximum sentence (and it would matter nothing whether this were three or three hundred years), you gave him at the same time to understand that the keys of prison were more or less in his own hands, and that he could release himself when he had shown himself fit to be released, you would at once provide him with the best of reasons for making a strong fight in his own true behalf. Decisions in this matter would be bound to rest in some measure with the prison governor and chaplain, but it would have them assisted by an independent committee; and on this committee I should be little inclined to appoint an ordinary justice of the peace. Some such method as this works fairly well, I believe, at Elmira, and it is not unsuccessfully on trial at Borstal.

Your second point is “an extension of the principle of conditional liberation.” Conditional liberation, with us, is the ticket-of-leave system, which—as we work it—must be almost unreservedly condemned. If we could get a commission of inquiry into this system, we should find that it saves no criminals and makes many. The ticket-of-leave is solely an affair for the police, and this fine service shows here at its least useful and its most harmful. It is of no consequence at what period of his sentence the convict is discharged from prison, if he is afterwards to be kept for a term of years under the supervision of police who may drop on him at any moment. Hold him in prison as long as it may be necessary to do so, but on his release let him be unconditionally free.

A question of questions is: What to do with the ex-convict on his return to the world? Society shuts the door in his face. I refer your readers to an article by Mr. Reginald Statham in the current “Fortnightly.”—Yours, &c.,

TIGHE HOPKINS.

THE NOISE NUISANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Allow me to congratulate the writer of your leading article on fog, and its deadly results, which appears in your last number. The damage done to property of all kinds by London atmospheric filth is known to every householder who has to pay a heavy bill each year for removing or concealing it in his own house. And as to the bills we pay to doctors and chemists, and the loss of work we incur through unprevented preventible diseases, if stated in £ s. d., the figures would be so gigantic that no one would believe them. They would pay ten times over the expenses to which your article refers.

You have pleaded eloquently for one form of civilisation in the shape of an organised attack on dirt. Will you allow me to add a word on unnecessary and hideous noise? An express train ran through a junction the other day shrieking its loudest from one end of the station to the other. I said to the station master standing by, "Is there any necessity for that hideous noise being added to the noise the train must make as it passes through the station?" He replied, "None whatever, and unnecessary noise means unnecessary confusion and danger. In my opinion, there should be two kinds of sounds used, one a low one, like the bell on an American engine, or a low-toned whistle for ordinary signalling, and the other a shrill note, never to be used except in cases of actual danger. Such a system would be far safer and more effectual than what we have now." Can you persuade the directors of our railway companies to act on the common sense of one of the most experienced of their own station masters, and earn the gratitude of many thousands of travellers, specially of delicate women, to whom noise of this kind means torture?—Yours, &c.,

FREDERICK VERNEY.

P.S.—A young mechanical engineer has lately written a paper showing how a very small and inexpensive addition to the existing mechanism would produce a lower note, while maintaining the shriek when required.

House of Commons Library.

December, 1907.

HOOD'S POETRY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was very glad to read your appreciative notice of Tom Hood, but I regretted that you omitted from the list of poems that would live two poems less known than those which you mention, but in very different ways, more remarkable, perhaps, than any of the better known poems. These are the "Workhouse Clock" and the exquisite sonnet beginning, "Love, dearest Lady, such as I would speak." The former seems to show a real sympathy with the monotonous pleasures of the paupers, coupled with a deep sense of the pathos of that monotony, which goes perhaps deeper, and is certainly more unique than, even the sympathy with actual suffering shown in "The Song of the Shirt." The sonnet will, of course, at once recall Shakespeare's celebrated sonnet, "Let me not to the marriage of true minds." But I venture to think that Hood's is no mere imitation. Indeed, if it is not blasphemy to say so, I would venture to suggest that there is a tenderer and more thoroughly human note in the later poet's sonnet than in that of his great prototype.—Yours, &c.,

C. E. MAURICE.

Eirene Cottage, Gainsborough Gardens,
Hampstead.

December 16th, 1907.

THE ENTENTE IN FORESTRY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—During a recent visit to some of the extensive forests in the North of France there was brought to my notice a remarkable instance of the rapprochement that is beginning to exist between the higher State officials of France and Germany in connection with sylvicultural matters. Dr. A. Schwappach, of Eberswalde, near Berlin, in a recent letter I have received from him, refers in terms of high praise to a notable work he had been reviewing from the pen of Mons. Huffel, namely, his "Economie Forestière," in two volumes. All the world knows the position Dr. Schwappach holds in forestry milieux—that is to say, that the learned Professor is facile princeps, and praise from him reminds one of the judicious remark to be found in one of Cicero's letters: Laudari a laudato viro. Perhaps I may be permitted, therefore, to draw public attention to the Doctor's most recent work, "Wald und Forstwirtschaft," which deals with the economical principles of sylviculture as well as from the side of practical utility. It contains also many very beautiful illustrations. In this work Dr. Schwappach, besides writing in his own inimitably picturesque style, gives some apt quotations on the aesthetic importance of forestry. He writes: "Not without good reason has the forest been called the 'Queen of landscapes' ('der Aristokrat der Landschaften'). This sense of the aesthetic importance of woodlands is particularly pronounced among Teutonic nations, and gives rise to much surprise and disappointment in Germans when visiting regions situated in more favoured climes, but which are destitute of, or at all events thinly provided with, woods—as is the case, for instance, in countries bordering on the Mediterranean Sea. A forest exercises a peculiar charm on the human mind. The stillness and quiet; the sublime peacefulness which even nowadays is found to pervade the larger forests situated at some distance from busy towns; the subdued daylight (die gedämpfte Beleuchtung); the ever-changing effects of light and shade; the pleasant coolness during summer heat and the shelter afforded against rude winter blasts; the mysterious rustling in the tree-tops overhead; in a word, a series of pleasant sensations (Reihe schoener Einwirkungen) combine to evoke sentiments which exert a calming and elevating influence upon the feelings of men."

Dr. Schwappach also makes the interesting statement that the oldest system of sylviculture exists in Japan. "There we find," says he, "an instance probably unique in the whole history of forestry of a nation not only having with judgment exploited its forests for over a thousand years, but also having been creating in recent times new ones calculated to last for millenniums."

Considering the large powers which are wisely given to the Board of Agriculture under the Small Holdings Act coming into force on January 1st next, there need be no insurmountable difficulty in securing suitable areas for afforestation. It is a source of satisfaction to think that we are at least within measurable distance of seeing in practice shortly a "policy of results" as regards land reform in England, opening up new avenues of employment in our rural districts—a policy traceable in no small degree to the persistent powerful advocacy of the "Speaker," and its present-day valiant successor. It is certain that we have much yet to learn from the Continent and elsewhere before it can be said that we are fully abreast of the times and thoroughly awake to our future needs, and the new possibilities of human progress of to-day in respect of this great national question.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES HANCOCK, B.L.

(of Roy. Scott. Arboricultural Society).

Reform Club, S.W.

November 25th, 1907.

JAPAN IN KOREA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having the good of our country very much at heart, and knowing, as we well do, the great misery and the state of unrest the Japanese occupation of Korea has and is occasioning it, we venture to give you, for the benefit of your many readers, a short summary of the true facts of the case, concerning the relations which have existed and are existing between these two nations of the East.

Japan professes that she reformed the currency system in Korea, but what has been done is simply to bankrupt thousands of Korean merchants. Yet Japanese publicists and statesmen maintain that whatever they do in Korea is good for the Koreans.

Mr. Megata, the new advisor to the finance department, arrived in the autumn of 1905, and began a study of Korean monetary and financial conditions. This should have been an augury of good, for Korean finance has always been in a more or less chaotic condition, instead of which it became worse than ever.

Mark the action of the man who controlled the finances of the country—a Japanese. The country was flooded with counterfeit nickels made largely by Japanese in Osaka, and brought over to Korea by the million. The adviser determined that the Korean Government should borrow several million yen from the Japanese, and with it make a new currency to substitute for the one in use. When it was learned that Korea was to pay six per cent. for this money, Korean financiers came forward and said that they would lend their Government the necessary money at a far lower rate. They did it to keep Korea out of debt to Japan, but the adviser refused to allow it. A few million dollars' worth of nickels were made in Japan, where the Japanese enjoyed the profit, which amounted to over fifty per cent., and the nickels were sent to Korea. The adviser announced that on June 1st, or about then, everybody who brought nickels would receive the new ones at par with the Japanese money, but would receive the new one for two of the old. When the day of exchange came, it was found that the supply of new nickels was entirely inadequate. So the exchange was put off for two months; then for another two months. Meanwhile the Korean merchants were going to the wall because they could not meet their notes, owing to the tightness of the money market. Some of them were trying to save themselves by borrowing from Japanese usurers at six per cent. a month. At this most painful juncture the Emperor proposed to lend some three hundred thousand dollars of his private funds to his suffering merchants; but when he sent his cheque to the Japanese bank, where his funds were deposited, the Japanese adviser ordered payment to be stopped, and would not let him draw out his private funds even to help the merchants in their desperate straits. There is no language too strong in which to denounce this outrage.

An American resident in one of the forts of Korea related to the editor of the "Korean Review" the case of a Korean landowner who lost his property through the following piece of trickery. A Japanese employed a disreputable Korean to work out a false deed of the land and, armed with this, went to take possession. The real owner exhibited the true and incontestable deeds; but when the matter was referred to the Japanese authorities, the false deeds carried the day, and the man who had held the property for years was summarily ejected.

A Japanese refused to pay his fare on the Seoul electric cars and was put off. He ran into a near-by Korean rice shop, turned the rice out of a bag, placed it on the track, and lay down upon it. He defied the Korean motor-man to ride over him. No one dared to touch him, for this would have been the signal for a bloody reprisal on the part of Japanese who lived all about. When the company complain of such things, they are told by the Japanese authorities that they can be easily avoided by employing Japanese.

We could not explain all the daily Japanese actions here, although there were hundreds of similar cases in the past.—Yours, &c.,

SAUL SANG LEE,
JAMES HUNCHU SONG.

30, Elgin Mansions, Maida Vale,
London, W.

December, 1907.

THE RUIN OF MACEDONIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having some personal acquaintance with the land and the people, I venture to offer a few remarks thereon. Many years ago, before the zigzag railway line filled the pockets of Baron Hirsch, I travelled by waggon, by taktarauan (palanquin), and on horseback, from Salonica to Belgrade, remaining some days on the way in the Bulgarian monastery of Rilo. At that time we were wholly ignorant of any Slavonic language. But in many words which we picked up and wrote down we were struck by the cacophony of the incessantly returning "to" and "ta," which is the article affixed in Bulgaria to the noun, and which is one of the easily marked signs distinguishing it from the Serb. From Monastir onward the people spoke Bulgarian. We visited a Bulgarian school in a short ride from the town where the population was Bulgarian. To my astonishment I was assured by a Serb some years later that the population was actually Serb in most places on the route, but that they had adopted the Bulgarian language in order to escape the hostility of the Turks, who were afraid of Free Serbia, and also to curry favour with the English who favoured the Bulgars. This fiction was advanced in a book by Gopcevic, a notorious Serb chauvinist, hailing from Trieste.

As to Greeks, there was no trace of any north of Monastir. The frequent mention of "L'Eglise Grecque," so commonly applied to the Orthodox Eastern Church, has misled many. Some academic souls with their love of symmetry are still asserting that the Balkan Peninsula should become Greek in order to match the Italian Peninsula, which is Latin. The term Greek Church has been misleading; and it matters not, in this sense, whether the particular branch be Patriarchate or Exarchate. Setting aside all hair-splitting arguments, and all the varying statements as to this and that patch of Greek or Serb villages in Macedonia, the one broad and main fact in the present situation is that Serb, Bulgarian, and Greek bands are robbing, murdering, and devastating in the land, and that these practices are being connived at and promoted by Turks and Turkish misgovernment. The Ottoman rule in Europe can neither mend nor be mended; and the immediate establishment of a government worthy the name, without further sham or delay, is imperatively demanded of civilised humanity.—Yours, &c.,

A. P. IRBY.

POOR LAW AND OLD AGE PENSIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many ideas are in the air, and all kinds of discussions are going on; but there seems to be a disposition (possibly a wise one) to wait for the Report of the Royal Commission and see what it recommends.

The Royal Commission will deal with Poor Law matters and I shall be greatly surprised if it touches the question of universal old-age pensions at all considering the number of C.O.S. representatives among the Commissioners.

But the idea of utilising at least a portion of our hideous expenditure on Poor Law has possessed the minds of most of us who have thought about any scheme of universal pensions.

The Poor Law Commissioners should advise that in future the energies of Guardians should be confined to the management of institutions solely, and that all the out-door relief and medical attendance on the externs should pass to the Councils from some future date when the pension scheme is matured.

At the same time it is to be hoped that all contracts will be taken away from the Guardians and relegated to a central store under Government, from which the Guardians and, if they wished it, all other institutions (such as hospitals and schools) under public management could get their stores at a vastly reduced price.

If all out-door and medical relief become part of the Council's duty the money now used for the pauper would pass through other hands than Poor Law officials and would lose its taint, relief in kind would cease, and a money equivalent take its place, and this would all form some portion of the new universal pension.

Medical attendance ought to accompany any real scheme of old-age pensions, but I fear to complicate the scheme and add difficulties. The pensions would thus be paid through the Councils and be entirely distinct from Poor Law, and, by means of a little co-operation between the post offices and the Councils, might be arranged with very little addition to the existing staff of officials. Probably all that would be required would be a considerable increase in the number of postal orders for 5s., and a larger amount of silver must be put into currency. The effect on our villages will be considerable and, I believe, beneficial.—Yours, &c.,

December 16th, 1907.

ARTHUR W. JEPHSON.

CATTLE - DRIVING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I notice that, in a recent issue, you describe cattle-driving in Ireland as "the opening of gates by farmers' boys on cattle ranches in lonely districts." Assuming it to be impossible that you desired deliberately to mislead your readers, one is forced to conclude that you have not given the question the attention which its importance deserves. It seems strange that you are not aware that in most cases the drives are carried out by large bodies of men, and are carefully organised and directed. Generally, the operations are instigated and planned by the local branches of the United Irish League. Those participating are often armed with stones, sticks, and agricultural implements; they openly defy the remonstrances of the police, and are prepared to resist opposition by violence. It is true that the movement started in the lonely districts of the West. It has spread, however, to the populous and prosperous counties near Dublin, and, as it develops, it is accompanied by a general increase of the spirit of lawlessness and disorder. That little injury is done to the victims cannot be maintained. The chief inciters openly proclaim the triumphs of their campaign, and their triumph means the ruin of cattle-raising. Even if this system deserves all the hard things said of it, those engaged in what was, a year ago, a recognised and profitable occupation should be protected in the enjoyment of the elementary rights of a citizen, until a reasonable solution of the land question can be effected. There is a grave danger that lack of timely firmness, by encouraging the elements of disorder, may ultimately involve a resort to the extreme policy of coercion.—Yours, &c.,

ONE LATELY RETURNED FROM IRELAND.

[The point of the phrase to which our correspondent objects is that it is impossible to put down cattle-driving because, if the semi-public drives are put down, the trouble can obviously be kept up by such means as we suggested.—ED., THE NATION.]

THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE REFERENDUM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There are many Liberals who heartily agree with Mr. Asquith's criticism of the House of Lords, but are puzzled by his summary dismissal of the Referendum.

The matter is serious, for we are face to face with an agitation against the House of Lords in which it is essential to success that we should know clearly what we want. No one defends the present House of Lords. A chamber dominated permanently by one party, a chamber in which only three times in thirty years have a third of its members taken part in a division, a chamber which passed the Education Bill of 1902 and the Trades Disputes Bill of 1906, is past defending. On the other hand, Liberal speakers anxiously protest that they are against a single chamber. But if we are against a single chamber and against a House of Lords, what escape is there except a referendum?

The problem and its difficulty are brought home to Liberals by the Tariff Reform movement, as they never were to Tories by the Home Rule movement. The House of Lords could be trusted to throw out any scheme of Home Rule. It cannot be trusted to throw out any scheme for Protection.

Yet the position of the two questions is essentially alike. Each is a question of supreme importance to the country. Each is keenly opposed by a small but powerful section of the party which has adopted it. Neither measure, if once passed into law, could easily be repealed. Tariff Reformers and Irish members are equally reckless in pressing forward the one measure they have at heart.

The plain man asks what security is there that neither Home Rule nor Tariff Reform shall become law unless and until the country is persuaded. He wants to vote against the Tories, but he does not always want to vote for Home Rule. He wants to vote against the Liberals, but he does not always want to vote for Protection. What security has he that an Election such as 1895, which condemned the Liberals; or an Election such as 1906, which condemned the Tories, will not bring Protection or Home Rule with it?

The House of Lords is no safeguard, against Protection at any rate. The logical solution of a second chamber with a permanent opposition majority has few supporters. The Government plan is in essence a single chamber. Strip away the veils of polite conferences, and the result is indisputable. If the Liberals win the next Election with a majority, no matter how small, they can carry Home Rule. If the Tories win, they can carry Protection. The House of Lords may dissuade; it cannot prevent either measure from passing.

Now there are many Liberals—of whom I am one—who would gladly trust a single chamber with triennial elections. But I venture to think that such a scheme is not regarded as likely to carry the country. Yet we have to answer the plain question: are we or are we not prepared to allow a "mere majority" of the House of Commons to carry Home Rule or Protection as the case may be? To avoid the question is to court certain and deserved disaster. But if we are not prepared to allow a "mere majority" of the House of Commons to prevail, what other safeguard have we to offer than a Referendum?

We are told that a Referendum is slow. It may be. At least it is decisive and not cowardly. We are told that it undermines the responsibility of the representatives, and the interest in elections. Any second chamber must detract from the responsibility of the first, and must do so precisely in proportion to its own power and influence. That is a fundamental condition of the problem we have to solve. But setting Switzerland aside, where cantonal interests are paramount, what evidence is there that a Referendum is incompatible with a strong representative Parliament?—Yours, &c.,

G. L. BRUCE.

Loughton, December 14th, 1907.

Poetry.

MARY AT DAWN.

A XMAS SONG.

THE dark wise kings on desert path
Seek every one his land,
The waiting camels track their way
Across the sea of sand.

No mystic odour clouds the air,
—Such spices wait for death—
About the Mother's manger bed
The crushed hay's fragrant breath.

The shepherds seek again their flocks
In fear the lambs may stray,
While they have followed so afar
The Star upon its way.

Only the ox and ass have right
To bide in stable walls;
And through one broken chink above
A streak of dawn light falls.

'Tis sweeter so—my heart takes rest;
Only the beasts may low,
While Christ Child sleeps within my arms—
Such human joy I know

As mothers in their safe low homes—
For this one hour I fold
In common love my babe of earth,
By Gabriel unforecast.

L. STUDDIFORD MCCHESENEY.

Reviews.

THE BISHOP OF THE REVOLUTION.*

In the preface to this volume Miss Foxcroft expresses the hope that the general reader, as well as the historical student, may be attracted by the picture it presents of a varied career and a vivacious personality. Perhaps it would be impossible to give greater praise to an admirable book than to say that this hope is not likely to be disappointed. It would be easy for the biographer of a man who played so many and such bustling parts—controversialist, statesman, diplomatist, court preacher, Bishop, dabbler in science, and amicus curiae to more than one Court, to more than one Church, and to more than one nation—to overwhelm the reader with the vast mass of his material. This book has escaped that fate, and perhaps it owes something to the unusual circumstances of its moderation. Dr. Clarke and Miss Foxcroft had both set out to write a life of Burnet, and they decided to join forces. Dr. Clarke describes the thirty-one years Burnet spent in Scotland; Miss Foxcroft the forty-one he spent elsewhere. This arrangement has doubtless helped to simplify the task of selection and concentration. However that may be, one of the conspicuous merits of this excellent work is its success in bringing its formidable subject within a tolerable compass.

Burnet is pre-eminently a man to appeal to the general reader. There is nothing obscure or difficult about his character. The unmistakable silhouette of his ample figure conceals no unexpected trick of mind or character. His candour would have made disguise difficult, his vanity made it impossible.

"So fond of loud report that not to miss
Of being known (his last and utmost bliss)
He rather would be known for what he is."

There was more than an element of truth in Dryden's bitter and brilliant sketch. And Burnet's most conspicuous achievements were of a kind that everybody can understand. He was less successful as a dialectician than as a Bishop. Malice might have said of him, with an eye on his prosperous marriages and his external career, that successful as he was as a Bishop, he was still more successful as a man. After all, was anything about him more remarkable than the charmed life which survived so many dangers that were fatal to men of infinitely greater discretion? He lived at a time when it was not unusual to pay the capital penalty for a false step, and yet the most tactless man of the day who had been the friend of one king whom he compared to Tiberius, and of another who made him an outlaw, who quarrelled with the "Grand Vizier" of Scotland, whose name was so detested by his political opponents that his coffin was stoned by a Clerkenwell mob, who was fearless enough as a youth to rebuke the Bishops to whom he was subject and to admonish a king at his first meeting for his private vices, this man who owed nothing to caution, still less to circumspection, died in his bed of a distinguished old age. In turn the friend, the counsellor, and the enemy of two slippery kings and their most unprincipled Minister, Burnet who had stood by Warriston and by Russell on the scaffold might well have said, like Sieyès when he was asked which was his most considerable achievement in the Revolution, "Nous avons vécu."

The most important thing that Burnet did has been ascribed by Macaulay to this very quality of tactlessness. Only an indiscreet friend, he argues, who could blurt out the truth, could have removed the constraint between William and Mary, and suggested to Mary that she should arrange to transfer to her husband a power which he was too proud to demand or to forego. That act helped to simplify a difficult situation and when he offered to accompany William's expedition as chaplain, the offer could scarcely be declined. But if he earned the Prince's gratitude he never gained his heart. Between Mary and Burnet, during the last years of her life, there was a close sympathy, and Burnet spoke sincerely when he said he had never admired any other person "so entirely." Even William was impressed by Burnet's loyalty to the Queen, but he dreaded his garrulity and he smarted under his awkward compliments. More than once he found relief for his feelings in some neat sally, such as his remark when Burnet was disporting himself, soon after his appointment to Salisbury, in a very broad shovel hat, that he hoped the hat would not turn his head. But Nature, which had denied Burnet a delicate address, had fortunately given him no tender skin, and it would have taken more than a pin-prick to wound the surface of his complacency. This was a merciful provision, for no man exposed himself so readily to the blows of his critics or received them in more generous measure. Miss Foxcroft analyses his change of opinion on the subject of the morality of resistance to authority to show that the change was spontaneous and sincere, but she says very truly that it was so timed as to give colour to the malice which chose to ascribe it to personal causes. Swift has concentrated in one bitter passage almost all that his enemies could say of Burnet when describing the state of mind in which he wrote his last version of the History.

"But enthusiasm is none of his Lordship's faculty. I am inclined to believe he might be melancholy enough when he writ this introduction. The despair at his age of seeing a faction restored to which he had sacrificed so great a part of his life; the little success he can hope for in case he should resume those high-church principles in defence of which he first employed his pen; no visible expectation of removing to Farnham or Lambeth; and lastly, the misfortune of being hated by everyone who either wears the habit or values the profession of a clergyman;—no wonder such a spirit, in such a situation is provoked beyond the regards of truth, decency, religion, or self-conviction."

But Burnet owed his unpopularity, in part at least, to what Lecky called the contempt of his masculine mind for the questions that were most dear to the Church, and to his broad and tolerant sympathies. In spite of some melancholy lapses, Burnet remained in general the friend of enlightened opinions, and no man was more wholly free from the spirit of ecclesiastical faction. With all his terror of a Catholic ascendancy, a terror which almost turned his head at the last, he was not credulous enough to swallow the Popish plot. His reformed political principles were largely those of Locke, whom he knew, though their relations were never very cordial. Unfortunately, though he had many large and sensible ideas, he gave more than one vote to panic and injustice and he clung to the legend that James II.'s son was a supposititious child with an obstinacy that did him little credit.

This biography is introduced in a most interesting way by Professor Firth on Burnet merely as a historian. Burnet was a prolific writer, and his History of his own Times is not the only work that has survived him and his century. He had wide, if not very deep, intellectual interests. He crossed a sword on unequal terms with Bossuet; he discussed the Greek Church with Peter the Great; he corresponded with Leibnitz and Van Limborch, and at one stage in his career he found happiness and shelter from politics in the occupations of his laboratory. He had not a great mind, and his treatment of most questions was apt to be superficial. Nowhere does he show himself less of a Scotsman than in his theology. But he had a keen and vigorous intellect, and the epilogue to his History is a remarkably interesting study of the social characteristics of his day. In his History of the Reformation, for which he received the thanks of the House of Commons, he had taken Sarpi's masterpiece as his model; in his final version of his History of his Times, if he was guided by the methods of Dr. Thorn, he was fired by the glories of Clarendon. Professor Firth draws an interesting comparison between Burnet and the historian of the earlier Revolution. Burnet has none of Clarendon's stately dignity, and he never wrote anything that could touch with the pathos of the great passage describing Falkland's last days, of which Mackintosh used to say when asked to read aloud that he could read anything except Clarendon's character of his friend. Burnet is a rough and untidy writer. These faults can be illustrated from a passage which it is interesting to quote as a sketch of the state of the Universities:

"I thought the greatest prejudice the Church was under was from the ill-education of the clergy. In the Universities they for the most part lost the learning they brought with them from the schools, and learned so very little in them that commonly they came from them less knowing than when they went to them, especially the servitors, who, if they had not a very good capacity and were very well disposed of themselves were generally neglected by their tutors. They likewise learned the airs of vanity and insolence at the Universities. So that I resolved to have a nursery at Salisbury of students of divinity."

* "A Life of Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury," "Scotland, 1643–1674," by T. E. S. Clarke, B.D., Minister of Saltoun; "England, 1672–1715," by H. C. Foxcroft. With an Introduction by C. H. Firth, Regius Professor of Modern History. Cambridge University Press. 15s. net.

But Burnet's History is often singularly alive, and Professor Firth contends with justice that he is more successful in explaining the Revolution of 1688 than Clarendon is in explaining the Revolution of 1649. Burnet knew a great deal about the affairs he recorded, and though his History suffers from the impartial and innocent confidence with which he reproduced truth and legend, all his enemies allowed it a considerable value. "Damn him," said Atterbury, "he has told a great deal of truth, but where did he learn it?" Burnet was not as close to the centre of affairs as Clarendon, but his work is of interest and importance not merely because he was an observant and active and talented and public-spirited man who saw further, did more, and lived longer than most of his contemporaries, but because all his sympathies and character matched so happily the spirit and the characteristics of a Revolution which was sensible rather than glorious, and great in its results rather than in its ideals.

ROBERT AND CLARA SCHUMANN.*

WHILE Schumann's external life was comparatively uneventful, his inner life was so rich and varied that any one volume of reasonable size can necessarily touch only lightly upon certain aspects of it. One could have wished that Dr. Storck's selection of the letters had included more of the purely artistic ones—those in which Schumann laid bare his own thoughts upon music and musicians. But to have given adequate space to letters of this type would have meant the omission of many that Dr. Storck has included; and his book has at any rate this merit, that it gives us something like a full-length portrait of Schumann the man. To the letters themselves, which are grouped into three sections comprising his early period of mental growth, the period of the fight for Clara's hand, and the period of maturity and decline, Dr. Storck has added three interesting introductions, which fill up the gaps in our information that are necessarily left here and there by the letters. Jansen's recent edition of Schumann's letters (1904), and the large biography of Clara Schumann by Litzmann, have thrown much new light upon the lives of the two artists; and of this new material Dr. Storck has made good use. The German text has been rendered into excellent English by Miss Hannah Bryant, who also contributes a short biographical note on the composer.

Schumann is one of the few musicians whose life is interesting for its own sake, apart, that is, from the dramatic or melodramatic interest that men's lives sometimes get from the impact of outer things upon them. Wagner's life, for example, was of the dramatic order. His own inner development is highly interesting in itself; but what lends most colour to his biography is the commotion that he made among men and the commotion they made within him. He played on a large stage, where everyone wore buskins, looked more than life-size, and declaimed their lines sonorously. In writing Schumann's life we can almost disregard the outer world; the only really vital contact he had with it was through Clara; all the rest left his inmost soul practically untouched. For Schumann is almost unique among musicians in this respect, that he thought as seriously about his life as about his art—tried to harmonise the two, to make each the complement and the fulfilment of the other. With the exception of Beethoven, probably no other great musician has been equally anxious to round off not only his aesthetic but his ethical being. He was originally intended not for the career of music but for that of law. The music was in him, however, and had to come out; and, as invariably happens in cases of this kind, his imagination at first was prodigal and undisciplined. His celebrated remark about his having learned more counterpoint from Jean Paul than from any of his teachers was only the young man's usual excuse for going the way his passions take him, rather than the way on which he might be assisted by the wisdom of his elders. Later on he saw his error; even in 1832 he could write: "I now see the inestimable value of theoretical studies; it is only the abuse of them which is harmful." But he could profit by nothing that merely came to him from the outside, without becoming part of his own tissue. "It seems," he writes, "as if I could only assimilate ideas I evolve for myself, so strongly does my whole nature resent any outside stimulus." As with his art, so with his life. He needed to grow, if he was to grow at all, upward from his own roots; and almost from the first he instinctively realised that, for such a nature as his, the flower of his art could only develop simultaneously with that of his life. "My success," he wrote to his mother in 1831, "depends chiefly on my power to live a persistently clean, sober, and reputable life. If I hold fast by this, my good genius, who fairly possesses me at times, will not desert me." It is this quality in him that gives so peculiarly beautiful a character to his love for Clara and his long fight for her against the prejudice, the avarice, and the knavery of her strange father.

Indeed, their love-story stands out exquisitely white and fragrant among the records, often so pitifully muddy, of the loves of musicians. He desired her, not as a woman, but as his muse, or rather as woman and muse in one, the most inspiring of all human communions and the rarest. The singular delicacy of his love for her showed itself incidentally in the fact that when he was editing the "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," he refused to purchase her stubborn father's goodwill by mentioning her name frequently in the journal. And she, for her part, was in every way worthy of such ideal love; such delicacy and such tenacity, such sweetness and such strength, have rarely been united in one woman. In the earlier stages of their acquaintance she was a famous pianist and he was an almost unknown musician. Yet, though she was ten years younger than he, she recognised his genius from the start. She inspired most of the best music that came from him; and when his short career had closed so tragically she bore the shock with a courage that few women with only a tithe of her artistic sensitiveness could have shown. As Dr. Storck says, "It was only when misfortune overtook her, when her happiness was wrecked, that her character showed its true greatness." She, in fact, had set herself, like him, to learn the art of life no less than the art of music. In neither of them did music grow, as it has done in so many other cases, to be a monster that fed ravenously, pitilessly, upon the remainder of the soul, gorging itself and growing fat at the expense of the general mental and moral life of the organism. The Schumanns may not have solved the problem of balancing the claims of life and art—which of us can solve it?—but they at least saw the problem and strove for a solution. Schumann invented his Florestan and his Eusebius as symbols of the "masculine and energetic" and the "feminine and introspective" elements of his nature. It was something to see himself so clearly; many artists never attain even to that elementary knowledge of themselves as a dualism, a conflict of opposites. But when Schumann further conceived his Raro, and placed him above the other two as the quintessence of the wisdom of them both, the final court of appeal from the errors and the imperfections of each of them, he made an attempt at fullness and at the same time reasonableness of life and of art that few musicians are capable of making. Dr. Storck's selection of letters is admirably planned to show the gradual, steady growth of Schumann in the art of knowledge and mastery of himself. A companion volume of the letters of Clara, if we could get one in English, would be unusually interesting.

THE PRIEST AS BIOGRAPHER.*

THE value of hagiology is a question of some interest and debate for all serious students of history. The tendency to underrate it probably arises from a misconception of the way in which it should be treated. The statements of a hagiologist are valuable not as direct evidence to the facts of the saint's life but as indirect evidence of the hagiologist's attitude of mind and of the ideas prevalent at the time at which he writes. When, for instance, a contemporary biographer of St. Thomas Beket relates that a sparrow, pursued by a hawk, called upon St. Thomas and an answering flash of lightning struck the hawk and saved the sparrow, it is not the details of the story which interest the historian, but the light it throws upon the intensity of medieval faith and the nature of medieval ideas of truth. So Mr. Mackintosh's biography of Laud illustrates not so much his hero's life and times as the tendencies of modern Anglo-Catholicism and ecclesiastical ideas of history. To our positive knowledge of the Archbishop, Mr. Mackintosh does not pretend to add; he candidly explains that he has not had access to any great public library, and he makes no attempt to correct or amplify the recent lives of Laud by Messrs. A. C. Benson, Simpkinson, and Hutton. Indeed, so much does this resemble Mr. Hutton's life that it hardly seems required by anything except the interests of the series to which Mr. Mackintosh was invited to contribute.

* "The Letters of Robert Schumann." Selected and edited by Dr. Karl Storck. Translated by Hannah Bryant. Murray. 9s. net.

* "Life of William Laud." By the Rev. W. L. Mackintosh, M.A., sometime Canon-Residentiary of St. Andrew's Cathedral, Inverness. "Great Churchmen" Series. Masters & Co. 3s. 6d.

He pleads, however, his devotion to the memory of Laud as justification, and thinks it curious that such devotion should be considered a disqualification. It depends upon the end in view; if the object is to set up a cult, of course, devotion is essential; if it is to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, it is a bar. And of the truth, some portions of this book—notably the introductory chapter on the English Reformation—are a travesty. Mr. Mackintosh's point of view is indicated by his remark on p. 112, not in criticism, but in justification of the Anglican Church, that "the scholastic explanation of the doctrine excepted, England (!) and Rome are at one in their belief concerning the doctrine of the Real Presence." He thinks that "Wolsey, Colet, and Gardiner have more right to be designated reformers, in the true sense of the word, than Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer" (p. 10). "What," he asks (p. 14) "can be thought of a Primate of all England who under pretext of reforming the Church did his best to overthrow it?" The assumptions here are characteristic of the theological conception of truth. "Either he or I," said Luther of Zwingli, "must be the Devil's minister." Mr. Mackintosh disagrees with Cranmer: therefore Cranmer's reforms are "pretexts," and his real object is the "overthrow" of the Church. Therefore also these so-called reformers are men of evil lives and cankered conversation. Holgate, Archbishop of York, "was forbidden to come to Parliament until an investigation was made into his conduct in regard to another man's wife; and being found guilty was sent to the Tower" (p. 16). Mr. Mackintosh, of course, does not know that the charge against Holgate broke down, and that his committal to the Tower, which did not take place till Mary's reign, was due to his Protestant views and not to his personal vices; for writers of his temperament read only books which suit it. Then follows a reference to Bishop Ponet's case, and it is, equally of course, assumed that the Bishop knew that the woman he married was another man's wife at the time of his marriage. "As to the foreign divines, they seem to have been no better: the first wives of Martin Bucer and Peter Martyr were nuns, and both men held very loose views about divorce" (p. 17); for to the sacerdotal mind a belief in the admissibility of divorce is as heinous an offence as a breach of the Seventh Commandment. Yet Mr. Mackintosh "trusts that he has not been unfair to those who hold opposite opinions" (p. vi). Bucer, Martyr, and others were, however, "incapable foreigners" (p. 18), though on p. 11 the Protestant party carried forward its plans "with consummate ability." That they imported into England a religion "made in Germany" or "made in Switzerland" is charged against them (p. 12), while English Churchmen in the seventeenth century are accused of "the narrowest insularity" (p. 124). Humour is not Mr. Mackintosh's strong point, or he would hardly object to religion because it was "made" abroad; is Catholicism or Christianity itself the product of home industries?

Mr. Mackintosh's attitude towards Laud's work may easily be inferred from his view of the Reformation. It was not a development but a repeal of Cranmer's; the sixteenth century "reformers" were revolutionists; the true reformers were the Caroline divines. This is a variation of the conventional Anglo-Catholic contention that nothing of real importance took place in the sixteenth-century Reformation, and that if there was any change at all, it was because England was Protestant before the Reformation and Catholic after. Laud's work is here represented as a restoration after the revolution. His career is treated exclusively in its ecclesiastical aspect; and hence the story of Laud's martyrdom, while moving enough, becomes unintelligible. He is a martyr to the faith; that is enough for Mr. Mackintosh. He does not see that it was simply because Laud bound the cause of his faith to a secular tyranny that he was executed at all. He fell with Strafford and Charles I. and their political system, while others, as good Catholics as Laud, escaped; no other bishop was brought to the block, and Laud would have lived had he been only a bishop and a Catholic. Mr. Mackintosh distinguishes between the "political Puritan" and the "religious-minded Puritan"; he makes no distinction between the "political Catholic" and the "religious-minded Catholic." Probably he would refuse to admit that a Catholic could be anything but "religious-minded." His object is not to write history but hagiology, and the sufferings of the Anglican clergy are all set down to their religious faith. The canons of ordinary historical criticism are perhaps out of place in the sphere of martyrology, but no amount of unction justifies the assertion that "faithful English clergymen of blameless lives were shipped off to New England to work as slaves in the plantations" (p. 243). Rhetoric which flows unchallenged from the pulpit should be checked in print. Unfortunately, the immunity of the one is a bad preparation for the other. The priest, committed as he is to certain dogmas, has to write his history with one eye at least upon the necessities of his position, and his historical works are almost invariably defences of that position. He goes to history for arguments and not the truth; he starts from premisses which dictate his conclusions; he sees in history what he wants, and only what he wants, to see; his history is the product of his opinions rather than his opinions the product of his historical studies. He sees through a glass darkly, and prefers to do so rather than to clean the glass. Ranke, Gardiner, and others have tried to clear the glass of history from the mists and vapours of religious and political debate; they have made little impress on the churches. Ecclesiastical biographers still judge their heroes by their creeds and not their conduct; and feebly imitate Gregory of Tours, who sums up the successful but murderous career of that orthodox scoundrel Clovis: "Thus did God day by day cause the enemies of Clovis to fall into his hands and increase his kingdom, because he walked with an upright heart before the Lord and did that which was pleasing in His sight."

A. F. POLLARD.

A SOCIAL DIARY.*

THERE is a pretty air in this book of the days when Society really was society—with no need for capital letters; when there was no difficulty as there is to-day in "discovering accurately who is in or out of society," but when society was led by "certain recognised rulers, who framed its ordinances, against which there was no appeal"; when theatrical people were not allowed to put on airs "as if they possessed three eyes and a tail"; and when an alien financial magnate who had missed his carriage at the opera and was given a lift by a Royal Duke was so overwhelmed at the casual honour that he occupied the journey in muttering to himself that he wished his poor old mother could have been alive at that moment to see him. Those were the days when noblemen spoke of their "country residences," when ladies had their portraits painted in the "keepsake manner," and when a dowager who wished to express her displeasure that the son of a miller had been invited to an "assembly" at which she was present said in a loud voice, "It is most unpleasant here. I can hardly see across the room for flour dust." One is reminded of "Evan Harrington" and the magnitude of the great Mel's social feat, or even more of "Vanity Fair" and the gloomy grandeur of Steyne House. Indeed, one is made, like the reader of Mr. Belloc's verse, to "Remember from this to be properly vexed

When the newspaper editors say,
That 'The type of society shown in the Text
Is rapidly passing away.'"

*"Leaves from the Note Book of Lady Dorothy Nevill." Macmillan. 15s.

However, Lady Dorothy seems to have adapted herself pretty good-humouredly to the wider tolerance of a later age, and records not only her friendship for Henry Irving and J. L. Toole, but such incidents as her meeting—"through the courtesy of some of the directors"—with Zazel, the lady who was shot out of a cannon at the Aquarium, and was not only "a model of the domestic virtues" but so graceful that Mr. G. F. Watts used to attend her performance "as much for the purpose of study as for the sake of amusement."

The book wanders through many subjects, from gossip about the great Napoleon to art criticism and advice to collectors of bric-à-brac, but its recollections of past manners form the only part that was really worth printing, and these are sufficiently vividly expressed to give something more than the mildly romantic association of merely a link with the past. Lady Dorothy remembers the last days of Vauxhall Gardens before they were closed in 1855, and was present at several of the more select parties which preceded the later disreputable period of Cremorne. In her youth the opera was fashionable for the sake of the ballet (Taglioni and Cerito were the stars), and the most fashionable part of it was the hour in the "crush room" at the end of the performance, the whole thing being an event to prepare for the fatigues of which young ladies used to go to bed for a couple of hours in the afternoon. She remembers the time when the clergy still wore wigs, when fortunes were made and lost in the first railway boom of the 'forties, when people used to travel by rail in their own carriages wheeled on to railway trucks, when it was still possible to hire a sedan chair at Cheltenham, and when the brides at weddings were driven away by postilions in blue coats and white breeches. She has seen the beginning of the fashion of Christmas cards in the 'fifties, and the later decline in the fashion of Valentines. Deer were still kept in Hyde Park in her childhood, there were nursery gardens at Paddington, and it was not long since the last duel had been fought near the Round Pond. Piccadilly in the 'forties was a fashionable lounge, and club windows were so full of gazing, gilded youth in the afternoons that it was not considered proper for young ladies to walk past them. Baths were unusual, except on the traditional Saturday night, and the great had running footmen in front of their carriages to clear the way. But the most marked change in small social habits is attributed by Lady Dorothy to tobacco. It has certainly accounted for much of the decreased drinking of wine, and there is a world of distance to-day from the old strictness of behaviour which never allowed a gentleman to smoke in the street or on any account in the presence of a lady, and relegated his indulgence to the kitchen or the harness room after the ladies had gone to bed.

There are several good stories, among them a new authentic version of the "forgot Goschen" tale of Lord Randolph Churchill, given on the authority of Mr. Walter Long, who is described as "the chief hope of the Conservative Party." Among them, perhaps, the best is this of Bishop Blomfield, who was annoyed at someone's indiscriminate praise of Eastern civilisation. "Well, the wise men came from the East—you can't dispute that," said the bore. "Surely," answered the Bishop, "that was the wisest thing they could do."

THE VIRGIN BIRTH.*

It is very hard for anybody to face this ancient issue with a purely historical mind. Clouds of conviction on doctrine darken the dry light of criticism. The hand holding the knife of analysis throbs with emotion. This is true of both sides. The denial of the miraculous birth loathes a story which ascribes male characters to the Infinite; and the primitive tale means no less. He does not, either, believe in a physiological divineness, nor found the Christian fabric of faith on mysterious organic function. He cannot but compare spiritual things with spiritual. He remembers the similar statements made about the birth of Plato, of Alexander, of Augustus. He finds the myth widespread in the East, where this is the chosen way of accounting for the divineness of Buddha, of Krishna, of Horus in Egypt, and of other heroes. He feels that the early Christians, fighting the cult of a heaven-born deified Emperor, could hardly avoid coming to assert no smaller claim for their Lord. But apart from this historical argument, to which some sort of rejoinder can always be made, there is an inward protest against that immoral asceticism which looks upon ordinary fatherhood as impure, and casts a slur upon it by seeking to account for sinlessness by its absence. This again is part of the larger thought which finds in the common the sublime, natural wedlock holy, and in every birth a birth of God. The asserted miracle does more than affect the Divinity of Christ; it drives God outside the Universe, and compels Him to enter it by violence, in order to reveal Himself to men. Still worse havoc does it make of the Humanity of the Son of Man, who "was made in all points like unto His brethren," that He might lead them to join Him in His victory over temptation—a victory robbed of all spiritual value if, in the very fountain of His being, He was already miraculously lord over all temptation. Our central hope and faith to-day are in the unity of man with God—a hope by this miracle refused us even in the crowning Man.

On the other hand, no one can read these "orthodox" volumes without finding in them, too, an angry and outraged defence. The kind of divinity they honour and worship is being taken from them. The books are indeed rather contributions to polemical apologetics than to history. Dr. Orr, at any rate, faces the music fairly, and leaves no point in the attack without some kind of reply. We agree with him that the rather fashionable attitude that the "Virgin Birth" does not matter either way, is superficial. It is a temporary refuge for the timid in a time of transition, a way of achieving "peace in our time." For better, for worse, our whole thought of God, on which our personal religion rests, is different if we believe in the physical miracle of the birth of a God-man, from what it is if we believe in him as Peter did, simply because he had the words of Eternal Life. Most of those who say that the belief is non-essential mean that with them it is a dead branch, and does no harm. They really disbelieve it, but either do not want to say so, or they have not studied the question carefully.

Dr. Orr's methods and arguments are fair generally, as religious controversy goes. He recognises that the miraculous birth is absent from Mark, the earliest Evangelist, but says that if he had written about the infancy at all he would have put it in; admits its absence from the Fourth Gospel, but says that it was not in its plan. Seeing that this Gospel is a piece of what theologians so prettily call Christology, however, we are not surprised that it has its theory of Divinity; but it is the Logos theory, and concerns "Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph" (i., 45). The fact that He is throughout spoken of as "the seed of David according to the flesh"—and that it was through Joseph that the famous genealogies derive the Davidic descent, is met by the daring guess that Mary may have been related to her husband, and therefore to David. The argument that in the Infancy Sections themselves Joseph is repeatedly spoken of as the Lord's father, a fact that drives most people to the interpolation theory, only drives Dr. Orr to say that father cannot mean father there. The plain conclusion from the universal silence of the New Testament, outside a few verses in Matthew and Luke, that the doctrine had no place in Apostolic preaching, is accounted for by supposing that Mary kept the matter a secret all her life, but left a memorandum behind her, which is our authority. The theory in fact, needs both her silence and her speech, and both are supplied. The argument is worn even thinner in many places; but space forbids further examples. Would that space had been scarcer with the authors of these books. The world sighs for a concise theologian. We reach p. 31 before we make our first point. Lobstein and Solau manage to state their cases on the other side in one-fourth of the space Dr. Orr takes. The lecture form, also, leads to wordiness and repetition, proper to a lecture, but troublesome in a book, where you can always turn back. There is much irrelevant, too; long lists of codices are marshalled,

* "The Virgin Birth of Christ." By James Orr, M.A., D.D., Professor in the United Free Church College, Glasgow. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

"The Incarnation and Recent Criticism." By R. J. Cooke, D.D. Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.

none of them affecting the position that the tradition dates from about the year 100, too late for historical authority, too early to affect the accepted text.

The beautiful idyll of Luke needed but an interpolated or omitted phrase in i., 34, to change into an actual Divine begetting its story of a Divine influence on "the child of promise"; so like, though surpassing, the parallel story of the birth of John the Baptist, and the births of Isaac, Samson, and Samuel. There are textual signs that "wife" in Luke ii., 5, has been changed into "betrothed wife," and that into "betrothed." The record in Matthew is, according to Dr. Sanday, an orthodox defender, in his beautiful sermon on the subject, too doubtful, and depends on too many complicated issues, to be relied on.

Dr. Cooke's book, though bearing an English publisher's imprint, is apparently American, to judge from the paper, the spelling, and some illustrations. Its author shows few qualifications for writing it. He accepts the historical character of Adam and Noah, with the Garden and the Flood, and traces the genealogy of Christ up through Seth to God, in the historical manner of the first century. He also remarks that the exposure of infants was practised "by the Lacedaemonians and the Spartans"—which leads one to suppose that some Doctorates of Divinity are given without a knowledge of elementary ancient history. He has so little historical sense, so little touch with the way traditions grow and come to be accepted, that he shuts up the narrators of the Birth stories to the alternative of accuracy or "conscious fraud." The assertion, "Man is not an animal; he is a child of God," is a false pulpitering antithesis which would only pass among those who still think we are not animals and that animals are not children of God. Judging the book as polemics it is noisy and dusty, but its shots are fired in a stratum of thought different from that of the object to be hit. He says that the documents on which we accept the assassination of Julius Cæsar are more remote from the incident than those which tell of the Virgin Birth. Students are, however, accustomed to require closer evidence for a private and obscure event which left other events unaffected, than for one which plunged the world into civil war. It is extraordinarily difficult to write theology and serve truth at the same time.

TO-MORROW IN THE EAST.*

MR. DOUGLAS STORY is a writer on Far Eastern affairs whose name is well known both as a resident in Pekin, as a war correspondent, and as editor of a daily newspaper. He is something more than a globe trotter, and this book contains something better than the superficial comments of the questing but inexperienced critic. The main points of the book are the expression of doubt as to the wisdom of the Alliance between Great Britain and Japan, and the forecast of racial trouble consequent on the victory of Asiatics over Europeans. Mr. Story is not alone in his limited enthusiasm over the Anglo-Japanese Alliance. Mr. Putnam Weale's "Truce in the East and its Aftermath," and Mr. F. A. McKenzie's "The Unveiled East," are recent books which support the views expressed by Mr. Douglas Story.

No fact in contemporary politics is of greater moment than the awakening of Asia. The long repose, which enabled Western nations to exercise predominate influence from Egypt to Pekin, has come to an end. 12,000 Chinese students are studying Western ideas in Japan, while eight years will not have expired before the choice will be presented to Great Britain between Australian and American friendship or the maintenance of the Japanese Alliance. We cannot have it both ways. Japan allowed her representative and her Press to use threatening language towards the Federal Government at Washington in the recent episode relating to the education of Japanese children in San Francisco. Japan was in a position to enforce her threat, but the mistake was irreparable. Within the next few years the American Fleet in Chinese waters must be enormously increased, and it is difficult to see how England can escape the consequences of homogeneity with the United States in the Far East, and definitely declare that she sides with a White Australia.

The new spirit of nationalisation abroad throughout the East, though not fully understood, is a more remarkable event than many a bloody revolution. In Egypt the Egyptians are sizzling with a new sense of national life. In Persia, the Persians; in Siam, the Siamese; in Bengal, the Bengali; in Japan, the Japanese. All believe themselves capable of successfully managing their own affairs, without direction from Western nations. They have entered into competition with Europe, in spheres of activity hitherto considered the domain of white men. Their success in the arts of war and peace justifies their aspiration towards self-development, independence, and nationhood. India, China and Japan at no period of our intercourse with them have been inhabited by savages. Civilisation was always theirs, but their civilisation was not ours. They owned a literature, an art, a religion, and a philosophy, both older and more complex than our own. Centuries of missionary effort and preaching of the Christian propaganda has left the philosophy of the conservative East untouched. The awakening that has come has come from within. The East feels no gratitude to the West.

Mr. Douglas Story ascribes the desire of the Chinese to expel foreigners to be the outcome of the wide-spread belief that:—

"foreigners have taken advantage of China's inexperience to obtain undue facilities for enriching themselves, and now all treaties, agreements, understandings, and precedents must be construed against the foreigner with the utmost strictness."

To the impartial observer there are not lacking grounds for the Chinese belief. As Sir Robert Hart said to the author:—

"The Chinese believe that they have been unfairly exploited by the foreign Powers, have been cheated, and they will deal with them as they have been dealt by. In any event, they will for the future grant no more concessions. They will retain their power in their own hands."

Whether the jump into the limelight made by the Japanese will be followed by a similar development by the Chinese is a matter on which in some respects the author takes a pessimistic view. His forecast, at all events, of the future of Korea is unfavourable to British interests. Mining regulations, trade, and the treatment of foreigners, are all calculated to destroy the "equal opportunity" being complete in Korea, which was ostensibly given by the Japanese to the representatives of other nations. It seems to be generally admitted that a bad class of Japanese have been allowed or enabled to settle in Korea, and the recent assault on Mr. Weigall and his wife by soldiers under the command of General Hasegawa is an indication of the state of affairs that the best friends of Japan must deeply deplore. Japan's breach of faith with the Yi Hyong Emperor of Korea is another case of Japanese methods which is disquieting to those who hold that solid and enduring friendship between the Mongol and the Anglo-Saxon is feasible. The Marquis Ito's manipulation of the hermit nation is a gruesome story, while the cruel murder of the Dowager Queen Cho is a blot on the escutcheon of the Mikado and his Ministers.

Mr. Story's book is not less valuable because it is depressing. He speaks of the devotion to sport among the English-speaking residents in Shanghai and Hong-Kong. Shanghai men, he says, live hard, drink hard, and play hard. The talk is much of business, but more of sport:—

"I asked representatives of all classes of society to explain to me how youths with a salary of £5 a month were able to spend £50 on what in Nonconformist England would be termed debauchery. The answer was always the same—a shrug of the shoulders, and, 'Oh, we're all in debt to the comprador!'"

Mr. Story's book is full of interest, and interestingness is a quality to be commended in these days of snapshot portraiture and flashlight genius. Courage is required to have written such a book, and no surprise can be felt if Mr. Douglas Story's revelations do not increase his popularity either with the Japanese or Anglo-Saxon residents in the Far East; still, such intrepidity is to be commended, more especially as the book, though written in a somewhat fugitive and impressionist style, confirms the more deliberate and scientific conclusions of other writers.

* "To-Morrow in the East." By Douglas Story. London: Chapman and Hall. 6s.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

In eighteenth century literature poverty was not represented as a crime. Even successful authors, such as Johnson, Goldsmith, and Crabbe, knew but too well the pangs of want, and accordingly benevolence still ranked as a virtue. But with the age of steam and iron, and the roar of competitive energy in the Victorian era, the expression "the poor" came to suggest subtly all kinds of moral backslidings. "The poor in the loomp is bad," said Tennyson's Northern Farmer. And it is due to our accumulation of uneasy and unpleasant associations that the artist to-day receives scant encouragement to give us representation of "the poor man's" life. In nineteen out of twenty modern novels poverty is represented as a state destructive of a man's self-respect. And, indeed, we have done our best to make it so; but, luckily for the country, virtue is not yet the rich man's prerogative. Mrs. Gertrude's Bone's simple and strikingly natural "Children's Children," a tale of peasant life, on the coast of Lancashire, is indeed a "throw-back" in its absolute freedom from class feeling. There is not a line in "Children's Children," just as there is not a line in Rembrandt's or Millet's drawings of peasant folk, to suggest that the artist is aware of the existence of a prosperous middle-class with its lens of class bias.

This indirect feat of the author's vision is in part due to her womanly absorption in the homely facts of her people's life, and in part to her rare eye for the human significance of landscape. The background is said to be everything to the artist, and this is true for the reason that the background is what you measure your subject by. The triviality and lack of spirituality in modern art spring indeed from our lack of understanding what is the background vital to a picture of life; thus the meaning of our middle-class suburbs cannot be gauged till you have traversed the immense and sinister waste of mean streets in which our "industrial" population toils. Mrs. Bone's background is, however, the solemnity and tenderness of nature, and the thousandfold changes of the eternal sky arching over the ancient, peaceful fields from which her humble folk gain their bread. Properly considered the face of every countryside is the long human story of the generations that pass away; and the spiritual significance of their lives can only be interpreted by their relation to the bosom of the earth on which they toil and into which they disappear. In this sense it is that the poet who can detect and record for us the mysterious spirituality in nature's manifold moods says the deepest word by contrasting with it the human story. Mrs. Bone's exquisite sense of landscape is intimately allied with her quality of human sympathy. A passage will illustrate our meaning:—

"When I emerged beyond the fir wood the lustre of day-time was already fading. Already in the air one could feel the coolness of autumn—that delicate cold which seems rather to chill the summer's day than to herald the rigour of winter. The sun was setting in such splendour that the fields beneath seemed already dark, and the clouds gathered about it were upborne within its radiance as in an atmosphere: but even that tabernacle of glory lighted in the heavens did not wholly kindle the surface of the windless sky, now wholly covered with the invisible white clouds which presage the autumn mists . . .

"I fixed as a mark for my destination upon what appeared to be a grey church tower on a small eminence surrounded by elm trees. I reached it by turning into a field path—a squat homely building which had, in its isolation, the appearance of a rock cast up long ago in some upheaval, scaring and scattering the wild creatures, but which, remaining as it was cast, had gradually, as the earth healed of her scars, conquered their timidity and became their haunt and plaything.

"Pushing open a small iron gate almost blocked by a climbing rose-bush, I entered a graveyard neither more quiet nor more awful than the sun-steeped hills around it, and, sitting down on the low stone wall, I saw billows of green landscape urged before me towards the sea in that ineffable light of the ebbing sun, so troubled and mournful in its tranquillity. The pallid light, pulsating with such radiance upon the fields, seemed to shake their stillness and give to the solid earth the texture and mobility of the clouds. The trees, standing in the radiance, appeared to be growing in celestial pastures. Purged, ethereal, mystic, the sunshine seemed to create for itself a temple in the fields—quiet and distant as the fields of a dream; yet, strange, again, the contrast, far beyond, the sun's self, sinking solitary in a waste of sky, sent over the sea a light as desolate as sunshine on an empty battle-field.

"For a time I sat watching the withdrawing glory, conscious only of myself in the landscape. Then the outline of more objects became more definite and of larger bulk. The church tower took a sadder colour. I became aware of cattle moving across a meadow, and below me in a lane some object was advancing above the top of the hedge. A vehicle was moving slowly up the road toward the churchyard—a country cart drawn by an old white pony. The occupants, an old man and two children, appeared to be journeying without haste or necessity other than that of enjoying the evening's tranquillity. The old white pony might have been a part of the cart, so immovably did it maintain its own pace, even when stirred by the rattle of the reins upon its back or an exclamation from its driver. The rough cart, shaking from side to side, and creaking continually, seemed to be guided rather by the horse's will than his master's, who sat on the side of the shandry with bowed back, the reins held slackly in his hard, rheumatic fingers. He was an old man, tall, but very bent and gaunt, with a face paler than that of most countrymen and a scanty white beard under his chin. His eyes, like those of a sailor, were steady in their gaze, as though accustomed to sight distant objects in a wide space. His mouth and cheeks had fallen in. From the entire, almost inanimate stillness of his body when in repose, like the immobility of an old farm-horse which stands for hours motionless under the hedge, he seemed to have grown old in the habit of exhausting labour. His face, as it came into sight, had that expression of intentness and inward preoccupation so familiar on the faces of the very old, as if the the figures and sights which came and went before him were not more real than the memories which stood round about him, his unvarying and known companions. The passiveness of the country and the fields breathed within him, and in the vigour and adventure of the sea he had no part."

This passage, which introduces the figure of the old man, Jacob Pyrah, is a prelude to a moving family tragedy, told with a simple fidelity to nature, and with great breadth of human feeling. Every hamlet in England has its one or two Jacob Pyrahs, its lonely old men in whose dulled eyes live on the silence and the emptiness of days when "they can take in no more trouble," when the tale of their thoughts is like old Jacob's "Ann, and the little lads, and then our Tamar—they're all gone." And to people who by accident have penetrated into such human stories as Ellen Budd's and John Eglathorne's, and Tamar Coutts' and Old Jacob's and his wife Ann's, all the nice shades of class differences are like veils insidiously spread between life itself and our human apprehension. Fine as gossamer silk may these veils be, but they are barriers between class and class as formidable as iron. Fortunate are the people whose human sympathy takes no account of these barriers, and does not, indeed, perceive them. And of these few our author is one. The motive of the tale is that touching delight of the very old in their children's children, when human love blossoms, as it were, for the last time, and awakens the bitter-sweet memories of old joys. Full of a tender and spiritual charm is this humble picture of domestic life, wrought by a series of simple touches straight from nature. The profound seriousness of the spiritual atmosphere is, however, but the background to a delight in the simple, homely things of life, and a motherly sympathy with everything weak and helpless. The intimate understanding of peasant life will recall to many the spiritual realism of Millet, but it is evident that the author owes a debt not to the artist, but to the inspiration of the style of a far greater master. The only criticism that can be offered of a tale where every touch is true to nature is that longueurs are apparent in several passages, and that the spiritual consolation John Eglathorne offers to old Jacob in his bereavement awakens in us even more irritation than it would probably do in life. The quiet humour of the character sketches of the minor characters is admirable in its contrast to the restrained pathos of the tragedy.

A word must be said about the drawings. It is very rare that an artist can really illustrate an author, in the sense of interpreting his vision, and it is evident that a number of Mr. Muirhead Bone's drawings are studies of a landscape not quite spiritually akin to the landscape of "Children's Children." But in the other half the artist may claim to have created types and scenes absolutely at one with the author's. The original beauty of the majority is an achievement almost as remarkable as the tale itself. For freedom and richness of style and perfect mastery of his technique Mr. Muirhead Bone is among our first draughtsmen.

* "Children's Children." By Gertrude Bone. With Drawings by Muirhead Bone. Duckworth & Co. 6s. net.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

VOL. I. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Eversley Tennyson.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols., Vol. I. Poems. With Portrait. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

BY THE LATE LORD ACTON.

The History of Freedom,

AND OTHER ESSAYS. Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

Historical Essays and Studies.

Edited, with an Introduction by the same. 8vo, 10s. net.

LEAVES FROM THE NOTEBOOKS OF

Lady Dorothy Nevill.

Edited by RALPH NEVILL. With Portraits. 8vo, 15s. net.

William Allingham: A Diary.

Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and D. RADFORD. With Portraits in Photogravure. 8vo, 12s. net.

3rd IMPRESSION NOW READY.

The Man-Eaters of Tsavo.

By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF

Thomas Henry Huxley.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net, also limp leather 3s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.]

NEW BOOK BY AUTHOR OF "PRO CHRISTO ET ECCLESIA."

Christus Futurus.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Athenæum:—"The whole book is full of ideas, and well worth perusal."

Is Mars Habitable?

A Critical Examination of Professor Percival Lowell's Book, "Mars and its Canals," with an Alternative Explanation. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S. Extra Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Highways and Byways in Kent.

By WALTER JERROLD. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

Silas Marner.

By GEORGE ELIOT. With Illustrations in Colour and Black and White by HUGH THOMSON. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with gilt edges, 6s. [Cranford Series.]

Cranford.

With coloured Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Poetical Works of John Keats.

Edited with Introduction and Notes, by WILLIAM T. ARNOLD. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Also in limp leather, 5s. net. [The Globe Library.]

The Muse in Motley.

Poems by HARTLEY CARRICK, M.A. With a Foreword by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan.

Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Third Edition. With new Appendix (1907), 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., LONDON.

BEST NEW BOOKS.

THE BEST-SELLING BOOK OF THE YEAR IS THE LETTERS OF EDWARD LEAR (AUTHOR OF "THE BOOK OF NONSENSE.") EDITED BY LADY STRACHEY. ILLUSTRATED. SECOND IMPRESSION. 15s. NET.

READ THE MATTERHORN, BY GUIDO REY. IT CONTAINS A VIVID ACCOUNT OF THE FIRST ASCENT, AND IS ILLUSTRATED WITH 14 COLOURED PLATES, 23 PEN DRAWINGS, AND 11 PHOTOGRAPHS. 21s. NET.

A DELIGHTFUL NEW VOLUME OF TRAVEL IS THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON, BY C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. A STIRRING ACCOUNT OF LIFE AND TRAVEL IN PERU. WITH A MAP AND NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS. 21s.

THE MOST IMPORTANT NEW VOLUME OF HISTORY IS CHILE, BY G. F. SCOTT-ELLIOT, F.R.G.S. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY MARTIN HUME. MAPS AND ILLUSTRATIONS. 10s. 6d. NET.

ASK FOR MIRABEAU THE DEMI-GOD: BEING THE TRUE AND ROMANTIC STORY OF HIS LIFE AND ADVENTURES, BY W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. WITH 33 ILLUSTRATIONS. 15s. NET.

A FASCINATING NEW BIOGRAPHY IS A SISTER OF MARIE ANTOINETTE: THE LIFE STORY OF MARIA CAROLINA, QUEEN OF NAPLES, BY MRS. BEARNE. WITH ABOUT 30 ILLUSTRATIONS. 10s. 6d. NET.

A BOOK ATTRACTING A GREAT DEAL OF ATTENTION IS BONAPARTE IN EGYPT AND THE EGYPTIANS OF TO-DAY. BY HAJI A. BROWNE. 10s. 6d. NET.

THE BEST BOOK ON THE SPORTS OF OLD ENGLAND IS F. W. HACKWOOD'S OLD ENGLISH SPORTS. WITH 6 COLOURED PLATES AND 32 OTHER FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS. 10d. 6d. NET.

A REALLY CHARMING BOOK FOR CHILDREN IS THE WELSH FAIRY BOOK. EDITED BY W. JENKYN THOMAS. 100 ILLUSTRATIONS. 6s. THE FIRST ENGLISH COLLECTION OF WELSH FAIRY STORIES.

THE MOST FASCINATING NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS ARE E. NESBIT'S THE ENCHANTED CASTLE. WITH 48 ILLUSTRATIONS BY H. R. MILLAR. (6s.) AND MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S MILLY AND OLLY. WITH 40 ILLUSTRATIONS BY WILLY POGANY. (6s.)

T. FISHER UNWIN.

LONDON.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

MR. HORATIO F. BROWN is rapidly increasing the debt already due to him by many students of Venetian history. In a recent issue we reviewed an instalment of his translation of Molmenti's great "History of Venice," while for those who shrink from embarking on a work of such imposing dimensions there are Mr. Brown's two volumes of "Studies in Venetian History" (Murray, 18s. net). The book is a re-issue of the "Venetian Studies" published twenty years ago, but the ten essays of that volume have been "re-handled and brought up to date," and several of them entirely rewritten, while we have also ten new essays not included in the earlier book. Seven of these latter studies, Mr. Brown tells us, are based, almost entirely, on documents in the archives and libraries of Venice which have not hitherto been used by historians. Dull books have been written about Venice, but the whole blame must be laid upon the shoulders of their writers. The most artistic and romantic of cities furnishes an almost endless wealth of interesting themes, as the reader of Mr. Brown's studies will soon discover. "Marino Falieri," "Carmagnola, a Soldier of Fortune," "Political Assassination," "Caterina Cornaro, Queen of Cyprus," "Shakespeare and Venice," and "Cromwell and the Venetian Republic," are all fascinating subjects, and in each case Mr. Brown more than fulfils the hope aroused by such promising titles. To the bookish reader one of the most interesting of the essays is the account of Gabriele Giolito, a printer-publisher, who flourished in Venice during a large part of the sixteenth century. Giolito was a man of education and position, and the history of his publishing house throws great light upon the literary life of Venice at the period. He was a pioneer in issuing editions of the Italian classics, and between 1542 and 1650 he was responsible for twenty-eight editions of the "Orlando Furioso," twenty-two of Petrarch, nine of the "Decamerone," and one edition of Dante. He was also the first to issue a series, in our sense of the word, and published translations of the Greek and Latin classics and the masterpieces of Italian literature in a uniform series of many volumes. We regret that want of space does not permit us to deal fully with Mr. Brown's pleasant and informing volumes which we recommend to all interested in Venetian history.

* * *

ANOTHER book which will be welcomed by lovers of Venice is "Venetian Life," by Mr. W. Dean Howells, a second edition of which has just been published by Messrs. Constable (16s. net). The main features of the present edition are twenty beautiful illustrations of Venice in colour by Mr. Edmund H. Garrett, and a new "auto-biographical" preface by the author. Mr. Howells says that the greater part of the book was first written as a diary which he began to keep when he was appointed United States Consul at Venice in 1861. He next made use of his diary for a series of letters contributed to the Boston "Advertiser," and these meeting with approval were re-published with additions as "Venetian Life." Mr. Howells' receipts from the first English edition issued on the half-profit system amounted, he tells us, to eleven shillings and ninepence. Succeeding editions must have been more profitable, for the book has since taken its place as one of the best descriptions of present-day life in Venice that we have. In this handsome edition it is likely to have another lease of popularity.

* * *

IN "Through the Magic Door" (Smith, Elder, 5s.), Sir Arthur Conan Doyle gossips pleasantly, though at times superficially, about books and reading. He is an enthusiastic book-lover, and for that, as well as for the sake of Sherlock Holmes, we are prepared to forgive him much, but he draws heavily upon our patience when he repeats the old heresy that if Boswell had not lived we should not now hear much about Dr. Johnson. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle is right in his praise of Boswell. "It is not by chance that a man writes the best biography in the language. He had some great and rare literary qualities. One was a clear and vivid style, more flexible and Saxon than that of his great model. Another was a remarkable discretion which hardly once permitted a fault of taste in this whole enormous book where he must have had to pick his steps with pitfalls on every side of him." This is undoubtedly true, but when Sir Arthur Conan Doyle goes on to describe "The Lives of the Poets" as but "a succession of pre-faces," and to urge that Johnson's work is not enough to justify his predominant place in English literature, and that we must turn to his much-ridiculed biographer for the real explanation, we answer with Mr. Birrell that there would have been a Johnson had there never been a Boswell, and that his literary baggage is quite enough to furnish at least half a dozen respectable reputations and still leave him little the poorer. However, though "Through the Magic Door" adds nothing to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's reputation, it will be read with interest by all who care for books. It contains the good suggestion that some critic of catholic tastes and sympathetic judgment should make a list of those books of worth which, through their publication at a time of great national excitement or for some other reason, have passed out of notice. Such rescue work among the lost books would bring to light some interesting volumes in the salvage.

* * *

THE attractiveness of Mr. Berenson's style is again conspicuous in his treatise on "The North Italian Painters" (Putnam's Sons, 6s. net), the last of four volumes which he has completed on the artists of the Renaissance. Beginning with Altichieri of Verona, he takes us swiftly through the schools of Padua, Ferrara, and Milan, touching upon the various painters whose work serves to illustrate his purpose. Mr. Berenson's aim, as he confesses in his last chapter, is not merely to convey information about pictures. It is to work out a "theory of art," to show that the principal if not sole sources of vital painting—or, as he prefers it, of "life-enchantment"—are tactile values (which he claims is a more definite term than "form," though it means the same thing), movement, and space composition. A fourth, but a less important source in regard to the figure arts with which Mr. Berenson is chiefly concerned, is colour. Perhaps to the plain man the linguistic refinements of this author's aesthetic philosophy may seem mainly the statement of old truths in a new way, and less important than the admirably clear-sighted views on matters such as the character of the North Italian painting, or the genius and influence of Mantegna, Leonardo, Giovanni Bellini, and Correggio. Nevertheless, some of his verbal brilliances are happy enough to quote. Mr. Berenson was clearly inspired when he wrote that "Prettiness is all that remains of beauty when the permanent causes of the sensation are removed"; or that the characteristic love of costume and finery observable in so many North Italian paintings renders them "out of tone spiritually." One should not, however, be blinded by these epigrammatic sayings to the evident seriousness behind them. The book is a valuable contribution to the study of fundamental principles, and it comes opportunely at a time when thoughtful people are beginning to realise that a clearer conception than exists of these is essential before art can regain what it has lost. The index to the paintings is extensive, and may be deemed trustworthy.

* * *

MR. W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE'S "Mirabeau, the Demi-God" (Fisher Unwin, 15s. net) falls between two stools. It is neither genuine fiction nor authentic biography. Mr. Trowbridge has adopted the unfortunate plan of giving conversations such as might possibly have taken place between his characters by piecing out their recorded utterances with passages taken from their correspondence. The result is that we lose the feeling of historical reality without any compensating gain. The greater part of the book is taken up with the first thirty years of Mirabeau's life, and the disreputable love adventures of that period bulk largely in Mr. Trowbridge's pages. Although Mr. Trowbridge calls Mirabeau a demi-god, he seems to us to take an unnecessarily unfavourable view of the last years of his life. He seems to think that merely private ambition dictated the political changes which may fairly be explained on grounds of patriotism. It would be difficult to write a dull book on Mirabeau, and Mr. Trowbridge is always readable, and, allowing for the defects we have mentioned, fairly accurate. The book leads us to believe that he could have written a good biography of the great Revolutionary orator, or a good novel with Mirabeau as the hero. He fails because he attempts to do the impossible and combine both.

A. & C. BLACK'S FIFTH AUTUMN LIST.

GEORGE MORLAND. His Life and Works.

By SIR WALTER GILBEY, Bt., author of "The Life of George Stubbs, R.A.," and E. D. Cuming. Containing upwards of 50 full-page reproductions in colour of the artist's best work. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net. EDITION DE LUXE limited to 250 signed and numbered copies. Price 2 guineas net.

THE ROYAL NAVY.

Painted by NORMAN WILKINSON, R.B.A. Text by H. LAWRENCE SWINBURNE, with some notes on the costume of the sailors of the past by COMMANDER CHARLES N. ROBINSON, R.N., illustrated by J. JELICOE. Containing 61 full-page illustrations in colour. Square demy 8vo., cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net.

THE CLYDE. River and Firth.

Painted by MARY Y. and J. YOUNG HUNTER. Described by NEIL MUNRO. Containing 67 full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map of the district. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net. EDITION DE LUXE limited to 400 signed and numbered copies. Price 2 guineas net.

BIRDS OF BRITAIN.

By J. LEWIS BONHOTE, M.A., F.L.S., F.Z.S., Member of the British Ornithologists' Union. Containing 100 full-page illustrations in colour selected by H. E. DRESSER from his "Birds of Europe." Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net.

SUPPRESSED PLATES.

By G. S. LAYARD. Containing upwards of 70 illustrations. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 7s. 6d. net.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London, W.

Just Published.

NEW NOVEL, by the Author of
"The Seething Pot," "Hyacinth," &c.

"THE NORTHERN IRON,"

By George A. Birmingham.

Crown 8vo, Irish Linen, 6s.

"There can be no doubt that this story will have a great success, for it is intensely alive and holds the interest from start to finish. The story is very exciting; the author has a wonderful power of keeping his grip on it and describing the incidents with relentless force."—Daily Telegraph.

"Its characters are finely drawn and its interest compelling."—Morning Leader.

"The book is extremely well done all round, and will be read as much for its engrossing story as for the admirable pictures it gives of those stirring times which closed the eighteenth century."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Send postcard for full list of publications.

Dublin: MAUNSEL & Co., Ltd.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.

NOW READY THE JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY,"
6d. NET. GIVING PARTICULARS OF THE LAST
BOOKS OF THE YEAR.

APART FROM THE USUAL FEATURES THIS
NUMBER INCLUDES A LONG AND SEASON-
ABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE
BY FOURTEEN OF THE MOST POPULAR
WRITERS FOR THE YOUNG.

Begin the New Year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly,"
a Specimen Copy of which you can get on application to the Publishers, Simpkin Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court,
London.

THE CHRISTMAS SCRIBNER.

This December SCRIBNER'S is a distinguished number in every respect. Among the contents of more than ordinary interest are:—

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, Portrait Maker.

By R. T. H. HALSEY. Illustrated with a series of remarkable reproductions in colour of many of his most celebrated medallions.

"THE CHILD IN FAIRYLAND." By

SARAH S. STILWELL. A series of drawings in full-colours, accompanied by some charming verses by EDITH B. STURGIS.

SEVEN SHORT STORIES of exceptional interest.

Among the Poems of the Number is:

"THE WILD ROSE." By GEORGE MEREDITH.

The Christmas SCRIBNER'S is a criterion for Magazine making.

GET YOUR COPY TO-DAY.

ONE SHILLING

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, New York and London.

TALLIS HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, E.C. Telephone Holborn 584

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

Pp. 776. Portrait and Memoir. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. post free.

COMPENDIUM OF SWEDENBORG'S THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS.

* * Because Swedenborg has written so much, many who are strangers to his works are deterred from making their acquaintance from not knowing what to select and where to begin. This work contains the most important passages, arranged under heads, so as to present a complete and authoritative exposition of what he taught.

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury Street.

The Week in the City.

THE Stock Markets have been very quiet during the week, speculation, both of bulls and bears, being restrained by the uncertainties and anxieties of the situation. A wholesome caution pervades the City, as it well may when Christmas festivities have to be conducted with a 7 per cent. bank rate. The authorities, I believe, hope that it may be reduced about the middle of January, though there is no immediate prospect of a resumption of cash payments in the United States. The labouring classes over there are already beginning to suffer privation, and a terrible winter is in store for them. Thousands are being dismissed every week, and those who remain will, no doubt, have to submit to wage reductions in spite of the declarations of Mr. Gompers. Employers who cannot command cash or credit are simply forced to restrict operations. In Germany and Austria, the working classes are complaining bitterly of high prices, and there, too, employment is declining. Here, at home, the downward movement is much slower, except in the ship-building trades, which in many places are almost at a standstill. In Glasgow especially there has been an alarming increase in the number of unemployed. It is to be hoped that the Government will take cognisance of these facts in framing its Budget. The effect of the sugar duties on employment has been very serious; and if only sufficient pressure were brought to bear on the great spending departments their repeal would be quite feasible.

GENERAL PRESSURE ON BANKS.

The pressure on banks and credit establishments increases as the year draws to an end; and the public anxiety has shown itself in the tightening up of discount rates. According to the New York telegrams, the premium on currency instead of disappearing, tends rather to harden, and the rates for call money in New York are extraordinarily high considering how little speculation there is. It seems to be clear from the guarded paragraphs of the American Press that several banks in New York will have to be closed before long and put into a receiver's hands. One of the worst results of the partial suspension of all banks is that the chief offenders are enabled to prolong a life which ought to have been promptly ended. In Chili also the banks are heavily embarrassed, and the Government has had to promise to come to their assistance with Treasury bonds, though exactly how this will help them we are not informed. The smash of the Mobiliario has doubtless frightened the Government. How serious is the financial situation in Chili appears from the simple fact that the currency has depreciated fifty per cent. in the last three years, and by thirty per cent. since the spring. Chili has great resources in its copper and nitrate. But exports of the former are hardly profitable at present prices. The nitrate wealth, however, is immense, and as motor-cars displace horses more and more will be required in Europe. I know one long-headed investor who is taking this into account. But those who follow his example should be very careful about what companies they select.

THE POSITION IN GERMANY.

London is beginning to take as much interest in the embarrassments of Germany as in those of the United States. Some of the less reputable German banks which do a large speculative business in London have always been out of favour, but they are regarded with strong suspicion just now. It is said that one of the biggest was saved by the Kaiser's intervention at the time of the last crisis; but it is doubtful whether such action would be possible again. The Reichsbank may find its hands quite full enough with caring for sound and well-conducted institutions; even the best German banks do far more for the financing of business and manufactures than would be thought wise in England. Hence the spread of depression after such a boom as we have just seen is particularly dangerous, and of course the peril is much accentuated by the American crisis and by the almost unprecedented dearth of money.

THE GREAT CENTRAL AND GREAT NORTHERN.

The agreement between these two companies is rather favourably regarded, and may quite possibly prove of mutual benefit; but I should hesitate to make a prediction. The last agreement between the London Chatham and South-Eastern was a dismal failure—probably because the financiers who had attached themselves to these lines were incompetent. It is generally supposed that the Great Central during the last few years has been one of the best managed lines in England, and I should put more confidence in this fact than in the abstract notion of the economies that attend large transactions. As a matter of fact, large companies come to grief quite as much as small ones. It would be a very good thing, however, if all the great lines to the North would agree to stop racing. It is a costly and dangerous practice, from which nobody really has anything to gain. A few minutes gained in the run from Edinburgh to York are a poor return for the extra cost and risk. English railways have rallied considerably from the lowest points, thanks to Mr. Lloyd-George's skilful mediation in the dispute, and they may go higher again when the monetary crisis passes away. On the other hand, there is the probability of declining trade which must be taken into account. I am told that the London Tubes are really making some progress. It will be very interesting to see whether the London public will pay the additional fares. The recent changes will be a severe tax on the working classes of the whole Metropolitan area.

LUCCELLUM.

CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS

Those Londoners who are desirous of spending the Christmas Holidays out of the Metropolis cannot do better than refer to the London and North Western Railway Company's Programme of Cheap Excursions, which comprises bookings to the principal Provincial Towns, North, South, and Central Wales, Cambrian Coast, Lake District, Blackpool, Scotland, and Ireland.

This Company also announce that tickets can be obtained at the Town Receiving Offices of the Company, and that the Booking Offices at Euston, Broad Street, Victoria (Pimlico), Kensington, and Willesden Stations will be open throughout the day from Monday, December 16th, to Tuesday, December 24th, inclusive (Sunday excepted), so that passengers wishing to obtain tickets can do so at any time and so avoid delay at the stations.

The Company have made special arrangements for the collection, quick transit, and prompt delivery of Christmas parcels, which should be carefully packed and plainly addressed.—[Advt.]

CHRISTMAS PARCELS TRAFFIC.

In connection with the Christmas and New Year traffic, the Midland Railway Company have made the most complete arrangements for the collection, quick transit, and prompt delivery of parcels in London and the many provincial towns on their system. Frequent collections will be made from the receiving offices; and in addition to through vans being attached to the principal express and mail trains, special trains will be run to accommodate the traffic.

In the case of parcels for short distances, the rates, with one or two exceptions, are less than those by parcels post, whilst for longer distances the rates for parcels above one pound do not exceed the parcels post rates.

In the interests of prompt transit, all parcels should be fully and legibly addressed, and the address labels firmly attached. As an extra precaution, a duplicate label should be enclosed in each package, so that the name of the consignee may be ascertained in the event of the outside address becoming detached or defaced.—[Advt.]

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate (Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

VISIT CALIFORNIA

THE LAND OF SUNSHINE, FRUIT, AND FLOWERS,

And Travel
by the Southern Pacific Company's Routes.

Luxurious trains leave New York and New Orleans daily, provided with Dining, Sleeping, Observation Cars, etc. MAGNIFICENT NEW PASSENGER STEAMSHIPS, 10,000 tons, leave New York for New Orleans weekly, offering a delightful route between those Cities. THROUGH TICKETS issued.

Apply, RUD FALCK, General European Agent, Southern Pacific Co.
LONDON: 49, Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 22, Cockspur Street, S.W. LIVERPOOL: 25, Water Street.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses: Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.*THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and
Other Bibles and Prayer
Books from

6d. to £10.53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.*I
B
L
E
S

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear,
Revised,
and other Editions.

Telephone Central 329

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.BOOKS.—A Catalogue of finely printed modern Books, choice editions, limited issues and large paper copies, post free on receipt of p.c.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.CHOICE BOOKS are presents which give the most lasting pleasure.

The book-lover will find a mine of wealth in rare and choice editions in my Xmas Catalogue, sent free on request.FRANK HOLLINGS, Great Turnstile, Holborn.*ARUNDEL CHROMOS.*LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each). Saint Jude's Dépôt, Birmingham.BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; ModerateSILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.*BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.BRIGHTON.*THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.BUXTON.*ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.*THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.DEAL.*BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.EASTBOURNE.*CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.EXETER.*DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.*THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.HENLEY-ON-THAMES.*RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.ILFRACOMBE.*COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.LEEDS.*HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.LIVERPOOL.*COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.LLANELLY.*CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.MALDON.*TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.MALVERN.*HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.MANCHESTER.*THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.MATLOCK.*SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes)OXFORD (near).*SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. LecturePENTRE.*PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.PLYMOUTH.*GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.PORTSMOUTH.*SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.SOUTHSEA.*STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE."CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.TEIGNMOUTH.*REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.WHITBY.*WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.*WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of a WOMAN PRINCIPAL of Avery Hill Residential and Day Training College for Women, Eltham.

Applicants must possess a University degree or its equivalent.

The salary attaching to the post is £500 a year, together with board, residence, washing, and medical attendance.

The candidate appointed will be required to commence work after the Easter holidays, or, if possible, earlier.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Thursday, January 9th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME.

Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
November 23rd, 1907.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, Baldock, Hertfordshire.

FOR THE EDUCATION OF BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal—Mrs. ENNIS RICHMOND (Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," &c.).

Head Master—Mr. KENNETH RICHMOND.
SPRING TERM begins January 14th.

"A Natural Education," the Report of a Lecture by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls, may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d.; single copy, 4d. post-paid.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.

Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.

Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER,
B.A., Camb.

HASLEMERE, SURREY.

ST. GEORGE'S WOOD SCHOOL for GIRLS. Sandy soil; nine acres of ground; nearly 600 ft. above sea level.

Principals: Miss AMY KEMP, Camb. Certif. for Theory and Practice of Teaching (St. George's Training College, Edinburgh); Diploma for the Teaching of German (Berlin); and Miss HELEN T. NEILD, M.A. (Vict.), Classical Tripos (Camb.). Certificated Student of Girton College; 11 years at the Mount School, York.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—Neale's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Some of Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS'S Publications specially suitable for CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

These can be seen at ALL BOOKSELLERS', and until December 24th, on presentation of visiting-card, at the Exhibition, THE BRUTON GALLERIES, Bruton Street, W.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND. By LEWIS

CARROLL. From the latest Copyright Text. With 12 Coloured and many Line Illustrations by MILLICENT SOWERBY. 5s. net.
Ladies' Field.—"Fortunate the children of to-day who are to make her acquaintance for the first time in this radiant garb!"
Gentleman.—"Presents ALICE'S friends as it is probable that children imagine them. They have the air of the odd matter-of-fact topsy-turvydom of the story."
Crown.—"As dainty as it is delightful."

CHILDHOOD: being Twelve Days from Our Youth.

Pictured in Colours by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and Written in Verse by GITHA SOWERBY. The Text printed in 2 Colours and with some 30 further illustrations in the Text. 7½ by 9½ in. 3s. 6d. net.
Morning Leader.—"Recalls Kate Greenaway's best work. The pictures are delightful."

BUMBLETOES: being their Adventures with Belinda

and the Buttons Boy. Pictured in 12 Scenes by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and Written in Verse by GITHA SOWERBY. The 12 Scenes in Colour, and 18 further Illustrations in the Text. 5½ by 7 in. 1s. 6d. net.
Crown.—"Some of the freshest and most charming examples of creative water-colour drawings. An altogether neat and delightful little volume, exceptionally well printed and finished."

THE CHILD-LOVERS' CALENDAR, 1908.

With 12 Illustrations in Colours by AMELIA BAUERLÉ. Small 8vo, 1s. net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"In the Greenaway manner, except that the artist is more vigorous in her lines and less straitened in her types."

THE STORY OF SCRAGGLES, A SPARROW.

By G. W. JAMES. With 6 Illustrations after Drawings and Photographs, small crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

Field.—"Will certainly please lovers of animals."
Scotsman.—"Has an engaging natural freshness that is sure to make it a favourite with young readers."

THE DUMPY-BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Thirty-six Titles to select from. Royal 32mo, bound in Decorated Washable Cloth, 1s. net each. Over 253,000 of these books have been sold.

Evening Standard.—"Tiny books which very small people will find most fascinating."

Nottingham Guardian.—"They have everything to recommend them to their readers."

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The Medici Reproductions are of surpassing excellence.....Give absolutely the impression of the pictures themselves, even as regards irregularities of surface."

- I. LUINI. Head of the Virgin Mary (Fresco). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in., 12s. 6d. net.
- II. LEONARDO DA VINCI. Head of the Christ (Cartoon). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in., 12s. 6d. net.
- III. BOTTICELLI. The Virgin and Child (Tempera). Colour surface, 13½ by 9½ in., 12s. 6d. net.
- IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI. The Last Supper (Fresco). Colour surface, 31½ by 16 in., 25s. net.
- V. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA. Portrait of an Unknown Lady. Colour surface, 15½ by 11½ in., 10s. 6d. net.
- VI. LORENZO DI CREDI. The Annunciation (Tempera). Colour surface, 17½ by 12 in., 15s. net.
- VII. FILIPPINO LIPPI. (?) The Virgin in Adoration (Tempera). Colour surface, 19½ by 15 in. Size of Original Picture, 39 by 30 in., 15s. net.
- VIII. BOTTICELLI. The Birth of Venus (Tempera). Colour surface, 36 by 21½ in., 25s. net.

OCCASIONAL PLATE, I.

LIPPI-FILIPPO. The Virgin, after the Painting in Tempera on Wooden Panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin, Child, St. John, and an Angel. Coloured surface, 13½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in. 10s. 6d. net.

Inland Postage (Great Britain), 6d. per plate, except Nos. IV. and VIII., which are 9d. Foreign postages double these amounts.
Full particulars of Plates and Frames, with method of publication and terms of subscription, will be found in an Illustrated Prospectus, which may be had post-free on application.

FOUR-COLOUR REPRODUCTIONS.

GIORGIONE. The Virgin Enthroned between Saints, after the Altar-piece at Castelfranco. Complete in gold frame, 9½ by 7½ in., dark mount, 3s. 6d.; oak frame, oak mount, 2s. 6d.; mounted only, 9d.; unmounted, 6d. Postage extra.

PERUGINO. The Crucifixion, after the Triptych in the Convent of Sta. Maria dei Pazzi, Florence. Complete in Florentine carved frame, 21s.; gold frame, 17 by 11 in., dark mount, 5s.; oak frame, oak mount, 3s. 6d.; mounted only, 1s. 6d.; unmounted, 1s. Postage extra.

THE NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY.

The first three volumes are Translated from the Middle French by ALICE KEMP-WELCH, who also furnishes Notes and an Introduction. Size 6½ by 4½ in. boards, 5s. net.

Whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

I. THE BOOK OF THE DUKE OF TRUE LOVERS.

II. OF THE TUMBLER OF OUR LADY AND OTHER MIRACLES.

III. THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI.

(Other volumes in preparation.)

Each volume contains photogravure or woodcut reproductions of the Illustrations contained in the Works reproduced. Each volume further contains a title page engraved upon wood, after notable contemporary examples.

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.

By E. L. SEELEY. With 8 Four-Colour Plates, the Half-Tones printed in two tints, 7s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari."

Also a SPECIAL EDITION, with 4 extra Four-Colour Plates and 24 in Half-Tone, and a Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece, after Raphael. Small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; vellum, 20s. net; red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

Oxford Magazine.—"It is just the kind of book that one is looking for at this time of the year as a present for some lover of Italian art."

Evening Standard.—"A good idea well carried out, and the illustrations, reproductions of famous pictures, are most welcome. Those in colour are particularly well done."

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS

FROM VASARI. Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY. Red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. SPECIAL EDITION, small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

WOMEN OF FLORENCE: a Study of their

Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento. By Professor ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. With an Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. With 2 Plates in Four-Colour, and 24 in Half-Tone. Buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

Burlington Magazine.—"An extremely human, agreeable, and interesting book, which the care of the publishers in the illustration and decoration has rendered doubly attractive."

TUSCAN FEASTS AND TUSCAN

FRIENDS. By DOROTHY NEVILLE LEES. With 12 Reproductions, after Photographs of typical Tuscan Scenes, 5s. net.

Standard.—"In her company we are taken to fairs and festivals which throw into relief all that is most typical in the life of the peasantry."

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS:

Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans. By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully Illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S. 20s. net.

Glasgow Herald.—"One of those comparatively few works that are both learned and readable.....The colour treatment is particularly masterly.....this reproduction of the very atmosphere of the East is a very distinct artistic triumph."

THE COLOUR OF LONDON. By W. J.

LOFTIE, F.S.A. With 60 Illustrations in Colour, and an Essay by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO. 20s. net.

Athenæum.—"Has given us a London which is new.....the picture of a beautiful capital, which he reveals to its astounded inhabitants. In many of his pictures he seems, as it were, to reveal London to Londoners themselves."

SWITZERLAND AND ITS PEOPLE. By

CLARENCE ROOK. Fcap. 4to, gilt top, with 56 Illustrations in Colour by Mrs. JARDINE, and 24 in Half-Tone on tint. 20s. net.

Spectator.—"This is a good book to look at and to read.....a volume which is bound both to please and to profit."

LISBON AND CINTRA. With some Account of

other Cities and Historic Sites in Portugal. By A. C. INCHBOLD. With 30 Illustrations in Colour by STANLEY INCHBOLD. 10s. 6d. net.

Times.—"The writer is an intelligent and careful guide who does not waste space with rhetoric or with personalia."

Outlook.—"Mr. Stanley Inchbold has caught the light of the Southern sun."

VENICE. By BERYL DE SELINCOURT and MAY STURGE-

HENDERSON. Fcap. 4to, gilt top. With 30 Illustrations in Colour by REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S. 10s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"One of those composite books with coloured pictures in which the illustrations count for no less than the literature.....they [the illustrations] grace a book which must both please and instruct any one who either knows or wishes to know the lovely city it describes."

CHATTO and WINDUS, III St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 13.]

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1907.

[PRICE 6D.

Postage: U.K., $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	... 453	Mr. Haldane's Ideas. By	... 468
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		Liberal Pacifist	... 468
A Christmas Appeal	... 456	"The House of Lords and the	...
Mr. Haldane's Model	... 457	Referendum." By John H.	...
The Changing East	... 458	Humphreys	... 468
The Historical Study of Religion	... 459	"The Cost of Old Age Pen-	...
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		sions." By Albert Raphael	469
"Lord of the World. By H.	...	The Baghdad Railway. By	...
W. Nevinston	... 461	Continental	... 469
Tulips, Old and New	... 462	The Meaning of Irish Politics.	...
A Shy Neighbourhood	... 463	By Robert Lynd	... 469
SHORT STORY:—		POETRY:—
A Personally Conducted Tour.	...	A Christmas Carol. By James	...
By Kustali	... 464	Flecker	... 470
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	... 466	REVIEWS:—
Books to be Read	... 466	The Character of the	...
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		Japanese	... 471
"The Best Children's Books."	...	Humanity and the Absolute	... 471
By Lady Rendel	... 467	Mr. Spender's "Bagshot"	... 472
The Study of Religious His-	...	Heine's Book of Songs	... 473
tory. By Dr. J. Estlin Car-	...	The King of the Mountains	... 473
penter and L. R. Farnell	... 467	The New Testament Canon	... 474
"The Decline of the Oxford	...	American Leaders	... 476
Movement." By Modernist,	...	Proportional Representation	476
L. Waters, and Oxonian	... 467	Three Irish Authors	... 478
		Novels With and Without a	...
		Purpose	... 480
		Xenophon and Others	... 480

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

WE are sorry to give our readers at Christmas time no more hope of International Peace than the very partial success of the Hague Conference, and the qualified resumption of the race of armaments between Germany and England, afford. We trust, however, that if wars by land and wars by sea are to remain with us, mankind has no immediate reason to fear a war in the air. In his new scientific romance, Mr. Wells works out this last problem, and concludes that the strategy of aerial warfare is bound to be so dreadful, and so disconcerting, as to be prohibitive. In land warfare, for example, one army presses back another over a limited surface, and the fighting is more or less restricted to this area, though extending to fringes on either side of it. No such restriction could apply to war in the air. France could be invaded and ruined by German airships, but there would be nothing to prevent a French aerial navy from crossing the German frontier and raining shells on to the streets of Berlin. It seems probable, therefore, that when the conditions of this new form of destruction are realised, the air at least will be neutralised.

* * *

A LETTER signed by Lord Rosebery, Lord Rothschild, Lord Avebury, and Mr. Arthur Balfour, was issued to the Press on Saturday appealing to "the charitable public" to provide funds for the underfed children in the London elementary schools. The letter based itself on the refusal of the London County Council to impose a rate under the Feeding Act of last year, and expressly endorses this lâches of the Moderate majority. The strangeness of the document, however, consists in the fact that, while nominally appealing to charity, it is avowedly an effort to save the rates on the ground that a public provision for the children would favour the "progress of Socialism." We understand that the Bishop of London was asked to sign this mean public document, and that, to the great credit of his cloth, he refused. Its signatories, who are all very rich men, take on themselves a grave responsibility when they resist an attempt to organise a great public need and fall back on a bad and unorganised system. It is a still graver offence to appeal to charity in a spirit not of affection for the people but of fear of them.

* * *

WE congratulate the Government on the decision to release all the Denshawai prisoners on January 8th, which is the anniversary of the Khedive's accession. This wise, if tardy action is, of course, due to the initiative of the Imperial Government, but it has been thought well to place it to the credit of the Egyptian Administration. We rejoice at an act which is described as one of clemency, but is in reality one of reparation. The Denshawai trials were irregular in form and unjust in their conclusion, and the punishment they inflicted was barbarous. The case originally, and we have no doubt unwillingly, set up for them by Sir Edward Grey, namely, the existence of a dangerous political and fanatical movement in Egypt, has disappeared, and with it the extreme phases of the Egyptian Nationalist agitation. These facts have now been acknowledged, and the Foreign Office has sanctioned the pardon which it had not a moral right to refuse.

* * *

MR. HALDANE announced on Saturday, at Edinburgh, that he had received from the King his assent to the "biggest army order" passed in recent years. In plain English this order decrees the abolition of the militia, the oldest military force in England, whose active history begins with our Saxon kings, and creates the special reserve. This body will supply a set of semi-militia battalions as complements to the regular battalions. It would be annually trained for fifteen days, and trained for recruiting purposes for six months, and there would be a further unattached reserve of twenty-seven militia battalions. Mr. Haldane spoke of his reorganised army as consisting of two lines in close connection, destined for home defence, the general scheme of which would be that the army and navy would work together, as they did under Elizabeth, under Cromwell, and under the elder and the younger Pitt.

* * *

MR. HALDANE's suggestion that it would not be possible for us, with a population of 44,000,000, to maintain a two-Power standard for our Navy against Germany and America, which could rely on a combined population of 160,000,000, and his conclusion that we may have to depend largely on a land force such as that he has organised, has been strongly criticised in the "Times" by Sir John Colomb, a Conservative, but a good authority on problems of defence. Sir John Colomb says that "Mr. Haldane might, and, indeed, ought, to have added that, if and when that time comes, the Empire, having lost control of its internal communications, will be at an end." The "Times," in a leading article on Friday morning, endorses Sir John Colomb's view, and adds: "This" (the Haldane theory) "is the very negation of the Empire and its common trusts and responsibilities. Can we ever rest our trust on the home defence forces to keep open the maritime communications of the Empire, and, if we cannot keep them open, what becomes of the Empire? We shall not be suspected of any desire to belittle the home defence forces if we say that this kind of language is most pernicious." The matter seems to us serious, because of Mr. Haldane's position, and of the direct challenge which he has offered first to a theory and scheme of home defence accepted by both parties, after an authoritative statement by the late Prime Minister, and secondly to the policy of retrenchment in the army. We hope, therefore, it will be raised in Parliament, with a demand for an explicit and authoritative Ministerial statement.

* * *

AN important agreement has been concluded between Mr. John Redmond and Mr. William O'Brien, which secures Mr. O'Brien's re-entry into the ranks of the Irish Parliamentary Party. The agreement, which does not appear to include Mr. Healy, and has been promoted by at least a section of the Catholic clergy, reaffirms Home Rule to be based on "an Irish Parliament and a responsible Irish Minister," but invites the "co-operation of all classes and creeds" for remedial measures such as the settlement of the University question, and the abolition of landlordism. This implies, we imagine, the acceptance of Mr. Birrell's alternative to Mr. Bryce's plans. Meanwhile, Mr. Ginnell, the somewhat farcical patentee of the practice of cattle-driving, has been tried for contempt of court under the regular process of law, by Mr. Justice Ross, and sentenced in his absence to six months' imprisonment. On Monday he appeared in disguise at Mullingar, and addressed a meeting assembled to welcome a band of released prisoners. He asked the police to allow him to speak, on the plea that he proposed to surrender, but, having spoken, resumed his disguise and escaped, to be recaptured later. Meanwhile, the cattle-driving movement has been deprecated by two rather independent Nationalist members, Mr. Stephen Gwynn and Mr. Kettle, who, however, criticised the treaty with Mr. O'Brien as a weakening of the Nationalist position.

* * *

ON Monday came the news of the Shah's surrender to Parliament, and the end for the moment of the acute Persian crisis. He agrees to banish certain reactionary advisers, to recall certain popular leaders from banishment, to assign a guard of troops to the Parliament, and to place all the troops, including the Cossacks (no longer directly commanded by Russians), under the authority of the Minister of War, who is responsible to Parliament. For the fifth time the Shah has sworn his fidelity to the Constitution on the Koran. The new Cabinet, however, is a mixed body, including several members of the former Cabinet, with Nasim-es-Sultaneh, a personage of doubtful repute, as Premier, and a royal Prince as War Minister. The people of Teheran are said to be dissatisfied, and at Tabriz the Shah has been formally deposed. It is no doubt the knowledge that he is to some extent a Russian protégé which prevents the Parliament itself from taking this latter course.

* * *

THE Indian National Congress opened on Thursday at Surat, a Moderate centre, under the presidency of Mr. Rash Behari Ghose, a Moderate and a member of the Viceroy's Council. The conflict with the extremists began at once, and is as yet undecided, but it is thought probable that they will be excluded from the Congress. They look to Lajpat Rai as their natural head, though a year ago his reputation was purely local. The term "Moderate" is evidently elastic, for it includes Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee, who came forward as a protagonist against the extreme section. The issue is entirely one of tactics and temperament, for no one could be more resolutely nationalist than Mr. Banerjee. The first meeting closed in confusion and some disorder.

* * *

ON Tuesday M. Hervé was condemned at the Paris Assizes to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £120. Had he been charged with the offence of inciting soldiers to disobedience which has been brought home to less conspicuous propagandists of anti-militarism, this verdict would be easier to understand. The crime with which he was charged, however, was that of "insulting the army." It is an extraordinary turn of the wheel of fortune which has caused a Dreyfusard Government, that includes M. Clemenceau and General Picquart, to prosecute a journalist for this particular crime. The insult in question lay in trenchant criticisms against the humanity of the bombardment of Casa Blanca, and the use of a general argument to the effect that French policy in Morocco obeys the prompting of high finance. When one remembers that the whole trouble at Casa Blanca was caused by the interference of the Schneider company with the rights of native landowners in building its quay, the charge does not appear extravagant. Violent and abusive though M. Hervé's language certainly was—he was writing for the masses—the substance of what he said did not differ greatly in kind from the criticisms of English Liberals, some of them now Cabinet Ministers, on the conduct and origins of the Boer War. The more orthodox French Socialists have all said the same things both in the Chamber and in the Press. But M. Clemenceau would hardly venture to put M. Jaurès on his trial. The trial itself was a comedy. Few of the witnesses attended, and those who did were told by the Judge that they were under no obligation to answer the questions of M. Hervé's counsel, who finally withdrew as a protest. Without admitting any sympathy with M. Hervé's general standpoint, it is impossible not to feel that the trial strikes a heavy blow at the liberty of speech in France.

* * *

THE Austrian and Hungarian Delegations met this week to discuss the common affairs of the Dual Monarchy. The speech from the Throne included a passage obviously relating to the improvement in the relations between Germany and the Western Powers, which remarked that "The mitigation noticeable last year in the international situation happily continues." After several optimistic sentences in this vein, it went on by a curious non sequitur to advocate increases in both navy and army estimates. The debates so far have yielded nothing more interesting than a renewed demonstration by the Austrian Slavs against the Prussian Polish Expropriation Bill. That Bill is now assured of success in the Prussian Diet. It had been opposed at first by certain Conservatives, who as landlords, were reluctant to admit the legality of compulsory expropriation in any circumstances. Their objections have been met by amendments which make the Bill more than ever a loi d'exception directed explicitly against the Poles, and only against them. It is purely and simply a measure of plantation worthy of Elizabethan policy in Ireland.

* * *

ON Tuesday the long deferred prosecution of 169 Deputies of the first Duma who signed the Vyborg Manifesto opened in St. Petersburg before a special tribunal. They include the Speaker, M. Mourontseff, a member of the Dolgorouhoff family, and several notable lawyers and professors, most of them Cadets, as well as some Socialists and Labour Members. The manifesto called upon Russian citizens to refuse taxes and recruits as a protest against the Government's policy in first defying, then ignoring, and, at last, dissolving the Duma. This was, no doubt, "an incitement to disobedience and resistance to the law," and it is generally expected that, after a week's trial, all the defendants will receive sentences of at least six months' imprisonment. The chief effect of such a sentence would be to exclude all the ex-deputies concerned from political life for the future. The Vyborg Manifesto was a quasi-revolutionary act. There had been abundant provocation for such a protest, but the Cadets, after launching their defiance, took no steps to give it effect.

* * *

THE news from Natal is conflicting, but exhibits a vacillation and division on the part of the Government which give continuous proof of its incompetence to deal with the native question. It is clear that the Imperial Government must watch the trial of Dinizulu with great care. The preliminary inquiry is being held in gaol, a most improper and oppressive proceeding, and even local protests have appeared against its secrecy and unfairness. We see, for example, that the evidence of a boy of 13, a son of Bambaata, is being taken to prove Dinizulu's complicity in the disturbances of last year. An English law court would not dream of putting children's evidence in the forefront of a charge of a serious character, and are Kaffir boys better witnesses than English ones? The military situation appears to have been grossly mishandled, as is clear from the order to demobilise the troops so unnecessarily mobilised.

THE "Daily Telegraph" is to be congratulated on its organisation of a happy and dignified commemoration of a very great incident in British history, the quelling of the Indian Mutiny. The commemoration took the form of a banquet in the Albert Hall, with Lord Roberts, who, as Lieutenant Roberts, trained a gun at Delhi, and won his Victoria Cross on the battlefield, in the chair. 700 officers and men were able to attend, wearing their war medals on their breasts. Lord Curzon proposed the health of the veterans in a speech of blazing, and at moments of moving rhetoric, largely consisting of a roll-call of splendid names, which all shone forth together in a few heroic months, and exhibited the singular richness and variety of character that happened at that time to adorn the Indian military and civil services. Probably at no other crisis of British history was such a galaxy of heroes assembled. Havelock, Outram, Campbell, the two Lawrences, and John Nicholson, all stood in the front rank, either for character, or for genius, or for both. It is a pity that so great an episode should have been marred by touches of inhumanity, otherwise it would have stood almost alone in glory.

THE Italian Chamber, our Rome correspondent writes, adjourned shortly before Christmas until the end of January for the yearly Christmas recess. During this last short session considerable work was accomplished. The new Bill for recruiting the army was approved, while the budget of emigration offered the opportunity for a broad and interesting discussion on this complex problem. This last question attracted special attention at this moment, when, contrary to what has been going on for years, the Italian emigrants are returning home from the United States in large numbers, owing to the financial crisis there. Indeed, it is expected that 500,000 will be back in a few months, making their employment a serious affair. The Chamber has also approved the Treaty of Commerce and Navigation with Russia, which represents a great success for M. Muravieff, the Russian Ambassador here, as for many years such an understanding between Italy and the Muscovite Empire had been impossible. Another Bill granted the appropriation of over £1,000,000 for urgent measures to check the disasters caused by the earthquake in Calabria and the floods in Northern Italy. One of the most important Bills approved was that establishing complete rest for the working bakers from 9 p.m. to the next morning, so that no bread can any more be made in Italy during the night. This law, besides answering humanitarian and hygienic needs, was rendered necessary by the fact that several municipalities, including that of Milan, had already abolished through city regulations the night work of this class.

THE core of the so-called Druce mystery will be revealed in a few days, when the grave in Highgate Cemetery will be opened under State supervision, and will either exhibit a few rolls of lead or the body of the late Mr. Druce. The former event will strengthen but not prove the case for the prosecution of Mr. Herbert Druce. The latter will dissipate the case of the Druce syndicate and may, quite possibly, lead to the arrest not only of Robert Caldwell but of other supporters of the story of the mock funeral and the identity of the fifth Duke of Portland with the late Mr. T. C. Druce.

THE annual conference of head masters was held at Oxford on Friday and Saturday last. Among the questions discussed was a double-barrelled resolution brought forward by Dr. Rendall, the Head Master of Charterhouse. Dr. Rendall is concerned at the action of the Board of Education in endeavouring to place all secondary schools under the control of county or municipal authorities. We think that the administrative action of the Board of Education has been exaggerated. Neither county nor municipal authorities form an ideal board of governors for secondary schools, but they are to be preferred to an irresponsible governing body. The crying need of secondary and higher education in this country is co-ordination, and the Board of Education is right in working towards this end. The second part of Dr. Rendall's resolution protested against the tendency to narrow the methods of religious teaching and worship in secondary schools within undenominational limits. Such a resolution, though sure of support in a body numbering so many Anglican clergymen, had, unlike the former part of Dr. Rendall's motion, to be put to the vote, and was ultimately carried by 34 votes to 6. The Conference was on firmer ground when discussing the position of assistant masters, as revealed by the decision in "Wright v. Zetland." The head masters were unanimous in the opinion that the Board of Education should take such steps as will give assistant masters a more secure tenure of their positions. Unless this is done, it is inevitable that men of a lower educational standard, and even (which is more alarming) of a lower athletic standard, may be drawn upon to fill the ranks of the teaching profession.

THROUGH the death of Lady Pearce on Christmas Eve, Trinity College, Cambridge, receives the bequest of £400,000—the greatest gift received by any English educational body since the will of Mr. Rhodes—left by her husband, Sir William Pearce, who died on November 2nd last. It is encouraging to see some of our men of wealth following the example set by rich Americans. In America money is sometimes given to promote the economic interests of the giver, but it is given, and there is scarcely an educational institution whose progress is hampered from want of means to carry out any well-considered scheme of reform. The poverty of the response made to the appeal on behalf of the University of Oxford shows how different things are in this country. No one will grudge Trinity College, a worthy mother of many illustrious sons, from Newton to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman and Mr. Balfour, this great endowment, though we cannot help feeling that the gift would be turned to better account by the University than by any of the Colleges.

THE persecution of the Modernists by the Vatican continues. The printers of their brilliant Italian review, "Il Rinnovamento," have been put under the "greater excommunication," which means that the sacrament could not be celebrated if one of their number were known to be present, and deprives them of the right of Christian burial. Even the authors and architects of Italian liberty were less severely handled. Meanwhile, pressure has been brought to bear upon the French episcopacy to secure the dismissal of Mgr. Batiffol, the Rector of the Catholic Institute of Toulouse, and one of the most distinguished of living Catholic scholars. Mgr. Batiffol was referred to by Mgr. Montagnini, the late emissary of the Vatican as "a certain Batiffol," though his name is famous all over literary Europe.

Politics and Affairs.

A CHRISTMAS APPEAL.

CHRISTMAS charity is an old-world institution, and, like other old-world institutions, is held somewhat cheap by a generation set on novelty, and ready to die rather than fail in being up-to-date. People criticise its uses, and sometimes its motives. "It is all very well," they say, "to give a dinner to a hungry family, and return with redoubled appetite to your own, and eat it with a glow of self-approval, and a happy sense of diffused benevolence which will guarantee you against indigestion. But do you seriously suppose you are doing any good, or are you merely mocking people who are hungry for 364 days in the year, by letting them know what it is to be satisfied on the 365th?" And what, pursues the unkind sort of analyst, is your real motive? Is it an overflow of kindness, or are you "accumulating merit," laying up for yourself a store in another world, or merely purchasing mental comfort in this? Quenched by those modern doubts, the lamp of charity has waxed dim. Let us then be duly thankful to the great men who have come forward to light it anew at a very different flame.

During the last week the heart of London has been pierced by a touching appeal on behalf of the underfed children in the elementary schools. Even to the most modern mind, convinced that poverty is a crime, and that the extinction of the helpless is the way to social progress, the spectacle of a child crying for food and getting none remains disturbing. But when the same child is driven into school by the attendance officer and bidden to stay his stomach on the multiplication table, the thing becomes too strong even for the organisers of charity. The more respectable agree that something must be done, and that the problem will not be wholly solved by sending the parents to gaol. The impulse of sympathy spreads to the highest of the land, and we have Lord Rosebery, Lord Rothschild, Lord Avebury and Mr. Balfour coming forward to contribute from their scanty store to these suffering little scholars. But it is not merely the self-denying generosity of these men which has moved the wonder of the world. It is the felicity of their language, the good taste, the high Christian temper, above all, the intellectual originality of their appeal. They are broad minded men who can look beyond the suffering child to the suffering ratepayer. They have a heart to feel not only for Tommy Smith crying over the sums which cold fingers and an unnourished brain cannot set right, but for Sir Thomas Smythe, who already pays £100 a year in rates, and will have to put down his second motor car if they are raised to £101. They have the imagination to realise not only the sufferings of the children who are not fed, but of the County Councillors who decline to feed them, and will have to account for their conduct at no very distant date to the unreasonable parents. Above all, they have important social and political aims in view. They recognise that this is all a part of the one great battle against Socialism. That hungry children should be fed at public cost is a proposal entailing "consequences" which, to the well-fed brain, are fraught with serious danger. It is a step in "the progress of Socialism" which men, whose wealth and rank puts them above all suspicion of partiality, "cannot contemplate without the gravest misgivings." Our social system it seems is so insecurely poised that if we take the old injunction to feed the hungry too seriously, we may bring it down about our ears.

Behold, then, a new motive to stimulate our jaded beneficence. We are to feed the hungry child, not so much because the hungry child deserves to be fed, but because, if we do not feed him, scantily and inefficiently of our goodwill, we shall be compelled to feed him adequately and more expensively out of the rates which we pay. For the future let no one say charity is blind, sentimental, and unreasoning. It is based on a well-thought-out system of social philosophy, on a system of insurance for great wealth. The welfare of the world depends on the prosperity of great financial magnates, and all the energies of society should be bent on keeping them in their place. But though "the poor in a loom is bad," and deserve what they get, there is in man an irrational element of sympathy, which is stirred by the sight of dire distress, especially when it is visited upon children. Pity, as one of our poets has said, is a "rebel passion." It is dangerous to trust sound doctrine too far. We must temper the miseries of the luckless, lest they rise up against us and enlist the lurking forces of sentiment as allies. Not only so, but with a little judgment we can positively enlist sentiment on our own side. By a single well-timed stroke we can stand forth as at once the willing, whole-hearted, generous helpers of the distressed, and the protectors of the middle class. To justice we oppose philanthropy, to prosaic social organisation spontaneous charity. And, the best of it is, that it is a purely business proposition. By giving a shilling we not only gain eternal glory, but we save half-a-crown. By feeding a hungry child now we stifle a demand which would force us to feed two hungry children tomorrow. By doling out three scanty meals a week this winter, we avoid being compelled to supply five full meals a week next winter. Nor do we do too much to save the children, and thereby defeat the wholesome economic laws which accelerate the elimination of the unfit. If a child is fed every day it might grow up into a healthy citizen, and our society would be recruited from the dregs of the population. But with only two or three meals a week, no such calamity is to be anticipated. No child can thrive on alternate days of feeding and starvation. In the vast majority of cases the work of Natural Selection will go on unimpeded. The child will grow up with constitution hopelessly undermined, an easy prey to phthisis, and to all diseases which help to weed out the unfit. At best it will be physically incapable of any strenuous exertion, and will remain in the outcast ranks of the unemployable, and all this without having for a moment injured our sense of virtue, nay, having positively helped to warm us year by year with the glow of self-approving charity.

The motives for well doing never fail. When the theological basis is weakened, positive considerations take its place. In old days, when pure charity failed, there were the hopes and fears of another world, and men gave large donations to the poor as a form of insurance against Fire. We have now a reason adapted to the views of our own day. We give that we may not have to pay. We advance a little lest we be compelled to produce much. We use philanthropy as an insurance against Socialism. It is a great discovery, and we, as Liberals, must be thankful that through Lord Rosebery we have a reflected share in the glory. It is true that Lord Rosebery is no longer one of us. But nothing can alter the fact that he was once a Liberal Prime Minister. Indeed, more and more as the years go on, we realise what we have lost in him, what a salutary check on all our enthusiasms, what a wise guide to turn all our reforming zeal to safe and truly conservative ends. While we were under Lord Rosebery society was safe. As long as he sat upon the safety valve the reforming spirit was powerless. The boiler might burst, but the engine would never travel too fast or too far. And now he returns from his distant and solitary ploughland to save society once more. In well-chosen alliance with the other great leaders of Unionism and high finance, he comes forward to save us from the Poor, and to save us by the gift of Charity. For now there shall abide Poverty, Wealth, and Charity, these three; but the greatest of these, the foundation of the whole, shall be Charity.

MR. HALDANE'S NEW MODEL.

WE hope that Mr. Haldane will take note of the many criticisms that have been passed on his theory of the power of "initiative" which he supposes to reside in the British Crown. The idea, and the word by which he describes it, are strange. We are not aware that the phrase has ever been used by any modern constitutional writer. We are quite sure that it travesties the relationship between the King and his advisers, or the King and Parliament, and that it imagines a state of things alien from the whole conception of the British Constitution. Why was it employed? What does a Minister of the Crown mean when he tells us that "the greater the Sovereign the more initiative could he and did he show," that this greatness consisted in the ability of the King to interpret the wishes of his people, and that the Constitution gave "freedom of initiative to the man who knew how to identify himself with the whole and the whole with himself?" Even Disraeli used no such language when he pretended to establish a mystical connection between "the Monarch and the Multitude." We know from Queen Victoria's letters that at one time she claimed the right to resist and thwart the foreign policy of her Ministers when it conflicted with her ideas of Monarchical privilege. But she claimed no power of "initiative." How could she? The modern powers of the Crown are really secondary. They are in the nature of suggestion and criticism. Bagehot, one of the liveliest and truest observers of social tendencies, as well as of constitutional forms, said that they were reduced to three rights—the right to be consulted, the right to encourage, and the right to warn. The mere statement of these functions shows the limits of a constitutional monarchy. All policy is initiated by the King's Ministers sitting in Cabinet, a body where the King no longer holds a place, and agreeing together to embody it in certain forms. If it is popular and wise, they enjoy the reward. If it is foolish and obnoxious, they suffer. In either event they alone are accountable, the Monarch remaining unaffected. This is his security. The figment that he can do no wrong is, in its modern interpretation, meant to safeguard him against the consequences of acts for which, owing to the immense complications of government, he can have no real responsibility, and to establish the rule of law proceeding from a sovereign Parliament. For example, if Mr. Haldane's army scheme succeeds, is the King to be praised? And if it fails, is the King to be blamed?

All this is, indeed, the child's alphabet of the British Constitution, and it is humiliating to record that even two Conservative journals, like the "Spectator" and the "Guardian," should have a word to say in defence of Mr. Haldane's idle phantasies. There is no need to labour the point, still less to obtrude a party view of it. Hot from the press comes the second volume of Sir William Anson's re-issue of his famous work on the law and custom of the Constitution,* written in full knowledge of the publication of the late Queen's letters and of less recent volumes, like those of Mr. Morley and Mr. Sidney Low. Sir William Anson is a stiff Conservative, but he has no motive for disguising his estimate of the changes under which the British Crown, as he phrases it, "recedes into the background" as the system of Ministerial responsibility attains its full development. "It may be said at once," he writes, "that there is hardly anything which the Sovereign can do without the intervention of written forms, and nothing for which a Minister is not responsible." Sir William Anson even insists, and not without reason, on the constitutional right of a Minister to be present on occasions when the King sees a Foreign Minister. This custom of the Constitution has of late been neglected on one or two occasions, and we think that the Government would be wise to restore it in its old regularity. As for the veto on legislation, that disappeared long ago. The only Monarchical powers which even distantly resemble the initiative are, we imagine, the right to dissolve Parliament, and the right to call upon a statesman to form a Government without asking advice of his predecessor in office, as the Queen called on Lord Rosebery, in 1894, when Mr. Gladstone would have counselled her to call on Lord Spencer. The former right, one of the most dangerous instruments of the Stuart Kings, is rather latent than active, and only an extreme necessity of State would justify resort to it. The second is in the nature of a modifying influence in the working of our party system. It might be unwisely used, and in that case it would at once break down. No modern English King could aim at destroying or disturbing the relations between a political chief and his followers. No King could seek for power outside the great Constitutional fabric. The matter is indeed largely settled by an authoritative letter written by Mr. Sidney Lee, the biographer of the late Queen, to the "Spectator" in 1902, and quoted by Mr. Sidney Low in "The Governance of England." "The Sovereign," says Mr. Lee, "can, under the Constitution, no more initiate a policy for Ministers to follow, or impose on them, by the urgency of his appeal, a policy of his own devising, than he can by his sole authority promulgate a new law."

Where, indeed, lies the scope for the "initiative"

* "The Law and Custom of the Constitution." By Sir William R. Anson. Vol. II. The Crown: Part I. Clarendon Press. 10s. 6d. net.

of the Sovereign? It is untrue to say that he possesses, by virtue of his office, any special power of interpreting the wishes of his people. All such powers began to dwindle when the Sovereign ceased to be associated with the real organ of Government, the Cabinet, and continued only to attend the formal, non-real instrument, the Privy Council. Even in his social relationships the King would be hindered rather than helped in any independent attempt, if he were ever so ill-advised as to make it, to get at the mind of the British people. No man approaches Royalty quite at his ease, or speaks to a King with absolute frankness. Only a few great families, or the specially favoured representatives of one or two powerful classes, or men of the clever but not impressive courtier type, have his ear. The most informed opinion is necessarily at the disposal of the heads of the old political parties, or of the new labour groups. The divinity which hedges a King hedges out the mass of men and women, and probably makes him pine, and pine in vain, for their companionship. What the Monarchy may possess is something which depends largely on the personal merit and record of the actual holder of the dignity of kingship—we mean a continuous experience of foreign and home statesmanship. Our monarch, for example, is on terms of easy and also commanding familiarity with most of his brother sovereigns and their advisers, and we have no doubt that in this capacity he has been of the greatest service to British statesmanship. In this semi-private sphere, a King, if he is a man of years, and powers of work, possessing true insight into character, may wield considerable influence. On the other hand, if he is young, or without special parts or talent for affairs, his influence will be small. But it is all indirect. The power of "initiative," when it was directly used, as by James II., simply meant the summoning to the aid of the anti-legal purposes of the Crown of the worst members of one of the worst political societies that the world has ever known. William III., indeed, used it to better purposes when he avowedly took charge of the foreign policy of the country. But he habitually concealed his designs from his Ministers and from Parliament, and hardly affected to consider purely British interests. Mr. Haldane, it is true, talks of the initiative as being used in "harmony" with the King's Ministers. But if there is "harmony," the initiative proceeds not from the King but from his Ministers, and Mr. Haldane's terms become nonsensical.

What really is in Mr. Haldane's mind is, we suppose, a nebulous idea of what Kingship may mean in some island of Laputa, where metaphysicians are Kings. But we think he is ill-advised to use certain forms of speech and to put in force certain methods of administration. For example, he is good enough to inform an Edinburgh audience that the Order in Council which creates his new army reserve (and puts it under the control of the War Office) is the "biggest order" issued for many years. We do not doubt it. It is rather a large order in more than one sense, for it destroys an old historic force, the Militia, which happens to be under the control of Parliament, and is justly dear to lovers of English liberty, and substitutes for it another kind of force, which will be at the disposal of the Army Council. His army scheme is no work of Liberalism or of democracy, for the changes that would have given it a more popular complexion were refused to the Liberal Party in Parliament, and the estimates that sustain it await the serious criticism of the party whose complaints he ignored last Session. But if the Secretary for War insists on inflicting his new army on the taxpayers, he will be wise to leave them in possession of their old Monarchy.

THE CHANGING EAST.

INTERESTING though it is for its own sake, the Persian crisis has a large significance for all European peoples whose interests involve them in the destinies of the East. Ever since we began to speculate about Orientals at all, we have been the victims of a series of facile prejudices. We imagined that we had got the truth about any race which lives East of Suez, when we had classed it as Oriental. We loved, indeed, to think of it as so extremely Oriental that it almost ceased to be human. We told ourselves that the East is unchanging and unchangeable, that it loves strong government, delights in pageants, honours violence, and is incapable of conceiving the ideas on which modern European statecraft is built. The man who "knows the East," like the more familiar person who "knows women," won a reputation by enumerating for us all the peculiarities, accidental and permanent, of the species which he thought he had studied. The false science of race and craniology aided this tendency, until at last educated Europe had persuaded itself that the supposed preference of the East for autocracy and strong government lay somehow latent in the tint of Oriental skins or the shape of Oriental skulls.

It would probably be much nearer the truth to trace all these "innate" tendencies to our own romantic bias in literature and our own Imperialist bias in politics. The eighteenth century found its intellectual pleasure in idealising the brotherhood of man. The nineteenth thought it more picturesque to declare that "East is East and West is West." When Lord Curzon dazzled all India at the Delhi Durbar, it suited Imperialism to imagine that the sight of a man armed with autocratic powers, seated in glory on the back of an elephant, was all that Indians desired. The excellent persons who are sure that the East loves power and personal rule are also the persons who think that an English village asks only for a feudal squire. The romanticism of the nineteenth century, in short, is much falsier than the universalism of the eighteenth, and nothing like so fine, and, let us add, so truly religious. Rudyard Kipling is quite as far astray as Anacharsis Clootz.

The real obstacle to the growth of a representative system in Mohammedan countries is not so much that the people are wedded to tyranny, as that they have an age-old remedy ready to their hands against tyranny in the idea of a sacred law. It is a vulgar prejudice to imagine that a Mohammedan prince is ever a despot standing above law and public opinion. For every vital decision he must have the approval of the priesthood, and this must be given as a reasoned judgment, based on accepted juridical principles and resting on the test of the Koran. It is a flexible system, which unites the ideas of a written law and a variable interpretation. If the priesthood is venal or weak, the form becomes a farce; but it may be, in strong hands, a potent vehicle for public opinion. Even in our day such decisions have overthrown two Sultans of Turkey.

It is the absence of this last resource against oppression which differentiates the rule of a Cromer from the rule of a Khedive, and the autocracy of a Curzon from the autocracy of a Mogul. A Western bureaucracy established in the East is an alien bureaucracy still. Why was it, then, that the popular revolt in Persia resulted not in a change of régime based on theocracy, but in a genuinely democratic Parliament? The example of Russia, and the influences from the neighbouring Caucasus, were, no doubt, decisive factors. But to those who have read Professor Browne's illuminating book on the modern Persians, another answer will suggest itself. The Persians have outgrown the theocratic stage, because they have outgrown the Mohammedan religion. Babism is still a growing force, and scepticism has for centuries undermined the authority of the priesthood. It is significant that one of the first efforts of the popular party in the new Parliament was to advocate tolerance, and to secularise the common law.

The Constitution and the Parliament were won with surprising ease. The real conflict came last week, and it turned on an economic issue. In the lines of this decisive debate we may trace the real causes which created the demand for popular government. The central fact about Persia is its abysmal poverty. Like all the lands of Central Asia, Persia is suffering from a slow process of desiccation. Villages cling to the roots of the mountains, and even in favoured situations depend on underground tunnels, laboriously maintained, for the water which alone can fertilise their lands. Between the villages lie irreclaimable deserts, and population is so sparse that even the poorest roads can with difficulty be maintained. Power for several generations has belonged to the Kajar tribe and its royal chieftains, a race of Turkish origin, as alien to the Persians as the ruling Manchu dynasty is to the Chinese, and like it, incapable of assimilating the native culture and thought. It lived for plunder, and round the Court grew up an army of princes, adventurers, and lacqueys, whose cupidity consumed the whole resources of the State. It was the beginning of foreign financial bondage, exemplified in the Russian loans and the Belgian customs control, which brought about the national awakening. At the moment of Russia's defeat, the Persians dared to dream that one supreme belated effort might save them from the inevitable absorption. Their real problem is to frame a budget, and to fill their exchequer, and the first step was to stop the drain from the Treasury to the Palace. They decided to fix the Civil List at £100,000—a much larger sum than Norway, for example, allows. At once the Shah, the Princes, the ladies of the Royal harems, the palace police, the palace grooms and mule-drivers, rose in revolt, and, strengthened by the loyalty of these satellites, the Shah meditated a coup d'état, and a return to the past. He threatened the Parliament, arrested the chief Ministers, talked of a dissolution, and claimed for himself the control of the Executive. For a week the crisis raged undecided. Parliament sat in permanence, with its partisans camped and entrenched around it, while the Court gathered its adherents in the Palace Square. Parliament had numbers on its side. In the provinces the secret societies were devoted to its cause. Tabriz even deposed the Shah by telegraph. The soldiery apparently has popular sympathies. There has been no civil war, and for the moment the Parliament has triumphed. The Shah for the fifth time has sworn to observe the Constitution; Parliament has been granted an armed bodyguard, and the troops are placed directly under the Minister of War. On the other hand, while several of the late Ministers are reinstated, the old Premier has been replaced by a doubtful personage of the old corrupt school, and the new Minister of War is a Royal Prince. The conflict, one suspects, has been postponed, and not settled.

It is no doubt the dread of foreign intervention which explains this compromise. Neither side dared to provoke civil war, for civil war would have set the Cossacks in motion. Though official assurances represent England and Russia as acting in concert, there is a certain shade of difference observable in their attitudes. Russia accommodated the Shah with a personal loan when he came to the throne, and Persian democrats ask in Parliament why he is closeted of nights with the Russian Minister. England, which gave sanctuary to the popular leaders during the general strike, has during this crisis shielded the ex-Premier from personal violence. Non-intervention is doubtless consistent with a good deal of intrigue. But happily Sir Edward Grey has pledged himself that there shall be no interference, save in the case of an anti-foreign movement. If that pledge is generously interpreted, Persia may yet have a future. Isolated murders and robberies of foreigners will certainly occur, as they occurred in Russia in the angrier phases of the revolution. But the Persians are probably much too intelligent to organise anything resembling a Boxer rebellion. The country is so poor, that cosmopolitan capital may well be content to leave it alone. Liberal sympathies cannot fail to respond to the strange spectacle of this revolt of poverty against despotism, and only the crudest Philistinism would wish to check an experiment as novel as it is promising.

THE HISTORICAL STUDY OF RELIGION.

It is a sign of the times that the third International Congress for the study of the History of Religions is to assemble next autumn at Oxford. This International Congress, which undoubtedly has a bright future before it, held its first meeting in Paris in the year 1900, and it was recently decided that it should now meet at Oxford, which has given so much help to students of the history of religions by the publication of the "Sacred Books of the East," as well as by the individual labours of many distinguished scholars. The publication of the "Sacred Books of the East" is one of many evidences that the study of religion has entered upon a new phase, and is now being approached from a new point of view. According to the theory which was formulated by St. Paul, developed by St. Augustine, and accepted both by Catholicism and Protestantism, all forms of religion outside Judaism and Christianity are degenerate types of a primitive revelation, which was made to man when he first appeared upon the earth. The rise of Rationalism in the eighteenth century upset many traditional religious conceptions, but even Rationalism continued to accept the theory of a primitive monotheism, and looked upon the religions of the lower races as abortions of the human mind, or as cunning concoctions of the priests. Romanticism also held fast to the Pauline doctrine of a primitive revelation, and religious mythology was regarded as the symbolic form in which men laid hold of the primeval belief in God. Hume was the first to perceive that religion, corresponding in this respect to every other form of belief and life, was not a mighty flash of divine illumination imparted to the ancestors of the human race; its origin was as humble as the primitive thoughts of men, and it developed as the arts and sciences have developed, as individual and social life have developed, with the general rise and progress of civilisation. But Hume's ideas, although fundamentally correct, were enveloped in too materialistic an atmosphere to command widespread acceptance, and we must look to Herder as the man who formulated the principles out of which the modern conception of the origin of religion and the history of religion have taken their rise. Herder dismissed the dogma common to ecclesiasticism and rationalism, that the religions of non-Christian peoples are the decadent products of superstition, diabolism, mental perversity, and priestly craft. He showed that the manifold forms which religion has assumed among the peoples of the earth are not inexplicable monstrosities, but are to be regarded as the natural outcome of successive stages of life and thought. An animistic religion is the natural result of a conception of the world which looks upon the whole of nature, animals, trees, stones, rivers, and mountains, as animated by the same feelings, desires, and passions as ourselves. Such a religion ceases to be an enigma when once we get at the foundations on which it rests. We see in these lowly forms of religion, with their fantastic rites and ceremonies, the pathetic efforts of men to liberate themselves from the blind forces of nature which hamper the happiness of their lives, and to unite themselves with the spiritual energy by which they believed those forces were controlled.

The decay of the old ecclesiastical doctrine of the origin of non-Christian religions was also accelerated by the opening out of the world to the peoples of the West. When Europeans became acquainted with the great religions of the East, with Brahmanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, when they saw the countless millions who looked upon these religions with the same reverence as they regarded the Christian faith, it became impossible for them to accept the old explanation that these great beliefs were merely the work of demons. An examination of the sacred literatures of the East was a revelation to the Western world of the wealth of wisdom and piety on which the Oriental mind was fed. It was discovered that they had a religious tradition much more ancient than our own. It was found that they had religious thinkers who were not unworthy to take their place beside the Israelitish prophets. Many of the rites and practices which were believed to be peculiar to Christianity were found to have their counterpart in the religions of the East. Fasts, pilgrimages, asceticisms of all kinds were found to be common ground to the Christian and Oriental faiths. So striking at many points was the resemblance between the religious practices of the East and West that it was at first difficult to resist the conclusion that the Orientals must have borrowed from Christianity. But the proofs of this were hard to find. In fact, most of these Eastern cults were older than Christianity itself, and many ingenious theories have been put forward to show that the Christian religion has borrowed from them. It must be said that all statements of this kind are exceedingly difficult to prove, unless it can be clearly shown that different religions have come into close and continuous contact with one another. The many features common to Christianity and certain Oriental religions do not in the main arise from the fact that the one religion has borrowed from the other. These common features are due to the far more general circumstance that there is a fundamental similarity in the religious consciousness of the human race, and that this consciousness tends to express itself in similar outward forms. Religious aspiration is a characteristic common to all kinds of religion, and religious aspiration tends in all religions to express itself in the outward form of prayer. The desire for self-mastery is common to all the higher religions. In its highest forms it exhibits itself in a moral discipline of the will; in its lower forms it is manifested outwardly in fastings, scourgings, penances, and external practices of a similar kind.

The decay of the dogmatic and the rise of the historical study of religion has widened our conception of what religion really is. It is not so long ago that Lord Avebury put forward the view that there were uncivilised tribes which had no religion at all. But more minute enquiries have shown that this opinion is unfounded. It is true that among the lowest types of savages we see little or nothing which the civilised man would identify with religion as he has been taught to understand it. But to confine the term religion to its highest forms in Buddhism or Christianity is like confining the term law to the great written codes of Western civilisation. We must extend the meaning of both these terms to the humble and rudimentary forms of law and religion which exist among the rudest types of savages. It is when we have done this that anthropology becomes of immense service to the student of the history of religion. All students of savage life tell us that the uncivilised man, so far from being without religion, is dominated by religious observances from the cradle to the grave. These observations seem to us who are emancipated from the savage conception of life and things as childish and absurd. But they accord with his idea of the scheme of things in the same way as Christian observances accord with the Christian conception of the relation of the Divine to the world and man. Pre-historic research leads to practically the same results as anthropology. However far back we go into the pre-historic past, we almost always find traces of religion, and these traces bear a wonderful resemblance to the uncivilised religions of to-day.

The historical study of religion, although still confronted with a great and laborious task, undoubtedly holds the future in its hands. The dogmatic method is hopelessly discredited, and its disappearance as an intellectual discipline is merely a question of time. It is impossible to get men any longer to accept the vast assumption that one religion contains all the truth, and that this truth is only taught by one particular church. Theologians who shut themselves up in narrow ecclesiastical coteries may continue to believe these things. But the great outside world, which is every year becoming more and more independent of ecclesiastical trammels, demands a method of religious inquiry which starts with facts. The International Congress for the study of religions is based upon such a method, and it is to be hoped that its meeting at Oxford may be the means of widening our conception of religious studies, and of the means by which they ought to be pursued.

Life and Letters.

"LORD OF THE WORLD."

FROM every part of India, by day and night, the pilgrims come, and the roads to this great temple by the sea are always open and always thronged. They come from behind the great mountains, and from the sacred lands of the South, and across the hot plains from the other ocean. The train that shoots out its crowd of dim white figures upon the sand at three every morning pays a high dividend, for under British rule even devotion goes by time. But it is still thought more religious and purifying to make the whole journey on foot, visiting other ancient shrines upon the road, bathing in holy rivers, turning at every dawn towards the rising sun, as all mankind instinctively turns for God, just as for love we turn towards the sunset. To take years upon the journey only extends the glory of expectation, and if you have the holy patience to travel the Grand Trunk Road, measuring every two yards of its length by prostrating your body along the dust, what is space, what is time, when you are on the way to God?

Children and young mothers come if the entire family sets out for holiness, but the best time for the great act of worship is late in middle-age, when for many years the field has been sown and reaped, the buffalo fed, the taxes paid, the children tended, the cotton garment daily washed. Then this visible career is almost over, the shadowy gate to the next stage upward almost in sight. Then men and women long to go on pilgrimage, and untouched by the cares of fortune, family, or any transitory things, they travel forth in calm elation of soul, their thoughts fixed only on the few lasting realities of eternity, till they hear the thud to the long waves upon the sand, and before them rises the great white tower of "The Lord of the Universe," surmounted by its wheel and flag. There stands at length the beautiful vision, the end of all these labours, the revelation of divine essence for which they had waited so many years of repeated seasons in the fields.

It is the antique temple of Juggernaut, "Lord of the World," to which they have come. Yes, our old friend Juggernaut of childhood's stories and journalistic tags—the God in the Car, before whose bloodstained wheels the benighted heathen were driven by deceiving priests to fling themselves shrieking down, and be crushed into hideous mess, until enlightened missionaries and British rulers combined to clean up India's coral strand. Since then, as is well known, such extremity of devotion has been prosecuted as the law directs, and the guide-book tells us that "of recent years much has been done to improve the sanitation of the place." That is a good thing. But, after all, it is only an Englishman whose first thought is of sanitation when he draws near the divine presence, and the British missionaries who first told that weary old tale of the car were as incapable of understanding the divine passion that yearns for union with eternal powers, even at the cost of life, as they would have been incapable of understanding the passion of a woman whose grandson has described to me how with proud bearing and joyful face she walked from her chamber and sat down in the midst of the flames beside her husband's body till their ashes lay indistinguishably commingled. It is sanitary appliances and the "Merry Widow" that appeal most successfully to our Western minds.

The fame of Juggernaut may be due, as scholars say, to some ancient attempt to conciliate under his symbol the Buddhistic reformers with the primeval Hindoo worship. It seems to be certain that his worship as it stands shows the trace of Buddha's influence—Buddha who made the great renunciation, Buddha, the protector of the poor. It is a shrine of peace and conciliation, perhaps the one place in India where old generations saw some hope of acquiring the new purity and kindness of life, without rejecting the sacred traditions of immemorial wisdom brought by their ancestors from lands of bitter cold. And it may have been this bright hope of peace that first established the well-known ruling of Juggernaut's worship that before his sight all castes and ranks and riches are equal, and the woman is equal with the man. On passing between the lions and monsters that guard the four gates of his enclosure, all earthly distinctions of mankind fall away, and only the soul remains to worship. Within that oblong wall, Brahmin may eat with sweeper, and warrior with the retail seller of flesh for carrion Europeans. Along the inner side of the south wall are simple kitchens, where the god's four hundred cooks daily prepare the sacred food for pilgrims, beggars, and all who come. One is served with another, and all may eat from the same dish, side by side, without contamination. Thousands of monks in the service of the god carry the food far and wide through the country, and the pilgrims themselves take some home in their brazen vessels, so that their villagers and children may taste of wisdom, and share the joys of pilgrimage. For wherever the sacred food is eaten, worldly differences disappear, and soul stands bare to soul. It is the sacrament of equality, the consecration of man.

Side by side with Juggernaut stand his brother and sister—quaint figures all of them, hideous with symbolism—the staring eyes of eternal vision, the atrophied hands and feet of eternal meditation. It would be curious to identify the brother with fraternity, and the sister with freedom. But Juggernaut, "Lord of the World," has at all events this attribute of equality, and it appears possible that it is just this simple attribute, and no higher metaphysic reason, which gives his temple its place as the most worshipped shrine of India. Many people worship what most they fall short of, just as in England we worship Christ, whose character and manner of life differ so entirely from our own. Of all great virtues the Indians, perhaps, have been most wanting in the feelings of equality. Their whole system of existence is based on inequality, inevitable and permanent. The man who is born to study the Vedas will continue to study the Vedas, and so will his son. The man who is born to carry filth will continue to carry filth, and so will his son; nor could the daughter of a millionaire ever dream of marriage with a man of learning. This ancient basis of inequality has made the Indian peoples the easiest in the world to govern. It is also, I think, at the bottom of their almost excessive politeness, their reverential manners, their courtly deference to anyone who appears to have been born of higher station, or with higher gifts. No one denies the charm of such qualities. It is an education in behaviour to pass from a Scottish or American crowd to the streets of an Indian city. The obligations of high caste—the cleanliness of food and life, the intellectual alertness, the disregard of wealth—are as valuable as the obligations of noblesse. The only weakness about both is that they are not considered universally binding.

There is much to be said for reverential manners; but take a race which has very little notion of manners of any kind—a race not very sensitive, not very imaginative or sympathetic, trained from boyhood to think very little of personal dignity, and nothing at all of other people's feelings; take such a race and set its most characteristic members, with the help of bayonets and batteries, to dominate an entirely different people, among whom reverential manners are ingrained by nature, and see what evil effects for both races will result. Watch the growing arrogance of the dominant people; watch their demands for deference, their lust for flattery, their irritation at the least sign of independence, their contempt for the race whose obeisance they delight in, their rudeness of manner increasing till it becomes incredible to the relatives they left at home, and would once have seemed incredible to themselves. Then turn to the subordinate race, and watch the growing weakness of character, the temptation to cringe and flatter, the loss of self-respect, the increasing cowardice, the daily humiliation. In that hideous process—in that conflict of manners between two great races, each of which has high qualities of its own, you may recognise the true peril which has been advancing upon Indians and ourselves for the last ten, or, perhaps, fifty years of Indian history. It is not a question of loss of power, or loss of trade. It is a question of a much more serious loss than those.

But what if all this "unrest" of which we hear is only the beginning of another great humanistic reform, another installation of the "Lord of the World," whose attribute is equality? Throughout India we are witnessing the awakening of a new national consciousness, and with it comes a revival of dignity, a resolve no longer to take insults lying down, nor to lick the hand that strikes, or rub the forehead in the dust before any human being, simply because he has a red face and a helmet. Like pilgrims bound for the shrine of Juggernaut in an ecstasy of devotion, the leaders of India are inspired by the secret longing for equality, which is always springing up afresh in human minds. If anyone chooses to say that equality is like Juggernaut's Car, crushing everything equally flat, let him have his little jest. But as I watch the white pilgrims passing to and from the temple in order to partake of equality's sacrament, I am assured in mind that these outward things are but a symbol of an invisible worship, which will renew the face of the Indian people, and save ourselves from a close peril of degeneracy.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

Puri, Gulf of Bengal,
Dec. 1st, 1907.

TULIPS, OLD AND NEW.

THERE are times when the mind which essays the task of harmonising the claims of literature and flowers experiences a difficulty. The garden calls to some prosaic task, such as the pruning of a plum tree or the renovation of a lawn, and, concurrently, there comes the recollection of an unfinished book, which has not the most distant association with either fruit or grass. Here there is an apparent conflict of interests which may cause real mental disquietude, and even give rise to the terrible fear that literature and gardening—inherently the most perfect union that could be devised to refresh the intellect and brighten the routine of daily life—are, after all, irreconcilable.

Those whose outlook on life is wise and benign know, however, that all unions are an affair of compromises, and that which they would concede to trade and marriage they cannot refuse to books and plants. The richest reward for this eminently common-sense view is reaped when the Book and the Flower possess a natural association. What happier moment for the littérateur than that in which the same post brings him a bulb catalogue and a new edition of "La Tulipe Noire"! He gloats again, by the study fire, over the discomfiture of Isaac Boxtel; and then, when the time for extinguishing his lamp arrives, he will snatch one half-hour more to pore over the list of tulips in the catalogue. Later, sleep comes in the midst of a medley of recollections and projects—the lover immured in the castle on the marshes, that lovely bank of tulips at the last Temple flower show, De Witt lying in a welter of blood on the stones, a ramble among the bulb fields of Haarlem, the strip along the north side of the garden which would make such a glorious tulip border, and—and—but the rest is for dreams or for the morrow.

The revival of the tulip is not, happily, the result of a new outbreak of the hysteria which prevailed in years gone by, when houses and lands were bartered for single bulbs of certain varieties. It is a thoroughly sane and rational movement, finding its impulse in the magnificent new material provided by the florists, especially in the form of late flowering sorts. There is no "Semper Augustus" to cause wild flutterings of title deeds, and feverish investigations of tithe charges and quit rents—based, not on the inherent beauty of the flower, but on the tawdry passion for exclusive possession. There are, however, many kinds, in the highest degree beautiful and worthy, the proper utilisation of which will lend new attractiveness to the garden.

Modern tulips bloom during that interregnum when spring flowers are passing, and summer blossoms are only in the bud. Their season is from early May to mid June. Gardeners of the old school, with an ineradicable love for "bedding plants," eye them sourly, and regard them as interlopers. Do they not interfere with the geraniums and calceolarias? If they would only get themselves decently out of flower by the middle of May, so that they could be lifted, and the bed prepared for the summer "stuff," by the end of the month, they would not be so bad. As it is, many a dark look, many a dissatisfied sniff. "I don't deny as they look tolerable well, in their way, but—" and so on.

The gardening of the future will not bind itself to fill beds and borders entirely with flowers of one particular season, moving batches in and out like "shifts" in a factory. It will divide the space among selected plants, and put them in separate groups, so that there is a natural succession of bloom. Thus, daffodils may be followed by tulips, tulips by paeonies, paeonies by phloxes, phloxes by gladioli, and gladioli by Michaelmas daisies. The different things will not be dotted in and out among each other singly, but established in separate colonies. By this system splendid breaks of colour will be provided with a minimum of labour. And there will be no treading of heels, no fuming because something else is being "crowded out."

In such a system of flower gardening what are variously called Late, May flowering, and Cottage, also Darwin, Tulips are certain to play an important part. They have a beauty of their own, and are as superior to, as they are dissimilar from, the common early Dutch tulips which blare so stridently in the public parks. Not the least of their advantages is their long, stout stems, which often lift the flowers nearly a yard above the soil. This asset is of immense value when the tulips are planted in far-off borders, perhaps on the farthest verge of lawns, or at the front of remote shrubberies. However distant, the effect is never that of a smudge; it always has weight, distinctiveness, and dignity.

The flowers are of massive substance, and this not only gives them a solid appearance, but renders them very lasting. The flimsy petals of the early Dutch reflex with sunheat, exposing an ugly stump of ovary and stamens; but the May-bloomers retain their form steadfastly. And we have colours in them that the early section does not give—"art" shades of fawn, cinnamon, orange, and brown; silky softnesses of rose, claret and purple; shimmering pinks and lavenders; firm solid ivory tusks of white; clear canaries and Maréchal Niels. In the glorious "La Merveille" we have a colouring of dusky rose and a rich perfume.

One may not linger long over the catalogues that lie at one's elbow, with their seductive descriptions of beautiful varieties. But, dipping lightly, one revives recollections of some of one's tulip favourites; among the "Darwins," for instance, of "Clara Butt," an exquisite shade of salmon and rosy pink; of "Fraülein Amberg," described as "shaded tints of heliotrope, with a suggestion of amethyst" (plainly irresistible); of "General Kohler," carmine with a satiny sheen; of "La Candeur," white as the driven snow; of "Loveliness," blush on rose; and of "Pride of Haarlem," rose. Amongst the "Cottage" section, of "Billietiana Sunset," red and gold; of "Didieri alba," pure and fragrant; of "Leghorn Bonnet," yellow, with nankeen stripes; of "Inglescombe Scarlet," vermillion; of Mrs. Moon, magnificent, scented yellow; of "Gala Beauty," flaked scarlet and gold; and of "Picotee," white, margined with rose. Yearly the lists of varieties lengthen; yearly the descriptions become more varied, and more overpowering.

It is a moot point whether these noble tulips look their fairest when under the flush of the dawn lights, when they are beating back the noontide sun, or when they are mellowed by the shades of evening. In the different periods they have different aspects, now full of tender appeal,

"Pale hands I loved beside the Shalimar," now martial and heroic, anon gentle and soothing. But in the ceaseless variations of light that play about their great, shining urns; in the flashing and sparkling of their rich wine depths; in their subtle harmonies of elusive colour, they possess a charm that never wears.

One more charm does the tulip possess. In its early stages it has only one colour, but after a pupation stage it "breaks," or becomes "rectified," to use the florist's term. And then it may have several colours, but no fragment of the original. It is like the bursting of the dull cocoon into the brilliant butterfly.

Thus into one flower, hardy enough, and accommodating enough, to thrive in almost any British garden, easy to grow from bulbs planted in autumn and early winter, inexpensive, Nature packs a store of interest and beauty which gives it an all-powerful appeal to garden lovers.

A SHY NEIGHBOURHOOD.

It lies on the circumference of that great wheel of life which is London. It has arisen as if by chance or inspired (in places) by malign fate: scrambled together hastily on rubbish heaps and the river marshes that it might be fashioned into the abode of man. There came to dwell in it those who desired more room to live; and those who were careless whether they lived at all. Great manufactories established themselves within its borders, giving steady work, employing the cream of artisan labour; and also all kinds of furtive, unpleasant, dangerous trades, which were unable, owing to strictness of regulation, to plant themselves within the borders of the Metropolis. Pleasant villas and gardens within easy access of the City drew a vigorous, aspiring middle-class population. At the other end the Docks, with their traditional reputation for providing possibilities of rough unskilled labour, sucked up casual wayfarers from every corner of England. Finally, Government, in its wisdom, drew an artificial boundary round this queer chaos, created it into a municipal borough, labelled it West Ham, and launched it on its perilous way.

Since then it has been always a disturbing element in the public gaze: a public which has no idea of its locality and only desires to forget its existence. To the intense and not unnatural exasperation of its thousands of decent and prosperous citizens, it has come to stand for the very symbol of the modern urban evils of poverty, unemployment, and degradation. Mr. Wyndham last week, seeking for some almost unimaginable horror as the ultimate fate of a Free Trade nation, could chill the blood of his audience by announcing that all England will one day become "a West Ham." Its unemployed form a chronic menace, amongst whom at intervals the charitable public scatter huge sums of money, which is immediately swallowed up without visible improvement. The Guardians of its neighbourhood, unfortunately labelled with the title of their most populous district, have been discovered in that petty and mean corruption which many Guardians have maintained who are still undetected, and some have committed suicide and some are in gaol. A tiny band of militant Socialists once nearly captured its Municipal Councils; and uttered so much noise and violence and truculent boastings as to have made the name of Socialism stink in the nostrils of the good citizens within audible distance. It receives special grants from the Government for its education. It struggles forward under a burden of a ten-shilling rate. Its present condition leaves much to be desired. Its future is problematical.

To those who would know something definite of these astounding regions the work of the "Outer London Inquiry Committee" will come as very welcome. Here at least is a piece of sound investigation removed from the rhetoric of party controversy. For several years they have been carefully accumulating numbers and estimates, examining wage-books, summarising particulars of variation in house rent or employment. And here to-day in "West Ham: A Study in Social and Industrial Problems" (J. M. Dent & Co.), they present a sociological study, bare and often almost forbidding in its detachment and seeming indifference, but a study which may form the bed-rock foundation for the planning of a policy of reform. It is full of curves and tables in the best manner of modern investigation—human misery and confusion set to a kind of austere music. It brushes aside much of the facile generalisations of the too facile political agitator. It furnishes help not only in consideration of this particular centre of industry and poverty, but of all similar centres of industry and poverty: of the developing suburbs which are daily being devoured by the advancing town. It offers on every page, less by direct appeal than in the bare recital of hard fact, the challenge of the Reality by the Might-have-been. This wilderness of huddled streets, this dolorous absence of open spaces and children's playgrounds, these dim labyrinths of grey houses which stretch down, sombre and menacing, in the gloom of the autumn evening, are all the creation of little more than thirty years.

Some facts stand out shining and clear from this analysis. The problem of the unemployed largely resolves itself into a problem of casual labour. And that (again) leads on to the method of work by the shipping companies at the Docks (not, as is so generally assumed, the much-abused Dock Companies), and to the factories which suck up low-grade labour when they want it from a seemingly inexhaustible supply, and discharge it again, when they are satisfied, into the abyss. It is mainly, as is shown by the returns of the Distress Committee, an unskilled labour problem: and it is very largely a problem of a life now so battered and beaten by external hardship and internal weakness as to be worth but little in the open labour market. It works for two or three days a week: now by the waterside, now in the factory, now for one of the various public or private relief funds. It is partly supported by the effort of its wife and family, labouring at sweated industries. Its children struggle somehow through schools, often ragged and half-starved, embark prematurely upon factory life where the demand for their low-paid labour is unlimited, and where they compete (all ignorant) with their own fathers and mothers in order to make it still lower. Until the day when they find themselves fathers and mothers raising up children again to compete against themselves. What unimaginable policy, in the wisdom or devotion of national service or industrial sacrifice, can break through the vicious circle of such forlorn, impossible existence?

The death rate is low, and the streets, like the streets of the City of Promise, are filled with playing children. In much of the smaller house property the cost of the education of these children, as it falls upon the rates, is greater than the total rate which is paid by the cottage. So this whimsical result follows: that the municipality is advised that it is actually the cheapest policy to buy up the land within the borough, and let it lie deserted, rather than allow it to be built over. Empty houses—quite a number of them—stand deserted in the streets: some efficient and habitable, some actually derelict—a nuisance and an eye-sore, not worth repairing, not worth destroying. But these empty houses accompany the vast and increasing problem of overcrowding. As the rates go up, the house rents fall, in this paradoxical region. The main sewer of London, running diagonally through the town, above the heads of the inhabitants, has been converted into a public promenade—"not very attractive" say these investigators. The gigantic Victoria and Albert Docks, one of the largest railway works in the Kingdom, and many prosperous factories whose tall chimneys brood over this "Essex Black Country" represent a conspicuous item in the aggregate of England's national capital. The life that hides from public view in the remoter recesses of this place—street beyond street with no inhabitant not living on the margin of existence—is a life which occupies the other side of the balance-sheet, and may yet, in the multiplication of its infections, prove England's undoing.

Short Story.

A PERSONALLY CONDUCTED TOUR.

Scene.—The bifurcation of a thin, waggly, snake-like African path, with a perspiring white man in the foreground, followed by his boy Saleh and a string of hot and tired porters with loads on their heads. A pitiless sun is overhead, and tall, rank grass and bush everywhere, except where it gives way for the breadth of a few inches to give passage to the path.

White Man: Which is the path to Koroki's? Where is the guide?

Saleh (to porters behind): Allah! Where is the Mwemba?

Porters: Hi! call the Mwemba.

(After a long delay a naked savage with a spear scurries forward.)

White Man (to Saleh): Why is the guide always behind? He has got no load to carry.

Saleh (to guide): He say, why are you always behind?

White Man (to Saleh): I am asking you.

Saleh (to guide): He says he is asking you.

Guide (crossing his legs and preparing for great mental strain): Tell him——

White Man (to Saleh): I am not asking him, I am asking you.

Saleh: Yes, sir.

White Man (to guide, giving up trying to find out why he was behind): Which is the road to Koroki's?

Guide: What does he say?

White Man: Which is the path to Koroki's?

Saleh: He says, which is the path to Koroki's.

Guide: Which is the path to Koroki's?

White Man: Yes.

Saleh: Yes.

Guide (affecting astonishment): Does he want to go to Koroki's?

White Man (getting annoyed): Hasn't he been guiding us to Koroki's for the last three days, and haven't I told him twenty times every hour that I want to go to Koroki's?

Saleh: Yes, sir.

White Man: Ask him then.

Saleh: The white man says, which is the way to Koroki's?

White Man: Ask him if he hasn't been guiding us to Koroki's.

Saleh: Have you been guiding us to Koroki's?

Guide (obligingly): If he wants to go to Koroki's I can show him the way.

White Man: But isn't this the road?

Guide: We can get to Koroki's by this path.

White Man: What is the other road, then?

Guide: Which other road?

White Man (trying a new tack): Is this the only path to Koroki's?

Guide: There is the big road which goes past Njobvu Tete.

White Man: But why didn't we go that way?

Guide: Go by Njobvu Tete?

Saleh: He is asking why we did not go by the road to Njobvu Tete.

Guide: I didn't know that he wanted to go that way.

White Man: Which is the best way now?

Guide: The best way to Njobvu Tete is to take the road from the camp we slept at last night.

White Man: I am not asking about Njobvu Tete, I want to go to Koroki's.

Guide: Oh, Koroki's!

White Man (trying yet another tack): Where does this path go to?

Guide: Where does this path go to?

White Man: Yes.

Guide: This path goes to Mlaka's.

(Groans from the porters, followed by a movement forward along the most beaten of the two paths.)

White Man (to leading porter, with a glimmer of hope): Oh, you know the way, do you?

Leading Porter: Which way?

White Man (encouragingly): The way to Koroki's.

Leading Porter: No, I'm a Msenga, I don't know this country.

White Man: Where are you going to?

Leading Porter: I want to get into camp.

White Man: What camp?

Leading Porter: The camp where we are going to sleep to-night.

White Man: What camp is that?

Leading Porter: I don't know.

White Man: If you don't know, how are you going to find it?

(Leading porter has to admit the force of the argument and waits.)

White Man (to guide): Which is the way to Koroki's?

Guide: To Koroki's?

White Man (with pardonable irritation): Yes, Koroki's, Koroki's, Koroki's, be quick.

Guide: You can go by this path.

White Man: I see two paths, which is it?

Guide: The best way is by Njobvu Tete.

White Man: But you said that we had to go back to get to Njobvu Tete. I want to go to Koroki's by the quickest way.

Guide: You can go which way you like.

White Man: But which is the shortest?

Guide: They are both the same.

White Man: How far is Koroki's from the camp we slept at last night, going by Njobvu Tete?

Guide: How far?

White Man: Yes.

Guide: We would arrive there to-morrow.

White Man: If we started at sunrise from the last camp where would the sun be when we get to Koroki's?

Saleh (who thinks he knows these questions): If we started from here at sunrise, where would the sun be when we get to where we slept last night?

White Man: No, you fool, Koroki's. Ask him, if we started from the camp we slept at last night at sunrise, where would the sun be when we get to Koroki's?

Saleh: If we left the camp we slept at last night at sunrise, where would the sun be when we get to what-his-name, Koroki's?

(Guide looks round the heavens for some time and then points with his spear to the horizon.)

White Man: Oh, sunset! Now ask him, if we start from here now, when would we get to Koroki's?

Saleh: If we go to Koroki's now, when do we get there?

Guide: Koroki's?

Saleh: Yes.

Guide: We get there to-morrow.

White Man: Now ask him where the sun would be when we got there.

Saleh: Where would the sun be when we got to Koroki's?

Guide: Where would the sun be when we got to Koroki's?

Saleh: Yes.

(Guide, after cogitation, points his spear vertically upwards.)

White Man (triumphantly): Oh, noon, then this way is shorter. (Indulgently) Now, if we left here to-morrow morning at sunrise, what time should we get to Koroki's?

(Guide after more cogitation again points his spear vertically upwards.)

White Man (to himself, crestfallen): If we start now we take twenty-four hours to get there, but if we wait till to-morrow we only take six hours. (To Saleh, exasperated.) What does he mean? We get in to Koroki's the same time whether we start now or to-morrow morning.

Saleh: Do we get in to Koroki's the same time if we start now and if we start to-morrow morning?

White Man: You fool, can't you see yourself that Koroki's can't be farther to go now than it would be in the morning?

Saleh: Yes, sir. These Wawemba don't understand like we do. They are fools.

White Man: You are both fools. Now ask him where there is water between here and Koroki's.

Saleh: Is there any water between here and Koroki's?

Guide: Water?

Saleh: Yes, water.

Guide: No, not after the Moa.

White Man: Where is that?

(Guide brandishes his spear round half the horizon.)

White Man: Where is the Moa where the road crosses it?

Guide: In that way (pointing to one of the paths).

White Man: And does that path go to Koroki's?

Guide: Yes, that's the path.

(White man takes the path with a sigh of relief, and after an hour's walk comes to a stream, and the porters put down their loads.)

White Man: Where is the guide?

Saleh: Allah! where is that Mwemba?

(They sit down and wait for him; at last he appears.)

White Man: I told you to walk in front and not behind.

Saleh: The white man told you to walk in front.

Guide: He wants me to walk in front?

Saleh: Yes.

(The guide scurries down the path.)

White Man: Come back, you fool. Hi! call him back; I want to speak to him.

(Guide comes back.)

White Man: If we started from here at sunrise to-morrow, where would the sun be when we got to Koroki's?

Guide: When we got to Koroki's?

White Man: Yes, Koroki's.

(Guide points with his spear about half-way up the heavens.)

White Man: Oh, three hours' trek. Then we can get there to-day.

Guide: No, we can't get there to-day.

White Man: Why not?

Guide: There is no water in the way.

White Man: But there is water at Koroki's?

Guide: No, there is no water now.

White Man: But Koroki's people must drink something.

Guide (anxious to please): No, there is no water there now; but if you had come in the rains, you would have got there very easily.

White Man: What do the people there drink?

Guide: What people?

White Man: Why, Koroki's people.

Guide: There are no people there.

White Man: But Koroki is a big chief with a lot of huts.

Guide: Koroki has left there now and built another village.

White Man (exasperated): Where does he live now?

(Guide points with his spear.)

White Man: Which is the road there?

Guide: The road to Koroki's?

White Man: Yes, his present village.

Guide: The road goes higher up the hill.

White Man: Was it the road where I talked to you before?

Guide: Yes.

White Man: Then why didn't you go that way?

Guide: I didn't know that you wanted to go that way.

White Man: Did you think that I wanted to go to a deserted village?

Guide: I didn't know.

White Man: How far is it to Koroki's present village along that path?

Guide: It is very far.

White Man (angrily): How far?

Guide (wishing to ingratiate himself): Well, perhaps, not very far, only a little far.

White Man: Have we got to go back to the turning again?

Saleh: Have we got to go back to the turning again?

Guide: It is just as the white man likes.

White Man: But you said that was the way.

Saleh: Yes, sir.

White Man: I am not asking you, idiot, you are not the guide. Ask him what we had better do now to get to Koroki's.

Saleh: Is that the way to get to Koroki's?

Guide: Yes.

Saleh: He says yes.

White Man: Yes what?

Saleh: Is that the way?

Guide: Yes.

Saleh: He says yes, that way.

White Man: I asked him what we were to do now. Can we camp on the other road?

Guide: What does he say?

Saleh: Can we camp on the other road?

Guide: Which road?

White Man: The road to Koroki's.

Guide: No, only here.

White Man: But you said that this only went to the deserted village. I want to go to Koroki himself.

Guide (with a gleam of intelligence): You want to go to Koroki's new village?

White Man: Yes, which is the way?

Guide (relapsing): If you like to go this way you can get there.

White Man: Good heavens! I don't like any way. Aren't you paid to guide me to Koroki's. Why don't you go there?

Guide: I thought that you wanted to come this way, but you can go the other if you like.

White Man (aggravated beyond measure): Come on, pick up your loads, we will go along this path till we get somewhere.

(Walks on about three hours and comes to a deserted village. Following the path a little farther he hears the sound of an axe and presently comes to a village.)

White Man (to villager squatting outside a hut): Whose village is this?

Saleh: He says whose village is this?

Villager: He wants to know whose village this is?

Saleh: Yes.

Villager: This village?

Saleh: Yes.

Villager: He wants to know who the chief is?

Saleh: Yes.

Villager: The chief of this village?

Saleh: Yes, what is the name of the chief of this village?

Villager: The chief's name is Koroki, but——

White Man: Thank God! Pitch the tent.

(A little later.)

Saleh (to white man): The Guide wants to know if you are going to give him the present you promised him for bringing you here.

(Volumes of imprecations from inside the tent and night closes in.)

Guide (to Saleh): Why is the white man angry?

KUSIALI.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

A CORRESPONDENT has asked us to suggest the titles of books suitable for use in village libraries. We hope to deal with the subject in a short article in an early issue. We shall be glad at any time to give the publicity of our columns to inquiries of this nature. It often happens that students lose time and trouble through inability to discover where books bearing upon their researches may be found, and it is possible that some of our readers may be willing to help them in this respect.

* * *

IN the meantime, another correspondent wishes to know the names of a few good books on "Modernism." He is not concerned, he says, with Protestant or any other form of Modernism than that written about by Catholics in communion with Rome, but he wants to hear what those Catholics say, against whom the Pope's Encyclical was written. We would suggest Father Tyrrell's "Much Abused Letter" and "Through Scylla and Charybdis; or The Old Theology and the New." The articles contributed by the late Dr. St. George Mivart to "The Nineteenth Century," which, we believe, have been reprinted, also throw some light upon the subject. If our correspondent reads French, "L'Evangile et L'Eglise," "Etudes Evangeliques," "Etudes Bibliques," and "Les Mythes Babyloniens et les premiers Chapitres de la Genèse," all by Abbé Loisy, will help him. The first of these has been translated into English. If he reads Italian, he should see the works of Abbé Murri, and the recently issued "Il Programma dei Modernisti." Mr. Fisher Unwin is preparing an English translation of the "Programma," and Mr. Murray has issued an excellent version of a pamphlet "What We Want," an open letter addressed to the Pope by some Italian priests, though translated by an Anglican clergyman, the Rev. A. L. Lilley.

* * *

IT has fallen to a Frenchman to give us the first complete critical edition of the works of Sir Philip Sidney. They are to be edited by Professor Albert Feuillerat of Rennes, and issued by the Cambridge University Press in three volumes, two of text and one of notes. Considering the impression that Sir Philip Sidney's brief career has left upon the imagination of his fellow-countrymen, it is surprising that none of them has undertaken the task of editing his complete works. There are, of course, excellent editions of many of his writings, the more notable being Professor Pollard's edition of "Astrophel and Stella," Dr. Grosart's edition of the "Poems," and this year excellent editions of "An Apologie for Poetrie," by Professor Churton Collins, and the "Arcadia," by Mr. E. A. Baker, have appeared. Professor Feuillerat is one of the contributors to "The Cambridge History of English Literature."

* * *

DR. ANGELO S. RAPPOPORT, whose "Curse of the Romanovs," published this year, has the distinction of being prohibited by the Russian Government, is at present engaged upon a history of philosophy, which will be published by Messrs. Dent. The work, besides giving an account of the various philosophic systems, will deal with the philosophy of some of the chief poets and novelists. "A History of European Nations" is another book by Dr. Rappoport which Messrs. Dent will publish during the coming year.

* * *

IF lecturing to an audience of ladies is Dr. Emil Reich's forte, omniscience seems to be his foible. At any rate, he has in preparation no less a work than a "General History of Western Nations, from 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D." The work is, he says, "the result of twenty-seven years' study of the literary and monumental sources of history, and of the close observation and analysis, in loco, of twenty different types of contemporary civilisation." "I attempt to do for the history of the Western nations," he explains in his preface, "what Bichat did for Anatomy, Bopp and Pott for Linguistics, or Savigny for Roman Law; I try to write the 'General Part' of history." He explains that at the basis of all that happened in the history of the Western nations "there is a series of some twenty or thirty general facts, which singly, and still more by meeting, blending, or antagonising one another, created a multitude of particular facts. The present work treats mainly of these general facts, each of which has conditions, details, and effects of its own. In addition to a statement of these three features of a given general fact, I try to discover the real cause, that is, the human factor, or, in other words, the psychological motive underlying each of the general facts as its prime cause." It will be interesting to see the "twenty or thirty general facts" (no more, no less) which historians have hitherto failed to disentangle, as stated, and their motives explained, by the interpreter of Plato and the author of "Germany's Swelled Head."

* * *

AMONG the books in Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's autumn list that have not yet appeared is "The Brontës: Life and Letters," by Mr. Clement K. Shorter. Mr. Shorter has already told us a good deal about the Brontës, both in books and contributions to periodicals. His coming work is an attempt to present a full and final record of the lives of the three sisters from the biographies of Mrs. Gaskell and others, and from many hitherto unpublished letters and manuscripts. Mr. Shorter is also preparing a new life of George Borrow.

* * *

DR. THEODOR BARTH, the leading Liberal journalist of Germany, travelled during the summer in the United States and Canada, and sent some very interesting letters (Reisebriefe ans Amerika) to the "Frankfurt Zeitung" embodying his impressions, which he was able to compare with those of a previous tour. These letters have now been thrown into book form, and appear in a volume just published by Georg Reimer (Berlin), under the title, "Amerikanische Eindrücke: eine impressionistische Schilderung Amerikanische Zustände in Briefen." The last letter contains an interesting personal view of the possibilities of the coming Presidential elections.

* * *

THE cheap reprint is meeting with as much favour in France as it has received in this country. Two of the best of the series are the "Collection Ollendorff," at a franc, and Calmann-Lévy's "Nouvelle Collection Illustrée," at 95 centimes each volume. A new series, called the "Collection des Prosateurs illustres français et étrangers," has just been announced by M. Louis Michaud. The first six volumes include books by J. J. Rousseau, Stendhal, Eugène Sue, Crébillon fils, Sterne, and Walter Scott.

* * *

DURING the past year the world of letters has lost an unusually large number of distinguished men. The death-roll includes Lord Kelvin, Francis Thompson, Sir Spencer Walpole, Professor David Masson, Gerald Massey, Ian Maclaren, T. B. Aldrich, Joseph Knight, Professor F. W. Maitland, David Christie Murray, Hamilton Aidé, Joseph Hatton, Miss Mary E. Coleridge, and Moncure D. Conway in England and America; Kuno Fischer in Germany; Marcellin Berthelot, Sully Prudhomme, J. K. Huysmans, and André Theuriet, in France; and Giosué Carducci in Italy.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"George Morland: His Life and Works." By Sir Walter Gilbey and E. D. Cumming. (Black. 20s. net.)

"The Law and Custom of the Constitution." Third Edition. Vol. II. "The Crown." Part I. By Sir W. R. Anson. (Clarendon Press. 10s. 6d. net.)

"The Art of Landscape Gardening." By Humphrey Repton. Edited by John Nolen. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Book of Living Poets." Edited by Walter Jerrold. (Alston Rivers. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Birds of Britain." By J. Lewis Bonhote. With Illustrations by H. E. Dresser. (Black. 20s. net.)

"Oddities of the Law." By N. Arthur Heywood. (Ouseley 2s. 6d. net.)

"Outlines of Church History." By Professor Hans von Schubert. With a Supplementary Chapter by Miss Alice Gardner. (Williams and Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Essais de Montaigne." (Self-édition. Tome III.) Par le Général Michaud. (Paris: Firmin-Didot. 15 fr.)

"Pierre Légrand: Un Parlementaire Français de 1876 à 1895." Par P. Arnous. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 7 fr. 50.)

"La Fontaine: Ses Facultés Psychiques, sa Philosophie, sa Mentalité, son Caractère." Par Jean Paul Nayrac. (Paris: Paulin. 5 fr.)

"Euripide et ses Idées." Par Paul Masqueray. (Paris: Hachette. 10 fr.)

Letters to the Editor.

"THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been so much interested in Mrs. Frederic Harrison's clever, sympathetic, and useful resumé of children's books in your issue of December 7th that you must forgive my troubling you with this.

As I am very early Victorian, I can remember books of an earlier date than Mrs. Harrison can do, and I am anxious to add these books to her list.

As I have so recently been reading these books to and with my own grandchildren, I am delighted to find that the old-world charm and flavour of these more ancient books are appreciated by our children of to-day.

Our first experiment in literature ("qualified to amuse and edify") was Mrs. Trimmer's "History of the Robins" (my audience was composed of two little girls between four and seven years old), and they were delighted with the quaint old-world style and the charming realistic wood-cuts.

Next we took up "Willy, or the Seasons," by Mrs. Marcet, in four octavo volumes. If your would-be readers are not prepared for the intense priggishness of the infant Willy they will be more amused than edified. The priggishness one finds in books of that early date is surprising, indeed, to me incomprehensible, and my only solution is that our short-sighted grandparents accepted such manifestations on the prig's part as showing that he was walking in the right way. While I pause here I am most anxious to ask your readers for a real good definition of a "prig." I hardly expect any persons to agree on this subject, the definition depending on the way in which we have met our (relative) "prig," and how he defends himself. Next to "Willy, or the Seasons" we welcome Miss Edgworth's "Frank," and Frank in three volumes being older than Willy, we expect and hope that his priggishness may be on the wane, but alas! no; if anything, it is more developed, and consequently the more amusing. After "Frank" comes "Rosamond," by the same author, "Evenings at Home," "Sandford and Merton"; and later for girls "Mary and Florence," and sequel, "Leila at Home and on the Island," "Settlers in Canada," "The Prairie Bird."

Then I think we come to the Miss Sewell and Miss Yonge stage; but have I, indeed, so forgotten my "Laneton Parsonage," by Miss Sewell, to wonder what Mrs. F. Harrison means by "its torture chambers"? Others of Miss Sewell's remind me (specially "The Experience of Life") of Miss Austin's writings. I do not agree with Mrs. F. Harrison as to the morbid influence of such books as "Queechy" or even "Ministering Children," though I should prefer substituting for "Queechy" "The Wide, Wide World," Miss Wetherall, also "The Lamplighter," and Mrs. Beecher Stowe. Now as regards children's books we have almost arrived at the time when George MacDonald's stories—fairy-like many of them, though all written with a purpose—were brought out in "Sunday at Home," and so were useful to those whose views being Sabbatarian, were limited in consequence. I never quite appreciated "The Fairchild Family," to my loss I am sure; but I remember it so little, or it made so little impression on me, that I do not know where to place it. I have most pleasing memories of the "Camp of Refuge" (or "The Monks of Ely"). I am most anxious to recover a copy, though I have not come across one for long.

Girls of sixteen, specially the musical ones, would be enchanted with "Charles Ancherster" (author unknown), dedicated to Disraeli—a musical rhapsody—being the autobiography of Liszt, Mendelssohn, the hero, &c. It must have come out even in the sixties, and should be recovered if possible.

In answer to Mrs. F. Harrison's question No. 1, I would remind her of these books: Mrs. Marcet's "Willy, or the Seasons," Trimmer's "History of the Robins," Miss Edgworth's "Frank," "Rosamond," "Leila on the Island," "Mary and Florence," "Home Influence," "Settlers in Canada," "Masterman Ready" (children's edition), "Prairie Bird," "Experience of Life," "Amy Herbert" (Miss Sewell).—Yours, &c.

ELLEN G. RENDEL.

Château Thorenc, Cannes.

December 20th, 1907.

THE STUDY OF RELIGIOUS HISTORY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you afford us the hospitality of your columns to announce to your readers that the Third International Congress for the History of Religions will be held at Oxford next September, from the 15th to the 18th.

The Congress was founded in Paris in the year 1900, and held its second meeting at Basle in 1904. In arranging for the third meeting in 1908 the International Committee suggested that it should assemble in Oxford, where so much help has been supplied to students of the History of Religions by the publication of the "Sacred Books of the East," under the auspices of the University, as well as by the individual labours of many distinguished scholars. We are happy to state that in response to a widely-signed request, the Council of the University has, on the suggestion of the Vice-Chancellor, kindly reserved suitable rooms in the Examination Schools for the use of the Congress. Professor Percy Gardner, Litt.D., has been appointed Chairman of the Local Committee, which includes the names of Professors Driver, Cheyne, Sanday, Sayce, Bullock, Macdonell, Margoliouth, Sir John Rhys and Tylor, Dr. Edward Caird, the Principal of Mansfield, and other well known teachers.

In accordance with the arrangements of previous Congresses, the meetings will be of two kinds: (1) General meetings, for papers or lectures of wider import; (2) Meetings of sections for papers, followed by discussion. The Congress will adhere to the fundamental rule adopted in Paris in 1900: "Les travaux et les discussions du Congrès auront essentiellement un caractère historique. Les polémiques d'ordre confessionnel ou dogmatique sont interdites."

All communications respecting membership, papers, &c., should be addressed to either of the undersigned.—Yours, &c.,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER,
109, Banbury Road, Oxford.
L. R. FARNELL,
191, Woodstock Road, Oxford.

December 21st, 1907.

"THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Chesterton may have "heard of Newman," but there is at least one book by that great theologian which he does not seem to have read, or at any rate does not seem to remember. I would humbly commend to his attention "An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine." He will find it an interesting and possibly also an instructive volume. On page 44 (my copy is the first edition, published in 1845) he may read: "It is plain that mathematical developments, that is, the system of truths drawn out from mathematical definitions or equations, do not fall under our present subject, though altogether analogous to it." And yet Mr. Chesterton seizes on Euclid behind which to take shelter from your criticisms! As regards the general question, which is, as I understand it, the right of human reason (inspired and led by God, a Catholic would add) to play upon and elucidate the basic meaning hidden under the symbolism of dogmas, the following passages, taken from pp. 35 and 38 of the Essay, set forth Newman's view:

"But when some great enunciation, whether true or false, about human nature or present good, or government, or duty, or religion, is carried forward into the public throng and draws attention, then it is not only passively admitted in this or that form into the minds of men, but it becomes a living principle within them, leading them to an ever-new contemplation of itself, an acting upon it, and a propagation of it. . . . Let one such idea get possession of the popular mind, or the mind of any set of persons, and it is not difficult to understand the effects which will ensue. There will be a general agitation of thought, and an action of mind both upon itself and upon other minds. New lights will be brought to bear upon the original idea, aspects will multiply, and judgments will accumulate. . . . Moreover, an idea not only modifies, but, as has been implied, is modified or at least influenced by the state of things in which it is carried out. . . . Its beginnings are no measure of its capabilities, nor its scope. At first, no one knows what it is, or what it is worth."

Like other thinkers, Newman did not realise all that was involved in his theory of development, but it is, as you said, the basis on which modern theology has been built. Mr. Chesterton's view of a "cast-iron creed" is the antithesis of Liberalism. It is the old argument that the slave who has a good master is really more free and better off than the free man who has to look after his own interests.—Yours, &c.,

MODERNIST.

Chiswick, December 23rd, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Perhaps you will allow me space for a short word in this interesting discussion.

Newman says in his Apologia, "From the age of fifteen, dogma has been the fundamental principle of my religion: I know no other religion; I cannot enter into the idea of any other sort of religion; religion as a mere sentiment is to me a dream and a mockery." Is not religious sentiment—vital immanence—proclaimed as the origin and warrant of faith by the Modernist; and the formulas called dogma, as but inadequate and impermanent symbols? How do his "Modernist sons" reconcile a "germ idea" such as this with their claim to be his true intellectual offspring?

In describing the Church passing through one of those "periods of undue repression and silence" referred to by Mr. Chesterton, Newman says in the closing words of his essay on development: "She pauses in her course, and almost suspends her functions; she rises again, and she is herself once more; all things are in their place and ready for action. Doctrine is where it was, and usage, and precedence, and principles, and policy; there may be changes, but they are consolidations or adaptations; all is unequivocal and determinate, with an identity which there is no disputing. Indeed, it is one of the most popular charges against the Catholic Church at this very time that she is 'incorrigible';—change she cannot, if we listen to St. Athanasias or St. Leo; change she never will, if we believe the controversialist or alarmist of the present day." The italics are mine, vide the "Times" article on Father Tyrrell's letters.

"A reader" in your last week's issue says Mr. Chesterton's remarks are "ridiculous." Those who have read Newman will scarcely agree with him, and may, perhaps, think the "reader" himself amenable to the charge in his "illuminating" instance of what he considers a change in the meaning of a Creed.—Yours, &c.,

L. WATERS.

Bartra, Eglinton Road, Dublin,
December 21st, 1907.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The curious thing about so open-eyed a man as Mr. Chesterton is that he continues to hug to himself the delusion that Anglo-Catholicism is the same as Roman Catholicism if only it is called "Catholicism." Roman Catholicism as a system is complete, logical, and, granting its premisses, convincing. Anglo-Catholicism is utterly illogical and impossible because it attempts to start from Roman Catholic premisses and then takes refuge in what is an essentially Protestant conclusion. In reality there are only two systems of religion claiming to bear the name of historic Christianity, Roman Catholicism and Evangelical Protestantism, and these two are diametrically and fundamentally opposed. Those who would know the hopelessly impossible position of Ritualism should read the second volume of Professor Gwatkin's great work, "The Knowledge of God." A well-known pervert from Anglicanism not long ago said to a young man: "Either come over to the Catholic Church or else remain an Evangelical. Do not become a Ritualist." And a Roman Catholic priest when lately passing a notorious Ritualistic Church in the South of England, pointed to it and said "Mock turtle!"—Yours, &c.,

OXONIAN.

December 23rd, 1907.

MR. HALDANE'S IDEAS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—All who value the authentic Liberal note will thank you for the plain speaking of your two articles in last week's NATION—"The Real Enemies of Liberalism," and "Mr. Haldane's Ideas." It is in regard to the latter that I would ask permission to make a few remarks.

Are not Liberals getting somewhat tired of the daily loquacity of the Secretary of State for War? He has been by far the most frequent, and the least Liberal, Cabinet orator during the political recess. It was with feelings of considerable disgust that we witnessed the best part of the second Parliamentary Session of the present Government devoted to Mr. Haldane's Army scheme—a scheme which allows cadet corps and rifle clubs (so assiduously fostered by Lord Roberts) to dip into the national exchequer, and threatens a very ominous extension of militarism in the midst of our civic life. Mr. Haldane appears now to be raising the familiar Jingo bogey of a possible invasion, for the purpose of getting recruits into his territorial army, and defeating the efforts of pacifists to secure a reduction of the Army Estimates for the coming year. Following upon the feeble display of British delegates at The Hague, this is creating a growing feeling of dissatisfaction amongst sincere Liberals who helped to place the present Government in power. If Mr. Haldane's policy represents the last word of official Liberalism, there are many Liberals who will be found in another camp at the next election. We do not interpret Liberalism as an "easy descent" towards universal and compulsory military service.

Your powerful journal is doing a great service to the Party by raising the question "whether Mr. Haldane's ideas are Liberal and Radical ideas." Judging from what I hear, and from the advocacy of them by Unionist and militarist journals, the answer to the question is in the negative. At any rate, many Liberals besides myself would be glad if headquarters could be made to realise that we are suffering at present from "Too much Haldane."—Yours, &c.,

LIBERAL PACIFIST.

December 21st, 1907.

"THE HOUSE OF LORDS AND THE REFERENDUM."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the letter entitled "The House of Lords and the Referendum," which appeared in your issue of the 21st inst., Mr. G. L. Bruce propounds a difficulty which is felt by an increasing number of electors.

"The plain man," says he, "asks what security is there that neither Home Rule nor Tariff Reform shall become law unless and until the country is persuaded. He wants to vote against the Tories, but he does not always want to vote for Home Rule. He wants to vote against the Liberals, but he does not always want to vote for Protection. What security has he that an election such as 1895, which condemned the Liberals; or an election such as 1906, which condemned the Tories, will not bring Protection or Home Rule with it?"

Mr. Bruce's difficulty can easily be solved by the adoption of a more reasonable electoral system. Proportional representation not only enables each considerable section of political opinion to obtain its fair share of representation in the House of Commons, but confers upon each elector much greater freedom in the exercise of the franchise. With the enlarged constituencies, which proportional representation involves, there would be a greater range of candidates from which to select, and the number of electors who would be unable to find a candidate with whom they were in substantial agreement would be reduced to a minimum.

Without proportional representation the referendum would often involve a considerable waste of public time and money. Our present electoral system sometimes results, as in 1874 and in 1886, in the return of a majority of the House of Commons by a minority of the electors, and at other times, as in 1900 and in 1906, in a very considerable over-representation of the victorious party. With a House of Commons so unrepresentative the referendum might often result in the rejection of measures on which much time and energy had been spent, but, if the House of Commons were a true expression of national opinion, the measures on which its energies had been expended would, if submitted to the popular vote, much more readily find approval.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN H. HUMPHREYS,

Hon. Secretary, The Proportional Representation Society.

107, Algernon Road, Lewisham, London, S.E.

December 23rd, 1907.

"THE COST OF OLD-AGE PENSIONS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Anent your leading article of Saturday last, "The Cost of Old Age Pensions," I would suggest the following scheme:—

Impose a duty on contract notes for the sale or purchase of any stock or marketable security dealt in and printed in the official lists of the Stock Exchanges of the country, on a sliding scale ad valorem. The Bankers' Clearing House Statement is an index of the huge amount of Stock Exchange business done:—

	1906.	1905.
Grand total	£12,711,334,000	£12,287,935,000
Town clearing total	11,719,021,000	11,355,250,000
4ths of the months	524,816,000	497,070,000
Consols settling days	644,534,000	638,783,000
Stock Exchange account days	2,031,582,000	2,070,622,000

From these remarkable figures it is evident that the gigantic amount of Stock Exchange dealings (speculations and investments) might easily bear more on the present contract note than that of one shilling of the value of £100 and upwards.

It must be taken into consideration that foreign bourses and other business centres of the world transacting arbitrage business with this country, are also contributing towards the duty.

The tax would mainly fall on the monied classes; would be easy to collect, at a comparatively small cost; would not obstruct business, as it would have no effect on bona-fide investments. Its moral advantage would be especially to hinder gambling in "options" and "futures" on the exchanges of the country.

It should produce an enormous revenue, chiefly from dealers in stocks and shares, foreign loan contractors, trustees, bankers, insurance companies, &c.

The Treasury could easily formulate a suitable tariff on a sliding scale ad valorem.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERT RAPHAEL.

National Liberal Club,

December 3rd, 1907.

THE BAGHDAD RAILWAY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There has been much speculation as to the real objects of the Kaiser's visit to England, and among these the question of financing the Baghdad Railway was frequently mentioned. In Germany, however, any intention of the Kaiser's of bringing it to the front was, as a rule, denied.

It is difficult as yet to say whether both Governments may have had any more concrete objects in view than the cementing of peace and goodwill between the two foremost nations of the globe. The extraordinary enthusiasm of the Emperor's reception in the City should, to the dispassionate observer, appear to be an indication that some more direct substantial good was expected from the meeting of the two sovereigns. M. Francis Delaisi, a writer in "La Revue," seems to be thoroughly convinced that the Baghdad Railway is, indeed, what made the German Emperor repeat his visit of eight years ago.

What is the Baghdad Railway? "The axle of European politics," he says, "2,800 kilometres of track; 500 millions of stock, representing an equal value of rails, locomotives, bridges, tunnels, and other works. Baghdad at five days distance from Constantinople, instead of fifty-five days; the Turkish troops available at the shortest notice in any part of the Sultan's domain; the Ottoman Empire consolidated."

The Baghdad Railway was from the beginning a German enterprise. Nothing except railways can save the Ottoman Empire from its apparent doom. This the Sultan acknowledges, and this the German Realpolitiker have discerned with a quick eye, and mean to turn to advantage. What the sick man wants is money and steel. Germany was going to procure both. She was ready to open her banks to the financing of railway enterprises in the Turkish Empire, provided the rails and the rolling stock were taken from her manufacturers. The money was thus to remain in the country, and the sick man should be cured to the satisfaction both of himself and of his medical advisers.

However, as M. Delaisi takes it, England, France, and Russia, to say nothing of Austria, are coveting the Turkish inheritance for at least two centuries. By an exceedingly smart diplomatic play—si non e vero e bene trovato—the Kaiser diverted the Czar's ambition to the Far Eastern adventure of 1895-1905, and whilst Russia was dreaming of Peking, and England of South Africa, the German diplomats went to Baghdad. On November 27th, 1899, the Convention which placed the construction of the Baghdad Railway in German hands was signed at Constantinople.

The French writer then traces Germany's financial difficulties of 1901-1902, which caused her to look out for the help of France. This led to the formation of a German-French banking syndicate, and to the signing of the Concession-Decree by the Sultan. A great triumph this was for German diplomacy, German industry, and German banking. The Baghdad Railway now seemed within the reach of possibilities. It was to revive the richest countries of antiquity, the empire of Croesus, Assyria, Armenia, Babylon was to be awakened from its sleep of ages.

However, the difference between the costs of the enterprise and its produce during the first twenty years or so had to be found. No Government in ordinary circumstances would hesitate to guarantee this difference in an affair of such magnitude and prospects, on account of the enormous profits which any country should reap from it. Turkey, though, is no ordinary country. She is not free. Her monopolies are controlled by her five mighty guardians: France, England, Germany, Austria, and Italy, and she is prevented from mortgaging her custom rights, by the treaties with thirteen European Powers, as no alterations can be made in the tariff without their consent.

A conference of the representatives of these thirteen Powers was nevertheless summoned at Constantinople, and the Sultan was allowed an increase of 3 per cent. of the import duties. But whilst Abdul Hamid and William II. proposed part of this increase to be employed for the Baghdad Railway, England required the whole of it for Macedonia. So the railway project had to be dropped. "Et tristement," the French writer says, "Guillaume II. s'en va refaire à Londres la visite 'fascinatrice' de 1899."

Thus the Emperor's visit to England, according to Mr. Delaisi, had principally no other object than to make from the Baghdad Railway an international, instead of a German enterprise. The aid of England, as of France, had to be asked, by dire necessity, if Germany was to have a finger in the pie at all. In no case Germany could afford being excluded from Asiatic Turkey, as she had been surrounded in nearly every other part of the globe.—Yours, &c.,

CONTINENTAL.

THE MEANING OF IRISH POLITICS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Apparently, to judge from the article, entitled "The New Phase of the Land War," in a recent week's NATION, English Liberals have not yet either tried or begun to grasp the one solitary fact which it is necessary for them to grasp, if they wish to attain to the most elementary understanding of Irish history and Irish politics. "The vital cause of discontent," declares your leader-writer, "now, as always, is agrarian." The vital cause of discontent, if you will forgive me for saying so, is nothing of the sort. It is not misgovernment, but foreign government, from which Ireland is suffering, as any clear-headed Nationalist will tell you. England's great crime against Ireland is not the confiscation and misuse of Irish land, the suppression of Irish industries, or the persecution of Irish Catholics. These are all crimes of a sufficient blackness. They are all petty and inconsiderable, however, compared with the centuries-old crime of attempting to rule Ireland against the will of the Irish people. It was against this crime, and not against any merely agrarian or sectarian evil, that Hugh O'Neill fought in the sixteenth century, and Owen Roe in the seventeenth. It was this criminal design that the Volunteers and the United Irishmen combated in the eighteenth century, and the Young Irelanders and the Fenians in the nineteenth century, and to which the Sinn Féiners are seeking to put an end to-day. Possibly, Englishmen do not realise that it is really a crime that they are committing in remaining in Ireland, for belief in the rights of the smaller nationalities seems to grow weaker in England every day. Your leader-writer, indeed, in writing of the foreign government of Ireland, puts the word foreign in inverted commas, as though it were an absurd adjective to use in the circumstances, and Ireland were merely an English province or colony. None the less, Ireland is a nation—as foreign to England as she is to France or Russia. Until English Liberals have grasped that fact, they cannot be said to have mastered the bare A B C of the Irish question.

Another point. Your contributor, in the course of his article, casts a slur upon Irish political methods that ought surely not to have been permitted in the columns of THE NATION. "We are far removed," he writes, "from the hideous tumult of twenty-seven years ago, with cattle-maiming and the shooting of landlords and their agents as part of a deliberate policy." These words mean, if they mean anything, that the forces of Irish Nationalism deliberately set on foot and approved of a policy which included the maiming of cattle. Now, twenty-seven years ago, Irish Nationalism was making use of the agrarian weapon to obtain its ends, and had just organised itself in the Land League. Here is the policy of the Land League in regard to cattle-maiming, as set forth in the late Michael Davitt's official Memorandum of Instructions to Organisers and Officers of the Branches of the Land League, issued in December, 1880:—

"In speaking of injuries inflicted upon dumb animals" (Davitt writes), "we cannot for a single instant believe either the numerous reports of these monstrous outrages which the landlord organs are publishing, or that a single man within the ranks of our organisation would be guilty of participating in the few cases which, we are sorry to say, have been authenticated. No injustice in the power of Irish landlordism to perpetrate upon our people could justify in the least degree the unfeeling brutality which inflicts injuries or suffering upon harmless and defenceless animals in revenge for the wrongs committed by their owners. . . . Agents of the Associated Press throughout the country are known to have manufactured outrages near their districts in order to turn them to account in obtaining money by feeding the criminal appetite of English readers."

Cattle-maiming was never "part of a deliberate policy" in Nationalist Ireland. It was always an exceptional form of crime, and never either typical or general among Irish Nationalists. In the year 1880—your contributor's "twenty-seven years ago"—Mr. W. E. Forster, the Liberal Chief Secretary, and perhaps, the greatest outrage-monger who was ever sent to Ireland, was able to discover exactly 101 cases of maiming cattle. Now, in England, as Mr. T. P. O'Connor reminds us, in "The Parnell Movement," there had been 2,726 convictions for cruelty to animals in 1877, and 3,533 convictions in 1878. In the single month of November in the year 1880 itself, there were 323 of these convictions—more by three times than the number of outrages upon animals that had been brought to the light in Ireland during the entire year. But I need not labour the point. Anyone who has mixed with Irish Nationalists knows very well the spirit in which they regard cattle-maiming and similar horrors.

Forgive me for claiming so much of your space, but your contributor seemed so hopelessly at sea in relation both to the central principle and to the character of Irish Nationalism, that I thought it only humane to come to his rescue.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT LYND.

[When we referred to the "vital cause" of Irish discontent, we rather meant the substantial cause, arising from this or that consequence of the English government of Ireland. We by no means meant to imply that that government was not at the root of the evil.—ED., NATION.]

Poetry.

A CHRISTMAS CAROL.

THREE Kings have come to Bethlehem
With a trailing star in front of them.

Mary.

What would you in this little space
You three bright Kings?

Kings.

Mother, we tracked the trailing star
That brought us here, where oxen are,
And we would look on his dear face
Round whom the Seraphs fold their wings.

Mary.

But who are ye, bright Kings?

Caspar.

Caspar am I: the rocky North
From storm and silence sent me forth
Down to the blue and tideless sea.
I do not fear the tinkling sword,
For I am a great battle Lord
And love the horns of chivalry.
And I have brought thee splendid gold,
The strong man's joy, refined and cold:
All hail, thou Prince of Galilee.

Chorus of Angels.

All hail, thou Prince of Galilee,
For God shall give thee victory.

Balthazar.

I am Balthazar, Lord of Ind,
Where blows a little scented wind
From Taprobane toward Cathay.
My children, who are very wise,
Stand by a tree with shutten eyes,
And seem to meditate or pray.
And these red drops of Frankincense
Betoken man's intelligence.
Hail, Lord of Wisdom, Prince of Day.

Chorus of Angels.

O rosy fountain of the day
Thou hast revealed the hidden way.

Melchior.

I am the dark man, Melchior,
And I shall live but little more,
For old am I, and feebly move.
My Kingdom is a burnt-up land
Half buried by the drifting sand,
So hot Apollo glares above.
What could I bring but simple myrrh
White blossom of the cordial fire?
Hail, Prince of Souls, and Lord of Love.

Chorus of Angels.

O Prince of Souls and Lord of Love,
O'er thee the purple-breasted dove
Shall watch with open silver wings,
Thou King of Kings.
*Suaviolu' flos Virginum
In gremio est rex gentium.*

"Who art thou, little King of Kings?"

His wondering mother sings.

JAMES FLECKER.

Reviews.

THE CHARACTER OF THE JAPANESE.*

IN one of his letters to a Sunderland working-man Ruskin describes the impression made on him by some Japanese jugglers. "The Japanese masks," he says, "like the frequent monsters of Japanese art, were inventively frightful, like fearful dreams; and whatever power it is that acts on human minds, enabling them to invent such, appears to me not only to deserve the term 'demoniacal,' as the only word expressive of its character, but to be logically capable of no other definition." That, no doubt, is a one-sided criticism. Since those words were written we have learnt to appreciate other aspects of Japanese art, its decorative sensibility, its emotional intensity, its delicate and refined manipulation. And yet to most readers, I think, who turn over the pages of Mr. Joly's very sumptuous and splendid work on Japanese legends as recorded in Japanese art, Ruskin's words will recur, perhaps, as representing a view of this matter which, however much we may qualify it, cannot be entirely overlooked. For in the vast amount of legendary lore which the Japanese imagination has put together, and which Mr. Joly has collected, there is to be found almost nothing save motives of complicated and ingenious horror. The pathos, the sentiment, which mingle with and beautify the legends of the Western barbaric age are for the most part wanting here; nor have these tales of violence, conflict, and cruelty any of that boisterous and exuberant quality which, as in the West, mark them as the outcome of mere inordinate physical vitality. Instead of this we have a patient, assiduous, cold-blooded dwelling of the mind on horrible and revolting conceptions. "Fearful dreams" is indeed the very phrase which best describes many of these tales, and we should almost think, as we glance from one to another of them, that the Japanese imagination dwelt habitually in a kind of nightmare. The reader will remember those ghastly effigies with tusked mouths and flaming eyes, gods of the nether world, as depicted in the illustrated papers at the time of the late war, which used to accompany the Japanese armies on their march. What human nature can see in such creations to satisfy, delight, and encourage it to face death must remain to the Western mind an enigma, but a large number of the illustrations in the present book have the same characteristics, or even more revolting ones. Masks, which form the readiest and most obvious means of indulging a taste for the distorted and grotesque, have always appealed to the Japanese fancy, and war masks made of iron and lacquered inside with red were an indispensable part of the accoutrements of a warrior. Many pages of examples of these frightful masks are given in Mr. Joly's book, and compose an assemblage of which the bestial malignity gives one a shudder of aversion and disgust.

But in all this, though there is little perhaps to attract and please, there is much to excite interest and curiosity, for it cannot be without strong feelings of interest that we approach and study a subject in which is stored up so much of the inner life and most intimate feelings and impulses of a race to which we are so closely drawn, yet from which we are so deeply separated, as the Japanese. Mr. Joly has carried out his design of collecting, explaining, and illustrating Japanese popular beliefs, legends, customs, and folklore in a manner only possible in one who for years has worked at the subject for his own pleasure and to satisfy his own love of research. The book is admirably and profusely illustrated, and to anyone desirous of groping towards some sort of comprehension of the Japanese mind and character it offers a perfect mine of information, and information of a really illuminating and intimate kind. That the first feelings which we derive from it are rather of increased estrangement than growing intimacy is only what the most cursory knowledge of the subject would have led us to expect. Many gifts Japanese art possesses, not the least striking of which is an imaginativeness so vivid that it may almost be called a possession. But that reasonableness, that sense of an underlying order and purpose in all things, that great gift of, in a word, sanity, which is the main characteristic of the art of the West, Japanese art does not possess, and for this reason it will always probably fail to give any very great pleasure to, and be with difficulty received by, Western races.

And yet, when we come to make acquaintance with the Japanese, not in their imaginative vagaries, but in their daily lives; when we turn over, that is to say, the admirable pages in which Mr. Clive Holland has recorded the results of his intimate experience of the people and their country, then indeed our previous impressions of a something wanting, or ill-proportioned, in the Japanese character are dispelled by the gifts of kindness and simplicity which so evidently belong to them. Mr. Holland is to be congratulated on the book he has written. It has the right merits in the right proportions. His regard for the Japanese is the result of no cursory and superficial acquaintance, but of real knowledge, and a grave and steady intimacy. His style is undisfigured by the slightest tendency to that sentimental gush which is so common a trait in modern literature. There is not an affected expression in the book. It opens with a chapter or two on the history, the national spirit, the religious and ancient shrines of Japan, and then, on this foundation, in successive chapters of equal vivacity and charm, it proceeds to build up a representation of Japanese life in the present time in all its varied manifestations, and of the instincts and ideas that underlie that life. The Japanese home and home-life, the affection lavished on babies and little children, the many beautiful or pathetic festivals, manners and social customs, life in cities, the lives of the peasantry and the farmers, Japanese agriculture, trade and commerce, modern tendencies and the future outlook—such are the topics on which Mr. Holland dwells, and which he handles in turn with the ease that is born of experience and sympathy. And how unlike, one cannot but think, how unlike and how infinitely more attractive, is the Japanese as we see him here, sturdy and strong in character, yet with manners so simple and a heart so kind, to the shadowy glimpse we had of him in the creations of his imagination. Towards the end of the book occurs a passage describing the flowering of the plum trees at Kamedo, which, we are told, draws crowds from every tiny street in Tokyo to drink in the beauty of the sight. These flower-laden trees "are sure of their worshippers, who will fasten poetical tributes to the beauty of the blossoms, written on tiny strips of paper, to the gnarled and ancient branches." We may perhaps correct what there is repellant to us in Japanese emblems and symbols by this picture of a Japanese crowd turning out in spontaneous pleasure to do homage to the "honourable flowers."

HUMANITY AND THE ABSOLUTE.*

WE are not quite sure that Mr. Frederic Harrison does justice to himself or his philosophy in his title. "Common sense" in philosophy is apt to be associated with a somewhat impatient dogmatism. It too often represents the abandonment of analysis and the tendency to fall back on the first crude statement of a problem for its solution. In particular it is one way of exalting science with its certainties, its triumphs of power, its steady onward march, at the expense of the dimness, the gropings, the tendency to revolve endlessly round the same problems which it attributes to metaphysics. But modern science has long since betrayed common sense. The physicist's conception of the material universe is as far removed from that of the plain man as Berkeley's. Science no less than metaphysics postulates that taking to pieces and rebuilding of conceptions which is the essential process of the metaphysician. But of all this Mr. Harrison is perfectly aware. Indeed, the central conception of his whole system, the idea of humanity, is essentially a metaphysical, not a common-sense conception. Humanity as conceived by common sense is the aggregate of men and women, an aggregate which as an aggregate no one could worship. As conceived by Positivism it is rather the Being formed by the mutual interaction of all that is noble, wise, and good in the limited and faulty individuals physically separate and morally often

* 1. "Legend in Japanese Art." By Henri L. Joly. John Lane. 84s. net.

2. "Old and New Japan." By Clive Holland. With fifty illustrations in colour by Montague Smyth. Dent. 15s. net.

* "The Philosophy of Common Sense." By Frederic Harrison. Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.

half isolated of whom we speak as its members. It is the power directing their intelligence and shaping their ends, and yet without force or substance apart from them. It is the spirit growing to maturity in them, and through their efforts, even while it shapes their efforts and conditions their growth. So at least do we interpret the best expression of humanitarian religion to be found in this volume and in other Positivist writings, and even if the particular terms which we have used are rejected by any Positivist as metaphorical, we do not know how he is to express the conception to which his reasoning points without resort to alternative terms that would equally be open to a similar criticism.

Such a Being is no object of common sense. It is not a hard object, cut clear in its individuality from all others, capable of being seen or tracked. It is the result, perhaps only the half-wrought-out result, of a long and profound analysis. How then is it to be distinguished from the ordinary constructions of metaphysicians, and whence the polemic against metaphysics, sustained with all the writer's accustomed eloquence and trenchancy throughout this volume? The reply is that the idea of humanity is Positive, because verifiable. The ideas of metaphysics, so far as they conceive the ultimate origin or meaning of things, are unverifiable. Not but that Positivism has in a sense its own metaphysical creed. More explicitly than any recent writer so far as we are aware, Mr. Harrison associates his philosophy with the general school of Experience. But the doctrines of this school, and in particular the doctrine of the Relativity of Knowledge, only serve to enforce and explain the lesson of the history of thought—that the human mind is incapable of dealing with ultimate things. Our knowledge has a validity of its own. It serves our purposes. It gives us an ever-growing command of nature. But it is essentially a knowledge of phenomena, not of the reality behind phenomena. This confession of ignorance is reached by the Agnostic. But the Agnostic is contented with a negation. The Positivist thanks him for clearing the ground, but at once begins again to build upon it. There are verifiable truths, he tells us, not only concerning matter and motion, but also concerning mind and spirit. There is a spiritual world not "laid up in some place above the heavens," but discernible in the working experiences of everyday life and enlarged by all that history and science have to teach about evolution and social progress. Here is the true foundation of ethics, of religion, of poetry, and art, of all that constitutes the genuinely spiritual life. Here is the "solid mass of man's knowledge" floating in the "circumambient ether" wherein metaphysics for ever vainly attempts its futile constructions. The religion of humanity does not express final truth. It does not pretend to contain a solution for all questions that men may and do and will ask. It does pretend to give a meaning to human effort, and a form to the religious instincts which, Mr. Harrison strongly insists, belong to the most vital elements of our nature.

If Positive doctrine is the solid mass of ascertained truth that floats in infinite ether of diffused conjecture and ignorance, is it not, a critic may ask, in accordance with the nature of thought and the trend of history that such a mass may expand, or that, to vary the metaphor, fresh conquests may be made by advancing thought that will perpetually extend the limits of the ascertained, and in so doing perhaps reconstruct even our fundamental conceptions of man's own life and scope? In the abstract we take it that Mr. Harrison would be far from denying this possibility. Yet one question that it at once suggests is that of the alleged barriers to knowledge. Does the analysis of knowledge itself lay down limitations which the human mind by the law of its own constitution can never pass? Our view of the future of humanity, and in particular of human ethics and human religion, must be deeply affected by our answer to this question. But it is from beginning to end a question of metaphysics. The hope of escape from metaphysical discussions then seems, after all, illusory. Positivists cannot be content to take their stand on the work of Hume and the Mills. They must deal with all the criticism that has been directed against the Empirical philosophy, and decide whether they stand by or abandon or modify it. They may justifiably continue their crusade against certain metaphysical positions, but they will do this most effectually not by abjuring metaphysics, but by seeking to introduce into metaphysical discussion something of the candour and detachment that belongs to the Positive method.

MR. SPENDER'S "BAGSHOT."*

MR. J. A. SPENDER is one of the few English journalists who command a real and critical audience, as distinguished from a mere mass of readers, and the example of his more deliberately formed work which lies before us will receive a wide welcome. The "Comments of Bagshot" may be read at large in the "Westminster Gazette"; read again in this concentrated shape, they enable us to realise the gifts of scholarship and intellectual refinement which sustain their writer's daily commentary on the ways of men. Those of us who know or have known what daily journalism means—and have made acquaintance with the seven devils of malice, slovenliness, evasiveness, conventionalism, confusion, cock-sureness, and cheapness of thought that sit round the editor's chair—may well rejoice to think that at least one of their craft has kept so strict a watch on their entrance into his sanctum. We do not say that all the writing in this little book is equally good. Here and there the author's evenness and calmness of temper appear to great advantage; there, again, they just seem to miss the mark, for want of a certain depth of feeling and sympathy. For example, we should describe the saying of Bagshot, "He who pities the whole world relieves no one," as cleverness, with an undue touch of cynicism. For pity, like all virtues, is universal, and if we take the Founder of Christianity as the type of the pitiful nature, and the mourning over Jerusalem as the great example of pitifulness, we realise how the truly affectionate nature turns from the largest humanitarian outlook to the smallest and most individual acts of compassion.

However, cynicism is far from being the prevailing strain of Mr. Spender, or rather of Mr. Spender's Bagshot. The latter is presented to us, we imagine, with intention, and with a certain sympathetic approach between his point of view and his creator's, as about the best available type of the thoughtful, cultivated, liberal-minded Englishman of the guiding class—rather sad and disillusioned, mildly distrusting the falsehood of extremes, feeling a little strange and out of place in conventional society, and yet striving all the while to acquire a certain placid reasonableness and self-contentment. Bagshot's philosophy is indeed like Mr. Spender's journalism. It is meliorist, with the qualifications which an able but not ardent observer makes concerning the artificial world in which he moves, and in which he discerns no powerful, or at least no overwhelming, moral element. It invites the world to be rather better than it is, to move sedately towards some not quite declared goal, and to exhibit on the way sweetness of temper, command of the emotions, patience with bores (otherwise known as enthusiasts), and even a half-shy hopefulness.

It is difficult to select sayings from these "Comments," whose literary form, we may add, is always good, revealing no touch of carelessness of form. But we take a few, which at least show the variety of the writer's observation of life and the true penetration of his mind:—

"The misfortune of the 'artistic temperament' is that so many people have the temperament and so few the art. We should never excuse the temperament, unless we are sure of the art.

"When the speculative man talks about his 'ideals,' the practical man talks about his 'rights.' Rights are ideals in terms of action. Man first becomes formidable in action when he conceives his ideals as his rights.

"Just as the journalist conceives of men and women as readers of newspapers, and the banker conceives of them as the possessors of cheque-books, so the doctor conceives of them as 'suffering humanity.'

"Women are much more truthful than men when they are convinced of the importance of truth, just as they are much more uncompromising than men when they are convinced of the importance of an ideal. . . . Nearly all white lies are

* "The Comments of Bagshot." Edited by J. A. Spender. Constable. 3s. 6d.

the invention of women, and nearly all great falsities the inventions of men.

"All the world is agreed about a pretty face, but there is always a minority against a beautiful face.

"He who need not worry about his wealth will almost certainly worry about his health. Cast out the fear of poverty and you let in the fear of death.

"A politician need never apologise for opportunism in action, but he should always be ashamed of compromise in thought.

"The best mind feeds all day, like the flower, from sun and air. The inferior mind needs constant meals to keep it going.

"Never display a wound—except to a physician.

"Taste, like humour, is an intermittent quality. Most of us have moods in which we are very vulgar. It is a common trick to disguise a vulgar thought in an absurd frippery of language."

HEINE'S BOOK OF SONGS.*

It was Matthew Arnold's sympathetic criticism that made Heine known in this country, and few who followed Arnold's leading in literature have regretted it. The little Düsseldorf Jew was as possessed by the sentiment of the Middle Ages as Scott or Manzoni; and he had a medieval quality which they had not—irony, a sardonic humour, the consciousness of the grotesque. This, if strange to the revived Romanticism of the nineteenth century, was an essential attribute of the society whose life it attempted to reproduce. No church was without gargoyles expressing in half-human, half-animal shape the mocking moods of its builders; the mysteries and miracle plays provided an outlet for the cynicism which, then as now, beset those who portrayed man and surveyed, or tried to survey, life as a whole. Romanticism did not, and did not wish to, do so; hence this humour was wanting to it: the Middle Ages did, and had it to the full.

Of this humour Heine was a master; nor was this mastery affected by the undernote of suffering which was seldom silent in his best work. The sore heart is ill protected by the motley; through the shrill flutes of the orchestra the cry "I am in pain" is heard. The weird picture of the country parsonage under the autumn moon, with the dead father beckoning at the window, is an illustration; but there is hardly a poem in the collection where the discord, the note of contrast, does not appear.

"My songs are full of poison—
How else, then, could it be?
Thou hast poured a deadlier poison
O'er life's fresh flowers for me.

My songs are full of poison—
How else, then, could it be?
I carry snakes in my bosom,
And thee, my beloved one—thee!"

With him the tear and the smile are near neighbours. "Ich kann meine eigenen Schmerzen nicht erzählen, ohne dass die Sache komisch wird."

Heine invites and defies translation: the first by his spontaneity, the second by the personal touch which gives this spontaneity a form which it is impossible to reproduce. The experiment has been tried often enough with indifferent success; and it can scarcely be said that Mr. Todhunter has improved to any perceptible extent on Sir Theodore Martin. Be the translator who he may, few who have not read the "Buch der Lieder" in the original will appreciate it in an English dress; on the other hand, to those who know the text a new rendering recalls something of the incomparable charm of that melodious, pathetic, despairing book. It is perhaps as happy as such an attempt can hope to be; which, after all, is not saying much. Here, as elsewhere, something essential has been lost, something foreign brought in. Heine, for all his apparent naturalness, is a master of style. There is neither too much or too little; invariably he has "le mot juste." This balance, precision, harmony, call it what we will, disappears in a translation; it may be caught for a moment, but the completeness is evanescent and cannot be sustained. Take, for instance, "Konig Wiswamitra."

"And all for a paltry cow," errs by putting into words what

"Und alles für eine Kuh,"

*"Heine's Book of Songs." Translated by John Todhunter. Oxford: At the Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d. net; or, India paper, 4s. 6d.

says without saying; the Lorelei does not give up her open but unspoken secret in such lines as—

"It seizes with wildest longing
The boatman unawares;
Black reefs round his boat are thronging,
He sees not, as upward he stares.

At last the wild waters upspringing,
Boat, boatman, whelm—in my thought;
And this with her siren singing,
The Lorelei hath wrought."

To show just the thing in Heine which is untranslatable, let us put, in one instance, the text and the rendering side by side.

"Du bist wie eine Blume
So hold und schön und rein:
Ich schau' dich an, und Wehmut
Schleicht mir ins Herz hinein.

Mir ist, als ob ich die Hände
Aufs Haupt dir legen sollt',
Betend dass Gott dich erhalte
So rein und schön und hold."

It is flawless, exquisite, a liquid, clear-cut gem. Now for the translation.

"Sweet as a flower thou seemest,
So pure and fair thou art,
I gaze on thee, and sadness
Steals gently into my heart.

I long to lay on thy forehead
My hand, as I feel 'twere meet,
Praying that God will preserve thee
As pure and fair and sweet."

This is good verse; telling and appreciative. But the life is gone. A translator, perhaps, does his work best when he sends his readers to the original. If Mr. Todhunter does this, neither he nor they will have reason to complain.

THE KING OF MOUNTAINS.*

IF it is a worthy thing to write a book about a man, how much more worthy to write about a mountain—so much more enduring, so much nobler, so much nearer to "Heaven our home"! But if any mountain deserves a biography, then the Matterhorn above all others—that mighty pillar of rock, so mysterious and so solitary, so long unconquered, so terrible even in its conquest! Custom cannot stale the Matterhorn; not even our own age spoil its infinite variety. Ropes have chained it, and in fine summers its summit—so curiously large for so precipitous a peak—is the meeting-place of nations. But still it rears its majestic head, unaffected by the little scramblings of mortal man. Like some noble beast, it seems to tolerate rather than to submit. Beneath that air of mild submission there still dwell, only surface deep, all the fierce passions of the elemental in nature. At your peril do you make light of the Matterhorn. Every now and again some sudden outbreak of rage makes it clear that that mountain, so immense, so steep, so terribly exposed to storm and wind, can never really be tamed. Those who know it best fear it the most.

The great work of Signor Guido Rey forms a companion volume to Mr. C. E. Mathews' book on Mont Blanc; and Mr. Fisher Unwin has added one more to his many services to the mountains and mountaineers by asking Mr. Eaton to translate it. Rey's prose, very noble and beautiful in Italian, is a little dithyrambic for Englishmen, but Mr. Eaton has done his work with restraint and judgment. The interest of the book to English climbers will be that it forms a companion volume to Mr. Whymper's famous "Scrambles Among the Alps." Mr. Whymper tells the story of the Matterhorn from the English point of view; Signor Rey from the Italian. The Southern writer describes that famous race for the summit in 1865 from the south side, of which we hear little in Whymper. Readers of the "Scrambles" will just vaguely remember that there was an Italian party, under Carrel, trying to reach the summit from the Italian side at the same time. With English conceit, they will probably have gone away with the impression that the Italian attack was a much inferior performance. But climbers know that there is little to choose in point of difficulty between the ascents, and it was probably only excess of confidence on the part of the Italians, combined with the glaring imprudence of the Englishmen, that led Whymper to snatch his costly victory. Looking back on it all now, we can recognise the valour of both parties in this glorious strife, and Englishmen can readily, after these years, acknowledge Italians as comrades and equals in mountaineering achievement.

*"The Matterhorn." By Guido Rey. Fisher Unwin. 21s. net.

The story thrills in every episode. We see the rivals, Giordano and Whymper, glaring at one another in the passages of the same hotel, watching one another's movements, almost tracking one another's footsteps. We see the guide Carrel going over to the side of the Italians, and preparing his attack on the mountain with indomitable skill and patience. Then Whymper awakes to his danger, and suddenly rushes off to the Swiss side, seizes hold of anyone who has a guide, scrapes together that amazing party of raw youths and amateurs, and launches that extraordinary surprise attack which succeeded only too well. Three days before the victory the Italian writes:—

"I have tried to keep everything secret, but that fellow, whose life seems to depend on the Matterhorn, is here, suspiciously prying into everything. I have taken all the competent men away from him, and yet he is so enamoured of this mountain that he may go up with others and make a scene. He is here, in this hotel (Breuil Hotel), and I try to avoid speaking to him."

That was on July 11th. Three days later "that fellow," in spite of all his defeats, had gained his victory. Rather than be beaten by his loss of guides, he had taken with him to the top of the mountain a lord, a parson, and a youth, and, with the help of their guide, vanquished the impossible. On July 14th the Italian thought that Carrel had conquered, but on the 15th he discovered his mistake:—

"Whymper, after all, gained the victory over the unfortunate Carrel. Whymper, as I told you, was desperate, and seeing Carrel climbing the mountain, tried his fortune on the Zermatt slope. Everyone here, and Carrel above all, considered the ascent absolutely impossible on that side; so we were all easy in our minds. . . . Yesterday Carrel might have reached the top, and was perhaps only about 500 or 600 feet below, when suddenly, at about 2 p.m., he saw Whymper and the others already on the summit."

Carrel, heartbroken at his defeat, beat a momentary retreat, and it was only on a subsequent day that his Italian master rallied him to a second attempt, and, on that occasion, to victory. It was not, strangely enough, until after that victory had been secured, that the Italians heard news of the disaster to Whymper's party.

So far for the victory of the Matterhorn. But Signor Rey is a great climber himself—one of the most daring of that group of climbers that have sprung up in Italy during the past quarter of a century, and have increased so rapidly under royal encouragement and favour. The House of Savoy have always been a family of mountaineers—and now Italy can join with Austria and England in a sort of mountaineering Triple Alliance. Signor Rey supplements the history of the Matterhorn with an account of his own daring ascents—his first ascent by the ordinary route, his climb up the Zmutt ridge, his amazing attempt, astounding even in its failure, on the Furggen ridge. Since Mummery's wonderful book, there has not been a more brilliant account of a great ascent than Signor Rey's description of his climb up that ridge. Sitting at home, one feels dizzy at the mere reading of the narrative. One seems to feel all the sensations of high mountains—the exhilaration of height, the sudden terror of the slip, the awful loneliness of the precipice face. One lives again those solemn moments when joy is so strangely interwoven with fear and the vividness of life with the presence of death. It is a great mountaineering book.

THE NEW TESTAMENT CANON.*

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS once asserted that "a picture must not only be done well; it must seem to have been done easily." Judged by this standard, Dr. Gregory's volume is a masterpiece. No trace of laboured work or tedious process can be found in its five hundred pages. The book gives one the impression of having been written out of full knowledge, with the deliberate ease of a scholar who has mastered the wide fields of his particular subject. German idioms occur now and then, although one hesitates whether the Fatherland or the United States should be credited with a sentence like this: "The thought that Justin did not know our Gospels, but used apocryphal ones, finds a very good blocking-off in a single passage" (p. 94). But the volume, taken as a whole, is English and not German. It is popular and impressionist rather than thorough-going. Dr. Gregory caters for the reader who has no Greek; he cheerfully ignores the thickets of intricate detail which are apt to preoccupy the technical scholar in a German university.

The first half of the book, which traces the history of the canon down to Theodore of Mopsuestia, has little or nothing that is startling in the way of special criticism. The author's strong point is his common sense, and this comes out with particular force in his treatment of what may be termed the radical and the conservative schools. The former are taken to task for handling early Christianity and its traditions in too documentary a fashion. Dr. Gregory enters a wise protest against this un-historical notion. His general attitude towards the function of tradition in the primitive age is sound. "If we are scientific enough," he pleads (p. 162), "to consider the whole growing Church, from Jerusalem and Antioch to Ephesus and Smyrna and Thessalonica and Corinth and Rome and Vienne and Lyons in Gaul, and to conjure up to ourselves the occasional Christian societies in countless places between,—if we consider this large field, and I shall not now say the possibility, but the necessity of there having been many men and women of seventy and eighty, and some men and women of ninety overlapping each other, we shall be ready to concede that the cause of Christian tradition has not been in the least a frail and weak passage from Paul to Irenæus, from John to Clement of Alexandria." True, but there was tradition and tradition. Dr. Gregory might have noticed, to prevent any misconception on the part of the general reader, the obvious tendencies to fanciful embroidery which are patent as early as Irenæus. On the other hand, he makes short work of cut-and-dry theories about verbal inspiration and a fixed canon. As he points out, for the benefit of the conservative Christian, there is no basis for the prevalent idea that "in some mysterious way during the second century the spirit of God gathered precisely our New Testament, from Matthew to Revelation, into one single volume, and that since that time the whole Christian Church has held fast to just this book." "I believe that God watched over every step in the paths of the early Christians, but He had no thought of this theory of inspiration and of canon." (p. 294.)

The latter half of the book discusses the text of the New Testament with a view to the needs of a general reader. Dr. Gregory does not take much for granted in his audience. Like John Bright in his speeches, he is not afraid to be elementary, and he has the fortunate faculty of conveying masses of useful information in quite an attractive way. The best part of his work is the opening account of the material conditions of the primitive text. The closing part is too casual and colloquial to be of real service. Dr. Gregory comments justly upon the apathy of the Roman Catholic Church towards the Latin text (p. 413). Three centuries have passed since the Clementine vulgate appeared, yet no good edition of the text has been issued by the Roman Church, for all its vast libraries and resources. Perhaps Father Gasquet's new movement will wipe away this reproach.

We have received from Messrs. Black copies of the indispensable "Who's Who" (10s. net), and its companion volume, "Who's Who Year Book for 1908" (1s. net). It is superfluous to speak in praise of either of these volumes, both of which are standard books of reference. We have also received "The Liberal Year Book for 1908" (Liberal Publication Department, 1s. net), and "The Reformers' Year Book" (Reformers' Press, 4, Clement's Inn, 1s. net), both useful annuals. The first-named is quite indispensable to Liberal politicians, and care, accuracy, and knowledge are its distinguishing features.

*"The Canon and Text of the New Testament." By Caspar René Gregory, D.D., LL.D. The International Theological Library. T. & T. Clark. 12s.

Some of Messrs. CHATTO & WINDUS'S Publications specially suitable for CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

These can be seen at ALL BOOKSELLERS', and until December 24th, on presentation of visiting-card, at the Exhibition, THE BRUTON GALLERIES, Bruton Street, W.

ALICE IN WONDERLAND. By LEWIS

CARROLL. From the latest Copyright Text. With 12 Coloured and many Line Illustrations by MILLICENT SOWERBY. 5s. net.
Ladies' Field.—"Fortunate the children of to-day who are to make her acquaintance for the first time in this radiant garb!"
Gentleman.—"Presents ALICE'S friends as it is probable that children imagine them. They have the air of the odd matter-of-fact topsy-turvydom of the story."
Crown.—"As dainty as it is delightful."

CHILDHOOD: being Twelve Days from Our Youth.

Pictured in Colours by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and Written in Verse by GITHA SOWERBY. The Text printed in 2 Colours and with some 30 further Illustrations in the Text. 7½ by 9½ in. 3s. 6d. net.
Morning Leader.—"Recalls Kate Greenaway's best work. The pictures are delightful."

BUMBLETOES: being their Adventures with Belinda

and the Buttons Boy. Pictured in 12 Scenes by MILLICENT SOWERBY, and Written in Verse by GITHA SOWERBY. The 12 Scenes in Colour, and 18 further Illustrations in the Text. 5½ by 7 in. 1s. 6d. net.
Crown.—"Some of the freshest and most charming examples of creative water-colour drawings. An altogether neat and delightful little volume, exceptionally well printed and finished."

THE CHILD-LOVERS' CALENDAR, 1908.

With 12 Illustrations in Colours by AMELIA BAUERLÉ. Small 8vo, 1s. net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"In the Greenaway manner, except that the artist is more vigorous in her lines and less straitened in her types."

THE STORY OF SCRAGGLES, A SPARROW.

By G. W. JAMES. With 6 Illustrations after Drawings and Photographs, small crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

Field.—"Will certainly please lovers of animals."

Scotsman.—"Has an engaging natural freshness that is sure to make it a favourite with young readers."

THE DUMPY-BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Thirty-six Titles to select from. Royal 32mo, bound in Decorated Washable Cloth, 1s. net each. Over 250,000 of these books have been sold.

Evening Standard.—"Tiny books which very small people will find most fascinating."

Nottingham Guardian.—"They have everything to recommend them to their readers."

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The Medici Reproductions are of surpassing excellence.....Give absolutely the impression of the pictures themselves, even as regards irregularities of surface."

- I. LUINI. Head of the Virgin Mary (Fresco). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in., 12s. 6d. net.
- II. LEONARDO DA VINCI. Head of the Christ (Cartoon). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in., 12s. 6d. net.
- III. BOTTICELLI. The Virgin and Child (Tempera). Colour surface, 13½ by 9½ in., 12s. 6d. net.
- IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI. The Last Supper (Fresco). Colour surface, 31½ by 16 in., 25s. net.
- V. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA. Portrait of an Unknown Lady. Colour surface, 15½ by 11½ in., 10s. 6d. net.
- VI. LORENZO DI CREDI. The Annunciation (Tempera). Colour surface, 17½ by 12 in., 15s. net.
- VII. FILIPPINO LIPPI. (?) The Virgin in Adoration (Tempera). Colour surface, 19½ by 15 in. Size of Original Picture, 39 by 30 in., 15s. net. [Immediately.]
- VIII. BOTTICELLI. The Birth of Venus (Tempera). Colour surface, 36 by 21½ in., 25s. net. [Preparing.]

OCCASIONAL PLATE, I.

LIPPI-FILIPPO. The Virgin, after the Painting in Tempera on Wooden Panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin, Child, St. John, and an Angel. Coloured surface, 13½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in. 10s. 6d. net.
 Inland Postage (Great Britain), 6d. per plate, except Nos. IV. and VIII., which are 9d. Foreign postages double these amounts.
 Full particulars of Plates and Frames, with method of publication and terms of subscription, will be found in an Illustrated Prospectus, which may be had post-free on application.

FOUR-COLOUR REPRODUCTIONS.

GIORGIONE. The Virgin Enthroned between Saints, after the Altarpiece at Castelfranco. Complete in gold frame, 9½ by 7½ in., dark mount, 3s. 6d.; oak frame, oak mount, 2s. 6d.; mounted only, 9d.; unmounted, 6d. Postage extra.

PERUGINO. The Crucifixion, after the Triptych in the Convent of Sta. Maria dei Pazzi, Florence. Complete in Florentine carved frame, 21½; gold frame, 17 by 11 in., dark mount, 5s.; oak frame, oak mount, 3s. 6d.; mounted only, 1s. 6d.; unmounted, 1s. Postage extra.

THE NEW MEDIÆVAL LIBRARY.

The first three volumes are Translated from the Middle French by ALICE KEMP-WELCH, who also furnishes Notes and an Introduction. Size 6½ by 4½ in. boards, 5s. net.

Whole brown pigskin, antique style, with clasps, 7s. 6d. net.

I. THE BOOK OF THE DUKE OF TRUE LOVERS.

II. OF THE TUMBLER OF OUR LADY AND OTHER MIRACLES.

III. THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI.

(Other volumes in preparation.)

Each volume contains photogravure or woodcut reproductions of the Illustrations contained in the Works reproduced. Each volume further contains a title-page engraved upon wood, after notable contemporary examples.

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.

By E. L. SEELEY. With 8 Four-Colour Plates, the Half-Tones printed in two tints, 7s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari."

Also a SPECIAL EDITION, with 4 extra Four-Colour Plates and 24 in Half-Tone, and a Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece, after Raphael. Small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; vellum, 20s. net; red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

Oxford Magazine.—"It is just the kind of book that one is looking for at this time of the year as a present for some lover of Italian art."

Evening Standard.—"A good idea well carried out, and the illustrations, reproductions of famous pictures, are most welcome. Those in colour are particularly well done."

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS

FROM VASARI. Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY. Red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. SPECIAL EDITION, small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

WOMEN OF FLORENCE: a Study of their

Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento. By Professor ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. With an Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. With 2 Plates in Four-Colour, and 24 in Half-Tone. Buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

Burlington Magazine.—"An extremely human, agreeable, and interesting book, which the care of the publishers in the illustration and decoration has rendered doubly attractive."

TUSCAN FEASTS AND TUSCAN

FRIENDS. By DOBOTHY NEVILLE LEES. With 12 Reproductions, after Photographs of typical Tuscan Scenes, 5s. net.

Standard.—"In her company we are taken to fairs and festivals which throw into relief all that is most typical in the life of the peasantry."

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS:

Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans. By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully Illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. TYERWHITT, B.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S. 20s. net.

Glasgow Herald.—"One of those comparatively few works that are both learned and readable.....The colour treatment is particularly masterly.....this reproduction of the very atmosphere of the East is a very distinct artistic triumph."

THE COLOUR OF LONDON. By W. J.

LOFTIE, F.S.A. With 60 Illustrations in Colour, and an Essay by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO. 20s. net.

Athenæum.—"Has given us a London which is new.....the picture of a beautiful capital, which he reveals to its astounded inhabitants. In many of his pictures he seems, as it were, to reveal London to Londoners themselves."

SWITZERLAND AND ITS PEOPLE. By

CLARENCE ROOK. Fcap. 4to, gilt top, with 56 Illustrations in Colour by Mrs. JARDINE, and 24 in Half-Tone on tint. 20s. net.

Spectator.—"This is a good book to look at and to read.....a volume which is bound both to please and to profit."

LISBON AND CINTRA. With some Account of

other Cities and Historic Sites in Portugal. By A. C. INCHBOLD. With 30 Illustrations in Colour by STANLEY INCHBOLD. 10s. 6d. net.

Times.—"The writer is an intelligent and careful guide who does not waste space with rhetoric or with personalia."

Outlook.—"Mr. Stanley Inchbold has caught the light of the Southern sun."

VENICE. By BERYL DE SELINCOURT and MAY STURGE-

HENDERSON. Fcap. 4to, gilt top. With 30 Illustrations in Colour by REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S. 10s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"One of those composite books with coloured pictures in which the illustrations count for no less than the literature.....they [the illustrations] grace a book which must both please and instruct any one who either knows or wishes to know the lovely city it describes."

CHATTO and WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

AMERICAN LEADERS.

No great historic figure of the nineteenth century, except perhaps Garibaldi, can compete with Abraham Lincoln in the grandeur of the part played in a great national drama, and Lincoln was in the richness of his humanity a greater man than Garibaldi. For America he stands out not merely as a "saviour of his country" but as a new American type, as far sundered from the cultured puritan of Massachusetts as the latter was from the transplanted English squires who won independence in the eighteenth century and made a nation. Lincoln stood for the emergence of the new West. Born of Quaker stock in Kentucky, his father a carpenter, bred in Indiana and spending all his early manhood in Illinois, then a Western frontier state, he condensed in his character and career all the best qualities of intellect and heart which are even to-day found most abundantly in the great Mississippi valley, and which may save America again if she requires it. Mr. Binns does for English readers just what is wanted. In a lucid and convincing sketch,* not cumbered with entanglement of detail, he shows the great unwieldy figure of this raw, half-educated youth, farmer, postmaster, saloon keeper, surveyor, country attorney, gradually shouldering his way to the front of public affairs in the Western State, while the great clouds were gathering for the storm of the Secession. These were the times when events moved swiftly, and reputations ripened with corresponding speed. It was therefore no matter for real wonder that this giant "rail-splitter," with his wit and energy, found himself at forty pitted against the foremost statesmen of the land, and moving towards the highest office in the Republic.

Mr. Binns tells with great spirit the story of the rise and of the great duel with Stephen Douglas, which ended with election to the Presidency, and gives a really masterly summary of Lincoln's policy both before and during the great national struggle. The curious blend of extravagance in speech with self-control of conduct, the boisterous humour set in a background of deep and almost superstitious melancholy, all the baffling combinations which went to the making of this powerful man, are concisely illustrated in this carefully constructed story. An insoluble problem in personality, Lincoln must be studied by all who hope or care to understand the meaning of America, for none other of her sons, not Washington, nor Emerson, nor Whitman, nor Theodore Roosevelt, is so rich a repository of the stuff that goes to the making of America. Mr. Binns writes with knowledge, sympathy, and understanding, and makes good his claim to "the first serious attempt made by an Englishman to portray on any full-sized canvas the greatest of the popular statesmen of the last century, the most notable figure among the leaders of the English-speaking democracy."

We have here not merely a biography of the foremost American negro of the last generation by the foremost negro of the present,† but a vivid history of the relations of the white and black races from the opening of the anti-slavery movement up to the close of last century. The opening scenes of Southern slavery show not so much the inhumanity of "the system" as the haphazard, almost chaotic, conditions of its operation upon the life of the individual slave liable to pass from hand to hand and from one fate to another by the higgling of the market. As we read the exciting story of young Frederic's escape to Philadelphia, we realise the evil wisdom of the penalties attached by the slave-owning states to the crime of "educating" negroes. The utter ignorance of the blacks was essential to the maintenance of slavery.

Douglass found himself an escaped negro in the North just at the period when Garrison and his friends were beginning their crusade in Massachusetts, and when the Viglance Committee had organised the Underground Railway by which in secrecy the coloured refugees could pass from the land of bondage to that of liberty. Courage, character, and an uncommon gift of eloquence brought Douglass quickly to the fore, and a peculiarly tough physique enabled him to survive the rough and often brutal treatment accorded to reformers in the early years of the great conflict. His agitation was carried on amid constant risk of capture, for as late as 1850 the Fugitive Slave Act, followed by the Dred Scott decision, enabled the slave owner to pursue his prey through all the "free" states and carry him back to slavery. Twice for long periods Douglass had to flee to England, where he did more than any other man to sow the seeds of sympathy with his oppressed race. He was with John Brown just before the historic incident of Harper's Ferry, and when war began he threw all his energy into a vindication of the rights of negroes to serve in the Federal Army, a step probably essential to the final victory of the North. The chapters dealing with the early problems of reconstruction should be read by all who are so ready to condemn the hasty policy of entrusting negroes with a franchise which by education and intelligence they were not competent to use. Abuses of a very grave order certainly arose, but before condemning outright the policy adopted by the North we must remember that it was designed to meet a deliberate endeavour of the ex-Slave State to re-establish slavery by various sorts of crooked legislation. Whatever course had been taken, an age of waste, corruption, and disorder was bound to follow such a war. A vote has not indeed proved a very efficacious weapon of protection against the power of a dominant race, but political liberty is an essential condition of economic liberty. Douglass indeed lived to a prosperous and honoured old age, and there is even a sense of completeness about his personal career. But the real liberation of the negro remains to-day the gravest moral task confronting the American nation. Lincoln and the Civil War have only done half the work.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

PROFESSOR COMMONS, one of the ablest political thinkers in America, publishes opportunely this new edition of his work upon Proportional Representation,‡ adding, among other new matter, an extremely interesting discussion of the Referendum and the Initiative, considered as remedies for corruption and inefficiency in municipal politics. The form of Proportional Representation favoured by the author is less simple than that advocated in this country by Lord Courtney and others, in that it is based upon a retention and official recognition of the "ticket" or party. Professor Commons, erroneously in our judgment, thinks party and elections conducted on group lines to be indispensable to the working of free government. It is curious that in a country where the structure of parties has undergone such revolutionary changes this feeling should prevail. It must be remembered, however, that for many decades the party ticket has received official recognition in all pollings, and that public provision is made for party action through the various grades from the ward "primary" to the National Convention. The method of Proportionate Representation here preferred works in the following way. Each voter in a district has as many votes as there are persons to be elected, and these he can distribute as he chooses, giving no more than one vote to any candidate. The vote he gives counts both for the individual and for the "ticket" to which the individual belongs. In counting, the first thing to be determined is the number of seats to which each "ticket" is entitled; this is decided by the proportions of the aggregate votes cast for members of the several tickets. When the number of seats to which a ticket is entitled has been ascertained, the particular persons upon that ticket who have got the largest number of individual votes obtain these seats. While no system is perfect, we are disposed to think this is far more imperfect than the simple method of "one man one vote with an order of preference" which is being urged in this country. Indeed, the imperfection is admitted by Professor Commons, and is entirely due to his ill-advised attempt to blend individual with party voting.

‡ "Proportional Representation." By John R. Commons. Macmillan.

* "Abraham Lincoln." By Henry Bryan Binns. Dent. 4s. 6d. net.

† "Frederic Douglass." By Booker T. Washington. Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

VOL. I. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Eversley Tennyson.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols., Vol. I. Poems. With Portrait. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

BY THE LATE LORD ACTON.

The History of Freedom,

AND OTHER ESSAYS. Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

Historical Essays and Studies.

Edited, with an Introduction by the same. 8vo, 10s. net.

BY THE LATE

SIR JOHN STRACHEY.

India: its Administration and Progress.

Third Edition. With Map 8vo, 10s. net.

LEAVES FROM THE NOTEBOOKS OF

Lady Dorothy Nevill.

Edited by RALPH NEVILL. With Portraits. 8vo, 15s. net.

William Allingham: A Diary.

Edited by H. ALLINGHAM and D. RADFORD. With Portraits in Photogravure. 8vo, 12s. net.

3rd IMPRESSION NOW READY.

The Man-Eaters of Tsavo.

By Lieut.-Colonel J. H. PATTERSON, D.S.O. With numerous Illustrations. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF

Thomas Henry Huxley.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net, also limp leather 3s. 6d. net.

[Golden Treasury Series.]

NEW BOOK BY AUTHOR OF "PRO CHRISTO ET ECCLESIA," Christus Futurus.

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Athenæum:—"The whole book is full of ideas, and well worth perusal."

Is Mars Habitable?

A Critical Examination of Professor Percival Lowell's Book, "Mars and its Canals," with an Alternative Explanation. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S. Extra Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Highways and Byways in Kent.

By WALTER JERROLD. Illustrated by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

Cranford.

With coloured Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON. Extra crown 8vo, 5s. net.

The Poetical Works of John Keats.

Edited with Introduction and Notes, by WILLIAM T. ARNOLD. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. Also in limp leather, 5s. net.

[The Globe Library.]

The Muse in Motley.

Poems by HARTLEY CARRICK, M.A. With a Foreword by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Macmillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan.

Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Third Edition. With new Appendix (1907), 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., LONDON.

BEST NEW BOOKS.

THE BEST-SELLING BOOK OF THE YEAR IS THE LETTERS OF EDWARD LEAR (AUTHOR OF "THE BOOK OF NONSENSE.") EDITED BY LADY STRACHEY. ILLUSTRATED. SECOND IMPRESSION. 15s. NET.

READ THE MATTERHORN, BY GUIDO REY. IT CONTAINS A VIVID ACCOUNT OF THE FIRST ASCENT, AND IS ILLUSTRATED WITH 14 COLOURED PLATES, 23 PEN DRAWINGS, AND 11 PHOTOGRAPHS. 21s. NET.

A DELIGHTFUL NEW VOLUME OF TRAVEL IS THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON, BY C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. A STIRRING ACCOUNT OF LIFE AND TRAVEL IN PERU. WITH A MAP AND NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS. 21s.

THE MOST IMPORTANT NEW VOLUME OF HISTORY IS CHILE, BY G. F. SCOTT-ELLIOT, F.R.G.S. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY MARTIN HUME. MAPS AND ILLUSTRATIONS. 10s. 6d. NET.

ASK FOR MIRABEAU THE DEMI-GOD: BEING THE TRUE AND ROMANTIC STORY OF HIS LIFE AND ADVENTURES, BY W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. WITH 33 ILLUSTRATIONS. 15s. NET.

A FASCINATING NEW BIOGRAPHY IS A SISTER OF MARIE ANTOINETTE: THE LIFE STORY OF MARIA CAROLINA, QUEEN OF NAPLES, BY MRS. BEARNE. WITH ABOUT 30 ILLUSTRATIONS. 10s. 6d. NET.

A BOOK ATTRACTING A GREAT DEAL OF ATTENTION IS BONAPARTE IN EGYPT AND THE EGYPTIANS OF TO-DAY. BY HAJI A. BROWNE. 10s. 6d. NET.

THE BEST BOOK ON THE SPORTS OF OLD ENGLAND IS F. W. HACKWOOD'S OLD ENGLISH SPORTS. WITH 6 COLOURED PLATES AND 32 OTHER FULL-PAGE ILLUSTRATIONS. 10d. 6d. NET.

A REALLY CHARMING BOOK FOR CHILDREN IS THE WELSH FAIRY BOOK. EDITED BY W. JENKYN THOMAS. 100 ILLUSTRATIONS. 6s. THE FIRST ENGLISH COLLECTION OF WELSH FAIRY STORIES.

THE MOST FASCINATING NEW CHILDREN'S BOOKS ARE E. NESBIT'S THE ENCHANTED CASTLE. WITH 48 ILLUSTRATIONS BY H. R. MILLAR. (6s.) AND MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S MILLY AND OLLY. WITH 40 ILLUSTRATIONS BY WILLY POGANY. (6s.)

T. FISHER UNWIN.

LONDON.

THREE IRISH AUTHORS.*

IN "The Northern Iron" Mr. Birmingham puts aside for awhile the examination of modern Irish life, which he essayed in "The Seething Pot" and other of his novels, and endeavours to re-create for us the terror-stricken atmosphere of the Irish rebellion of '98 in Antrim. Truth to say, though his story is picturesque and well constructed, it is not nearly so convincing as Mr. William Buckley's "Croppies Lie Down." And this is partly due to the fact that many of Mr. Birmingham's characters, the hero, Neal Ward, and his friends, Lord Dunseveric and Maurice and Una St. Clair, and his Irish-American uncle, Donald Ward, are modern men dressed up in the clothes of '98. Though the author has studied the political life and passions of the period, he has been unable to create figures really typical of Ulster society, and his informer, James Finlay, and the insurgent chief, James Hope, and even the brutal Captain Twinely of the Killulta Yeomanry, are not cunningly individualised. Mr. Birmingham indeed fails in artistic subtlety, though his novel may be read with some profit and pleasure by English people who, while afraid to face the savage reality of "Croppies Lie Down," are apt to complain of the "irreconcilable Irish patriotism." We English forget that our grandfathers saw the horrors of the great famine of '46, while our great-great-grandfathers took sides in that deplorable struggle in '98 which filled the cup of Irish bitterness, after the bright hopes of Grattan's Parliament had come to nought. But we should not forget if our grandfathers and their fathers' fathers had been the sufferers.

In "Cambia Carty and Other Stories" Mr. William Buckley has brought together a number of tales which touch on different sides of the Irish character. The strongest and best is the study of Cambia, the net-maker's daughter, a cool, beautiful girl, who keeps M. Florimel, the wily mate of the "Ariane," a French brig, on tenter hooks till she can extract an "hon'r'ble" proposal of marriage out of him. M. Florimel has had considerable experience of love affairs in European seaports, but he meets his match in the Irish girl, who parries all his attacks, saying on one occasion significantly: "Trust you, is it? Faith, I will, as far as I can throw a dead horse." And at last the Frenchman, carried away by passion, intimates an hour before his ship sails, that "there would be a priest and a ring." But Cambia will have no hole-and-corner work. "What would me father say? Sure, he'd kill me, and no wonder too. Sure, who ever heard of the like?" So M. Florimel betrothes himself, swearing he will soon be back. Cambia, to keep her hand in in his absence, tries her feminine arts on Pat Carroll, the man who really loves her, and when the fisherman proposes marriage she tells him that he is too late. Winter comes, and when a foreign ship is driven wrecked in a storm on Youghal bar, Cambia learns that not only is M. Florimel on board, but that he has with him his newly-wedded Italian wife! The psychological study of Cambia's dramatic interview with the faithless Frenchman is as capitably done as the description of the shipwreck. Another clever story is "Stephanie de Liancourt," in which the true thrill of awe in face of the supernatural is communicated to the reader; and no less excellent is the touching and restrained sketch of an Irish peasant, in "Shamrocks" who is forced, by family poverty, to let the girl he loves emigrate to America, where she dies before he can scrape enough money together to recall her as his wife. Mr. Buckley shows such a variety of emotional tone that we trust he will set seriously to work and produce another historical novel of the importance of "Croppies Lie Down."

The same note of the pathetic efforts of the Irish peasant to keep his family together on a small holding is struck by Mr. Stephen Gwynn in two of his stories, "The Grip of the Land," and "Splendide Mendax." In the latter, old Nancy Lafferty, on receiving a letter from her emigrant daughter, Mary Jane, to the effect that she can no longer be certain of sending the monthly four dollars to her mother now that the baby has come and "George objects," gets a neighbour to write and report that "ould Nancy" is dead. "Sure, I'm not for making trouble betwixt Mary Jane and her husband," says the old creature, and when Mary Jane writes back a sorrowful letter saying that she "would rather have yellow meal brochans in Dunfanaghy nor ham and wine in New York," Nancy only repeats "Sure that had to come to her soon or late, and now it's over and there'll be no ill will with her husband." But when the old woman, as one dead, is cut off from all news of her daughter and her child, she grows gradually dazed, and, as the narrator puts it, "the heart's dead in her this two year." Equally significant is the companion story "The Grip of the Land," in which Johnny, the grown-up son of Robert Corscadden, an Ulster farmer of "thirty acres of cold sour land," is only kept from emigrating to Texas by the refusal of Mary McCormick, his sweetheart, to hear of his leaving the old people. "And do you think, Robert," she says, "we might never rise if we went out yonder, and might never think long, and the ones that reared us toiling and slaving here and us not helping them?" The self-denial of the old father, Robert, and of the old mother, Mary, is subtly indicated, and may stand as a type of the heartbreaking bitterness in hundreds of thousands of humble Irish homes which have seen the sons' and daughters' enforced emigration beyond the Atlantic. Another good story is "St. Brigid's Flood," in which the marvellous curse of Biddy O'Hea on Mike O'Hanlon and his family comes unexpectedly to roost. Biddy's character has been taken away by Mike O'Hanlon, "true or false," and, having spirit in her, she "makes a journey in her bare feet to the Holy Well, and with each Five Paternosters and 'Hail Mary's' and the prayer to Saint Brigid, she prays for the suffocation of Mike O'Hanlon and all his family." And her prayer is answered. In "A Reconciliation," the author gives a good picture of the household of a degenerate Irish gentleman, Captain Despard, a picture which we imagine aptly symbolises the downward course of many an Anglo-Irish family of good blood that, four generations ago, ruled the roast in the four provinces. In conclusion, we may add that a perusal of the three volumes before us points to the conclusion of the main body of modern writers on Ireland, viz., that English rule of Irish affairs is and must be a disaster because it acts as a screen between conflicting sections in the nation, intensifying class differences and the antagonisms of rival religious sects. In England the differences of party, creed, and class are bound to meet and compromise in action, but so long as the English Executive remains the overruling power in Irish affairs, so long will Ireland's economic, social, and political differences never be brought to a head and adjusted in the interests of the main body of the people.

* "The Northern Iron." By George A. Birmingham. (Dublin: Maunsel and Co., Ltd. 6s.)

"Cambia Carty." By William Buckley. (Dublin: Maunsel and Co., Ltd. 6s.)

"The Glade in the Forest." By Stephen Gwynn. (Dublin: Maunsel and Co., Ltd. 6s.)

A. & C. BLACK'S FIFTH AUTUMN LIST.

GEORGE MORLAND. His Life and Works.

By SIR WALTER GILBEY, Bt., author of "The Life of George Stubbs, R.A.," and E. D. Cuming. Containing upwards of 50 full-page reproductions in colour of the artist's best work. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net. EDITION DE LUXE limited to 250 signed and numbered copies. Price 2 guineas net.

THE ROYAL NAVY.

Painted by NORMAN WILKINSON, R.B.A. Text by H. LAWRENCE SWINBURNE, with some notes on the costume of the sailors of the past by COMMANDER CHARLES N. ROBINSON, R.N., illustrated by J. JELICOE. Containing 61 full-page illustrations in colour. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net.

THE CLYDE. River and Firth.

Painted by MARY Y. and J. YOUNG HUNTER. Described by NEIL MUNRO. Containing 67 full-page illustrations in colour and a sketch map of the district. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net. EDITION DE LUXE limited to 400 signed and numbered copies. Price 2 guineas net.

BIRDS OF BRITAIN.

By J. LEWIS BONHOTE, M.A., F.L.S., F.Z.S., Member of the British Ornithologists' Union. Containing 100 full-page illustrations in colour selected by H. E. DRESSER from his "Birds of Europe." Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 20s. net.

SUPPRESSED PLATES.

By G. S. LAYARD. Containing upwards of 70 illustrations. Square demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top. Price 7s. 6d. net.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London, W.

Just Published. NEW NOVEL, by the Author of "The Seething Pot," "Hyacinth," &c.

"THE NORTHERN IRON," By George A. Birmingham.

Crown 8vo, Irish Linen, 6s.

"There can be no doubt that this story will have a great success, for it is intensely alive and holds the interest from start to finish. The story is very exciting; the author has a wonderful power of keeping his grip on it and describing the incidents with relentless force."—Daily Telegraph.

"Its characters are finely drawn and its interest compelling."—Morning Leader.

"The book is extremely well done all round, and will be read as much for its engrossing story as for the admirable pictures it gives of those stirring times which closed the eighteenth century."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Send postcard for full list of publications.

Dublin: MAUNSEL & Co., Ltd.

London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.

NOW READY THE JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY,"
6d. NET. GIVING PARTICULARS OF THE LAST
BOOKS OF THE YEAR.

APART FROM THE USUAL FEATURES THIS
NUMBER INCLUDES A LONG AND SEASON-
ABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE
BY FOURTEEN OF THE MOST POPULAR
WRITERS FOR THE YOUNG.

Begin the New Year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly,"
a Specimen Copy of which you can get on application to the Publishers, Simpkin Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court,
London.

THE CHRISTMAS SCRIBNER.

This December SCRIBNER'S is a distinguished number in every respect. Among the contents of more than ordinary interest are:—

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD, Portrait Maker.

By R. T. H. HALSEY. Illustrated with a series of remarkable reproductions in colour of many of his most celebrated medallions.

"THE CHILD IN FAIRYLAND." By

SARAH S. STILWELL. A series of drawings in full-colours, accompanied by some charming verses by EDITH B. STURGIS.

SEVEN SHORT STORIES of exceptional interest.

Among the Poems of the Number is:

"THE WILD ROSE." By GEORGE MEREDITH.

The Christmas SCRIBNER'S is a criterion for Magazine making.

GET YOUR COPY TO-DAY.

ONE SHILLING

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
New York and London.

TALLIS HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, E.C. Telephone Holborn 584

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

Pp. 776. Portrait and Memoir. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. post free.

COMPENDIUM OF SWEDENBORG'S THEOLOGICAL WRITINGS.

* * Because Swedenborg has written so much, many who are strangers to his works are deterred from making their acquaintance from not knowing what to select and where to begin. This work contains the most important passages, arranged under heads, so as to present a complete and authoritative exposition of what he taught.

London: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury Street.

NOVELS WITH AND WITHOUT A PURPOSE.

(1) In "The Convert" Miss Elizabeth Robins has produced what the Germans term a Tendenz-Roman. As a matter of fact, there is much more of tendency than romance in these strenuous pages. Even the most complete sympathiser with Woman's Suffrage may find interminable reports of Trafalgar Square meetings somewhat oppressive when regarded as fiction. In her enthusiasm for her cause, Miss Robins has somewhat forgotten the artist in the propagandist; there is next to no plot in "The Convert" and there is surprisingly little character-drawing. Those who remember the deep humanity and grim realism of "The Magnetic North," turn the leaves of its successor disconsolately, encountering statistics in place of incident, and argument instead of drama. Vida Levering, the "convert," is the only character given with much detail, and the final working out of her early sin forms the climax of the book. Yet this one episode of human passion has to be twisted into an argument for woman's political freedom. The author does not make it quite clear how the possession of the vote would have guarded Vida against the fall which was due to an unhappy love and her own weakness. Doubtless, fuller equality, a hold on life's larger issues, might save many a woman from being made a victim to men's desires; but ethics and logic are alike somewhat distorted in the effort to make Vida Levering's love story point a political moral. The book is full of trenchant reasoning, of earnest thought, but, in spite of the author's evident conviction, it lacks wholly that vitalizing passion which transformed "Uncle Tom's Cabin" from an anti-slavery tract into a human drama and a moving force in the affairs of the world.

(2) We have not to dread the vestige of a moral or a purpose in "Major Vigoureux," yet, for all its fantastic irony, there is spiritual struggle and conquest in "Q's" quaint romance. Very winning, in its subdued humour and half-mocking pathos, is the story of Major Vigoureux at his forgotten post, with his absurd little garrison and superannuated defences. Here we have "Q," not in his adventurous but his whimsical mood. There is not much incident in the tale, but there are delightful pictures of the lonely islands off the Cornish coast; there is much clear-cut characterisation and a fragrance of freakish love.

(3) The days are gone in which we looked to Mr. Marion Crawford for sincere and strenuous work. "Arethusa" is a picturesque story, full of love and adventure, told with the facile skill of the practised craftsman. Yet, in this drama of fourteenth-century Constantinople there was scope for deeper passion and more convincing conflict than any which Mr. Crawford has set forth. The well-told tale does not strongly stir the pulses for all its hair-breadth escapes, nor touch the heart, despite its surrender to love. It is thankless to quarrel with so vivid a romance, but the author of "Greifenstein" and "Sant' Ilario" is to blame if "Arethusa" be judged by a too exacting standard.

(4) Mr. Stanley Weyman would be the first to confess that "Laid up in Lavender" can lay little claim to serious treatment. The handful of stories gathered up from old magazines was scarce worth the redeeming. Some of them are but average magazine fiction; one or two have good motives, rather carelessly handled; one—"The Body Birds of Court"—is a clever bit of grim humour. Take it all in all, the stories do not repay the laying up or the bringing forth.

(5) In "Lisheen" we return to the domain of the problem novel. The motive is extremely simple: Bob Maxwell, a young Irish landowner, influenced by Tolstoi and kindred theorists, is stung by the mockery of his acquaintances into accepting a wager binding him to live for a year as a peasant among peasants. Most of the book deals with his experiences during his masquerade, especially at the farm of Owen McAuliffe. There is much sympathetic portrayal of Irish life, and Maxwell himself—with his dreams and disillusionings, and gallant endeavour—is an attractive figure. But there is a curious uncertainty in Canon Sheehan's method; he is not content to give a realistic study of peasant life, nor even an idealised picture of his reformer and theorist. Wrought in with his story of Irish poverty and endurance is the melodramatic romance of Mabel, Maxwell's cousin, and Outram, with his Eastern mysteries and taint of secret leprosy. Had Canon Sheehan done less, he would—paradoxically—have accomplished more. As it is, the book leaves an impression of unreality, despite some admirable characterisation, and the charm of its Irish atmosphere.

(6) "The Awakening of Bittlesham" reads almost like a parody of the foregoing gravely intended book. Mr. Bradbury's story is comedy which verges on farce, but it is clever work of its kind. Gregory Bewstridge, with his Socialistic theories, his dream of a "return to the land," certainly does awaken the slumbrous village of Bittlesham to some purpose. The various experiments: his revival of old English sports, his valiant donning of a smock—"the ancient Saxon dress"—his town-bred enthusiasm for the "straight furrow," which he unwarily attempts to draw in practice as well as theory, all are set forth in entertaining fashion, though at times the humour tends to become a little boisterous. Perhaps "The Awakening of Bittlesham" will never be so truly appreciated as after a conscientious course of problem fiction.

XENOPHON AND OTHERS.*

SOME of these studies in the text of Xenophon and other Greek and Latin authors have already appeared in the pages of the "Classical Review." Their republication is highly gratifying to the pride of English scholarship. Mr. Richards is one of the small band of modern scholars who can be placed in the line of Bentley and Porson as emenders of corrupt texts and interpreters of hard passages. In the maps of modern educational reformers their explorations are a terra incognita viewed with a contempt not bred of familiarity. We are glad that Mr. Richards leaves Xenophon practically intact. The notes upon the minor works attributed to Xenophon involve many points of interest both with regard to their authenticity and to the actual usages of Attic prose, and the concluding discussion contains a noteworthy passage contrasting the style of the Orators with that of Thucydides and Plato.

The first-named used "the actual Attic speech of their time, not indeed in all its colloquial idiom and ease, but in its serious and slightly formal shape, just as Burke and Macaulay and Bright in their speeches give us the English that has really been spoken in the best English society for 100 or 150 years past." On the other hand, Thucydides was archaic, "his bent was towards singularity, and no doubt his long absence from Athens also affected his style." As for Plato, "the real Athenians of the fourth century talked even less like the interlocutors of the 'Phaedo' and the 'Phaedrus' than Englishmen of the last fifty years have conversed or made speeches in the style of 'Modern Painters' or 'Marius the Epicurean.'"

The elaborate discussions of ἄν followed by a future tense, and of the exact meaning of certain place adverbs cannot be dealt with here. Mr. Richards supports his arguments by a wealth of illustrations. But another theory—that many difficulties in the text of Greek authors arise from the mistake of a copyist in unconsciously repeating or anticipating a neighbouring word—is upheld by modern instances. A pupil at Oxford wrote in haste, "We are more likely to opinion a true opinion," on which Mr. Richards drily comments: "Were this Greek someone would certainly maintain that it was a good cognate accusative and that opinion was a verb which did not happen to occur elsewhere." But two of the instances quoted from English literature seem to be beside the mark. The double use of knocked in the passage from "Marius the Epicurean" is not a mistake in sense but merely in style, while in Johnson's "Life of Shenstone, 'I wish it well enough to wish it were in rhyme,' the repetition is half playful and apparently intentional.

* "Notes on Xenophon and others." By Herbert Richards, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Wadham College, Oxford. E. Grant Richards. 6s. net.

(1) "The Convert." By Elizabeth Robins. Methuen. 6s.

(2) "Major Vigoureux." By "Q." Methuen. 6s.

(3) "Arethusa." By F. Marion Crawford. Macmillan. 6s.

(4) "Laid up in Lavender." By Stanley J. Weyman. Smith & Elder. 6s.

(5) "Lisheen." By the Very Rev. Canon Sheehan. Longmans. 6s.

(6) "The Awakening of Bittlesham." By G. F. Bradley. Smith & Elder. 6s.

Ah, fill the Pipe:—what boots it to repeat
How Time is flying underneath our Feet:
Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday,
Why fret about them if to-day be sweet!

Omar-Khayyam (modernised).

A Pipe of

PLAYER'S NAVY MIXTURE

makes

Yesterday a pleasant memory,
To-day a time of sweet enjoyment,
and its anticipation
Tomorrow brings peace of mind and contentment.

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0443

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain
it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

VISIT CALIFORNIA

THE LAND OF SUNSHINE, FRUIT, AND FLOWERS,

And Travel
by the Southern Pacific Company's Routes.

Luxurious trains leave New York and New Orleans daily, provided with Dining, Sleeping, Observation Cars, etc.
MAGNIFICENT NEW PASSENGER STEAMSHIPS, 10,000 tons, leave New York for New Orleans
weekly, offering a delightful route between those Cities. THROUGH TICKETS issued.

Apply, RUD FALCK, General European Agent, Southern Pacific Co.

LONDON: 49, Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 22, Cockspur Street, S.W.

LIVERPOOL: 25, Water Street.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY'S HOTEL (Temperance),
GREAT RUSSELL STREET.

Passenger Lift. Electric Light in all Rooms. Bath-rooms on every floor. Spacious Dining-Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. All Floors Fire-proof. Perfect Sanitation. Night Porter. Tel. phone. BEDROOMS, including attendance, from 3/6 to 6/0. Full Tariff and Testimonials post free on application.
Telegraphic Address—"Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C., are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS
at HALF-PRICE.

ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.

LISTS SENT POST FREE.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindlay at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS.—A Catalogue of finely printed modern Books, choice editions, limited issues and large paper copies, post free on receipt of p.c.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.

CHOICE BOOKS

are presents which give the most lasting pleasure.

The book-lover will find a mine of wealth in rare and choice editions in my Xmas Catalogue, sent free on request.

FRANK HOLLINGS, Great Turnstile, Holborn.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.
C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYNS (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'gr.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of a WOMAN PRINCIPAL of Avery Hill Residential and Day Training College for Women, Eltham.

Applicants must possess a University degree or its equivalent. The salary attaching to the post is £500 a year, together with board, residence, washing, and medical attendance.

The candidate appointed will be required to commence work after the Easter holidays, or, if possible, earlier.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Thursday, January 9th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME.

Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,

Victoria Embankment, W.C.

November 23rd, 1907.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of an ASSISTANT MISTRESS to teach Science and Mathematics at the Hackney Secondary School, Cassland-road, S. Hackney.

The person appointed will be required to commence work not later than Easter, 1908.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £120 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £10, subject to satisfactory service, to a maximum of £220 a year.

A commencing salary higher than the minimum stated above will be allowed if the candidate appointed has had satisfactory experience.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, L.C.C. Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, January 20th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith-street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME.

Clerk of the London County Council,

Education Offices,

Victoria Embankment, W.C.,

December 21st, 1907.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the appointment of a NON-RESIDENT ASSISTANT MISTRESS of Method at Avery Hill Training College, experienced in infant-school work.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £130 a year, and will rise, subject to satisfactory service, by annual increments of £10, to a maximum of £170 a year.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, L.C.C., Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, January 20th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

Candidates applying through the post for the form of application should enclose a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are published in the "London County Council Gazette," which can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith-street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage), 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME.

Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,

Victoria Embankment, W.C.,

December 21st, 1907.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and soial problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Roventree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegram "TRIFORM LONDON" Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, Baldock, Hertfordshire.

FOR THE EDUCATION OF BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal—Mrs. ENNIS RICHMOND (Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," &c.).

Head Master—Mr. KENNETH RICHMOND.

SPRING TERM begins January 14th.

"A Natural Education," the Report of a Lecture by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls, may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d.; single copy, 4d. post-paid.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.

Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.

Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER,
B.A., Camb.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.; NEXT TERM, JANUARY 15th.

ROYAL HOLLOWAY COLLEGE.

(UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.)

The LENT TERM BEGINS ON JANUARY 11th, 1908. The College prepares Students for the London Degrees in Science and Arts, and for certain of the Oxford Honours Examinations.

Ten Entrance Scholarships, from £50 to £60 a year, and a certain number of Bursaries of not more than £30, tenable for three years, will be offered for Competition in June, 1908.

For further particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Royal Holloway College, Englefield Green, Surrey.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

Economy

PEARS is the most economical of all soaps. It wears to the thinness of a sixpence. Moisten the thin remainder of your old cake and place it in the hollow of the new one where it will adhere, thus you will not lose an atom, and will see that PEARS' IS NOT ONLY PURE, BUT ECONOMICAL.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 14.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 4, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	485	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		The State of the Militia. By
A Critical Year	488	A. M. O.	502
The New Helots of South		"The Decline of the Oxford
Africa	489	Movement." By Wm. Scott
The End of a Revolution?	490	Palmer	502
Paper Fortunes and Misfor-		Mr. Haldane and the tunes	492	Initiative. By Maxwell
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		Rouse	502
The Recurrence of Disease	493	Size and Cost of Fleet. By
The Limitation of France	494	J. Mackenzie	503
Friendship	495	"The Virgin Birth." By Wm.
A Portuguese Monastery	495	Windsor	503
SHORT STORY:—		England's Generosity to Ire-
Fame. By Walter Herbage	497	land. By Murrough O'Brien	503
POETRY:—		"Vital Causes of Irish Dis-
The Trance. By Lascelles		content." By E. D.	504
Abercrombie	498	Land Legislation in Rou-
LETTER FROM ABROAD:—		mania. By A. Stead	504
The Land Question in Ger-		Premature Burial. By J. H.	504
man Towns. By Ed. Bern-		Scho lboy. Mistranslations.
stein	498	By "Magister"	504
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	500	The Birch Rod for Old Tramps.
Books to be Read	500	By "Veteran Criminologist"	504
THE DRAMA:—		REVIEWS:—
Mr. Shaw's Gospel of Common		The Creed of a Catholic
Sense. By M.	501	Liberal. I. By H. F.	506

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE New Year has brought the Immigration Restriction Act into force in the Transvaal, and the Indian community seems resolute in meeting it by passive resistance. Six thousand are said to have left the Transvaal already, but about seven thousand remain. Under the leadership of Mr. Gandhi, they refuse to submit to the humiliating provisions regarding registration and segregation. It is expected that the leaders will be arrested and deported, and the rank and file deprived of their trading licenses. These exceptional measures against British subjects, which we should not for a moment have tolerated had the Transvaal still been under a Republican government, naturally arouse deep resentment in India. Lord Elgin gave his assent to the Act with reluctance, on the ground that he could not over-rule the unanimous opinion of a self-governing colony. This argument overlooks the fact that autonomy on such terms carries with it rights that do not belong to actual independence. We can interfere to protect British subjects whose interests are threatened by a sovereign State; our hands are tied when the aggressor is a colony. If the idea of citizenship of the Empire does not carry with it the elementary right to travel freely and reside freely within it, it must be nearly meaningless. We are teaching Indians, by this inaction of ours, that we are not in earnest when we profess to accord to them the same civil rights as white men. Colonial autonomy must not be so interpreted as to destroy all idea of a common basis of personal rights within the Empire.

On the last day of the old year sentence was pronounced on the 169 deputies of the First Duma who signed the Viborg manifesto. With two exceptions all were condemned to three months' imprisonment and to the life-long loss of their political rights. Their bearing at the trial, especially that of Professor Muromtseff, the speaker, and M. Petrunkevitch, the veteran Zemstvo leader, was dignified and courageous, and though it is doubtful whether the procedure was sound, the defence disdained to press technical pleas. There will be an appeal to a higher Court. The Liberal members of the present Duma, headed by M. Roditcheff arranged a touching demonstration of sympathy. With the exception of M. Stolypin's own organ, the "Rossia," the entire Russian Press sides with the deputies against the Government, describes the affair as a moral defeat for the bureaucracy, and asks why, if the deputies really endangered the safety of the State, they have received only the punishment which might have been meted out to a careless cabman. In this country, opinion, as voiced even in Conservative papers, is strongly hostile to this act of vengeance, but in France, where a new loan is being quietly prepared, the non-Socialist Press is singularly complacent towards the allied government.

* * *

LORD CURZON'S eagerness to return to the field which his interesting but unrestrained personality adorns, has been curiously displayed in a letter addressed to the Irish Peers. In this letter Lord Curzon announces himself as a candidate for the seat in the House of Lords which Lord Kilmaine's death vacates, and asks the Irish Peers to elect him as one of their "representatives." He adds the strange information that he applied for an English peerage to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and was refused. One of Lord Curzon's early acts as a member of the House of Commons was to join a movement of eldest sons of Peers, which, if it had succeeded, would have enabled him to remain in the representative House. Now he not only refuses to enter that House, a seat in which is presumably open to him, but calls on a Liberal Prime Minister to give him, a high Tory, and the author of an Indian policy of which Sir Henry disapproves, a seat in an Assembly which in a very few years, or even months, he will enter by right. The Prime Minister naturally refused to add an able Conservative to a body in which the Conservative majority stands at about ten to one. We are bound to add that Lord Curzon's leap into the ranks of the Irish representative Peers is hardly fair to them. That body consists of Irishmen, possessing Irish estates and interests. Lord Curzon, though an Irish Peer, answers to neither category. Moreover, though his need is a temporary one, he will, if elected, remain an Irish "representative" Peer for the rest of his life, and for so long will bar out a "representative" Irishman. Surely this is a straining of the Act of Union to the point of abuse. What right have the representative Irish Peers to bargain away a seat in the Lords to suit Lord Curzon's personal convenience?

* * *

THE attempt to hold the Indian National Congress at Surat in the face of the wrecking tactics of the Extremists was abandoned after the platform had been carried by Mr. Tilak on the second day, in a triumphant rush. The Moderates, who form two-thirds of the Congress, have now founded a new organisation, with colonial Home Rule under the British flag as the basis of its programme. Dr. Ghose, Mr. Gokhale, Surendranath Banerjee, and Lajpat Rai are its leaders. The three former profess themselves satisfied by the schism, which they regarded as inevitable. Lajpat Rai, who has rejected all the overtures of the Extremists to become their leader, will, however, work for a reconciliation.

The Extremists have also founded a rival and permanent organisation under Mr. Tilak and Ajit Singh.

* * *

THIS formation of two sharply divided camps in the Indian Nationalist movement might well mark the inauguration of a new policy in India. It is now possible to say definitely that two-thirds of the reform party are not merely not disloyal, but even that they are actively and positively loyal. It is obvious that many of the more ardent reform leaders have been grossly misrepresented by Anglo-Indian journalists, and misunderstood by officials. Mr. Bannerjee, for example, has usually been depicted by correspondents as the arch-contriver of sedition in Bengal. The fact that Lajpat Rai, smarting presumably under a sense of grievance, hailed from one end of India to another in popular ballads as a national hero, and invited by the extremists to lead them, has none the less joined the moderate section, is strong presumptive evidence that the suspicions of his loyalty must have been mistaken. Generous reforms on democratic lines would now assure the triumph of moderate counsels.

* * *

M. CLEMENCEAU seems this week to have abandoned finally his attitude of reserve in the Moroccan complication. General Drude has been superseded, ostensibly on grounds of health, in the command of the forces near Casa Blanca. They are to be largely increased, and General d'Amade will be authorised to penetrate indefinitely into the interior. Rumour even speaks of an expedition to Fez. In the East also the tribes near the frontier are being "pacified" on a considerable scale, disarmed, and forced to pay a heavy money indemnity. The idea behind these costly and risky movements is apparently to re-establish the nominal authority of the Sultan, who has been compelled by the success of the Pretender to become the protégé of France. Such a policy, if logically pursued, could only end, after a long period of conquest, in reducing him to the position of the Dey of Tunis. So far there is an absence of criticisms or commentaries in Germany. But it is disquieting to learn, on what appears to be good authority, that preparations for an eventual mobilisation are being actively made in Alsace.

* * *

THE Prime Minister appears to have made some interesting remarks to a Liberal friend who interviewed him at Biarritz and reported his conversation to the "Manchester Guardian." The Prime Minister described the situation with the cheerful sang-froid which belongs to him. He hinted that a settlement of the education difficulty should be solved by a measure "whose justice should be manifest to everyone." The question of the reduction of expenditure was "never absent from his mind," but, considering the difficulties arising in the war services, the people "must not expect too much." The Government would choose their own time for going to the country, after "two or three years" of effective work. The dominant issue in politics was the power of the Lords, and the most vigorous demand was for land law reform. The Licensing Bill, he hinted, would contain some recognition of the principle of local option, but would not deal with "disinterested management." The battle of the Trade would, he thought, centre in a fight on the time limit.

* * *

A POWERFUL reinforcement of the Government's temperance policy has come from the trade unions, who have issued a manifesto from the Trades Union and Labour Officials' Temperance Fellowship. It repudiates the document coming from the "National Freedom Defence League"—a body, it says, without officers or offices—in the name of the workers. It declares that licensing reform will not cause "unemployment," but "help to remedy it"; that excessive drinking is one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of working-class movements; and that the conductors of the liquor industry, with their cynical motto, "Our trade our politics," have for the last thirty-five years used their whole electoral force against labour. The workmen are urged not to act as the catspaws of the "liquor monopoly." This document, which echoes the voice of organised labour in all countries, is signed by the leading representatives of all sections of the British Labour Party, including Mr. Burns, Mr. Burt, Mr. Shackleton, Mr. Henderson, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, Mr. John Wilson, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Maddison, and Mr. Philip Snowden.

* * *

MR. ARCHIBALD HURD, an Imperialist, and a thoroughly well-informed authority on naval matters, contributes to the "Fortnightly Review" an absolutely destructive criticism both of the attack on our system of naval organisation, and of the demand, now reinforced by that eccentric "pacifist," Mr. Stead, for a "forty million naval Budget." Nothing could be more striking than Mr. Hurd's description of the power and mass of the Navy as a defensive force, ready for action. We now maintain three large fleets in home waters, the Channel Fleet, an armada consisting of sixty vessels, including fourteen battleships; the Atlantic Fleet, whose base is the Irish coast; and the new Home Fleet, consisting of a practical, organised reserve, available for almost immediate service. This is Mr. Hurd's summary of the collective fighting strength of this unparalleled assembly of warships:—

"In place of eight armoured ships either at the Home ports or in British waters during only a portion of the year, we have always in British waters twenty-six battleships, fifteen armoured cruisers, thirteen protected cruisers, and fifty-four destroyers, besides submarines, accompanied by all attendant auxiliary vessels; supporting this first line are six battleships, twenty-two cruisers, and upward of 140 torpedo craft—torpedo gun boats, torpedo boat destroyers, torpedo boats, and submarines—all of them furnished with commanding officers and all the essential officers and men who live on board, and requiring only the least skilled ratings to be embarked at a couple of hours' notice to place them absolutely on a war footing."

Is there a conceivable combination of naval Powers able to meet and break down such a force as this?

* * *

THE statement of revenue for the first three-quarters of the financial year, which was issued on Tuesday, shows a falling-off of some £272,000, as compared with last year's returns, a decrease due entirely to the last quarter's decline, which undoubtedly corresponds to a falling-off in trade. One or two of the increases, such as a growth of over half-a-million in the Post Office receipts, are, we fear, due more to the passion for gambling, thinly disguised as an interest in "Limericks," than to a genuine expansion of business. The Excise, which tests the consumption of liquor, dropped rather sharply in the last quarter after showing an increase for the first six months of the year. Millionaires, who die with unpleasing irregularity, have been less plentiful than usual, and the receipts from estate duties have accordingly shrunk by £846,000. On the other hand, it looks as if Mr. Asquith would more than cover the loss of threepence on "earned" incomes by his new method of requiring the disclosure of total income on the part of those who seek abatements. From this source the Chancellor may obtain a large contribution to his new Pension Fund.

* * *

WE have made a rough estimate of the cost of the Old Age Pensions scheme which was outlined in a recent number of THE NATION, as it affects the population at different ages. It works out as follows:—

At 70	£7,759,000
At 69	£8,999,000

At 68	£10,239,000
At 67	£11,479,000
At 66	£12,719,000
At 65	£13,977,000

The scheme, it will be remembered, was based on a wage limit of ten shillings a week.

* * *

THE Bishop of Hereford, writing to the "Times," has made a striking contribution to the controversy on the new relations between the State and secondary education which Mr. McKenna's policy sets up. Speaking as an old head-master, he declared the new regulations to be "entirely reasonable" and to deserve "our grateful recognition, acceptance, and support." They were liberal on "an unprecedented scale," gave a new opportunity to the "clever children of the poor," placed the problem of religious instruction in the hands of the parents, and, on the whole, merely applied the general scheme of religious teaching which obtains in nearly all great public schools. Meanwhile, the Board of Education, in their annual report, lay stress on the fact that the new grants are intended to pave the way for free admission to the secondary establishments of a number of children coming up from the primary schools. They also propose to allow local education authorities to relax some of the rules in favour of denominational institutions which are at once efficient and necessary.

* * *

THE appointment of a civilian as Minister of War in Italy, our Rome correspondent writes, represents an important reform, not only from the military point of view, but as an indication of the direction given to the general policy of the country. Twenty years ago, the Liberal policy of entrusting the direction of the War Office and of the Naval Office to civilian Ministers was considered almost blasphemy. Then came the successful experiment in France, while in Italy, especially at the Ministry of War, the inconvenience of having a general at the head grew more and more evident every year. Each general brought with him an entirely different programme regarding organisation, armaments, tactics, discipline of the army, and special preferences for the infantry or cavalry, for the artillery or engineers, according to the force to which he belonged. Unfortunately, the general did not remain in power even long enough to apply his programme, so that no experiment could be taken as an example. But the worst drawback was the complete lack of political and parliamentary training on the part of an officer suddenly put at the head of the Ministry of War, which was thus exposed, especially in the Chamber, to all kinds of mortifying and humiliating failures. This situation led to disorder in the war administration, and to unrest among the officers. Signor Giolitti thought that this was the moment to inaugurate the system of civilian Ministers of War, and his choice of Senator Casana is singularly happy. Senator Casana, an engineer of great reputation, proved to be also an administrator of the first order during the years in which he was Mayor of Turin.

* * *

THERE is no end to the passion for Utopian communities. A body of five hundred Americans, Irishmen, Russians, and Scandinavians propose to start a communistic society in an island in the South Pacific. Each member is to contribute £60. Discontent with social conditions, or with the dullness of city life, is described as the leading motive of the emigrants. The head of the expedition, which includes butchers, shorthand writers, and composers, is a publisher, an announcement which may possibly account for the absence of authors. As a rule these societies fail because men discontented with society as it exists are not always the right persons for conducting new communities, in which the old troubles concerning love, money, and personal dignity necessarily re-appear. But the history of the colony will be interesting. The last notable over-seas Utopia was that which sprang out of the failure of the great shearers' strike in Australia, and was conducted by Mr. Lane, one of the leaders in that struggle. It founded a colony in Paraguay, called Cosmé, which split up after a rather heroic struggle with nature and itself.

* * *

ON Monday the grave in Highgate Cemetery, in which most sensible men and women would expect to find the body of Mr. T. C. Druce, was opened in the presence of a small body of experts and lawyers, and was found to contain the remains of an "aged and bearded man." These were said to have been identified by a friend of the late owner of the Baker Street Bazaar, but a doubt has been suggested as to whether the face was bearded or whiskered. The inscription on the coffin was:

"Thomas Charles Druce, Esq.,
"Died 28th December, 1864, in his 71st year."

No steps have as yet been taken towards the abandonment of the prosecution of Mr. Herbert Druce for his statement on oath that he had seen his father's body in its coffin.

* * *

WE cannot deal with the material of the still pending charge of "blasphemy" on which a man has been committed for trial at Bow Street, especially as we do not know what the defendant said. But we are bound to remember that all such trials are essentially trials of opinions. For that reason we regret the partial clearance of the court at the magistrate's order. The Press, which was admitted, feels a natural reluctance to print violent attacks on religion, which we may suppose to have been made, and therefore the public is in the unsatisfactory position of knowing almost nothing of the ground for bringing a very old law into operation again.

* * *

THE sudden death on Tuesday of M. de Trooz, the Belgian Premier, has passed almost unnoticed in the London Press, but it can hardly fail to have an important bearing on the Congo crisis. A Clerical of a somewhat indefinite personality and Centre views, he held together a coalition Cabinet, which included reactionary Royalists as well as a Catholic Democrat so independent as M. Helleputte. It is useless to speculate on his successor, but when one remembers how long a crisis preceded the formation of the Trooz Cabinet, it is obvious that grave difficulties may arise. The clauses relative to the Crown Domain in the Congo Treaty of Annexation have induced both the Liberal groups, the Socialists, and the Catholics who follow M. Beernaert, to assume a definite attitude of hostility to the idea of annexation on any such terms, and if they vote solidly, they can defeat the Government. There is some talk of finding financial compensation for King Leopold, if he will surrender the Domain, but it is very doubtful whether a rather frugal Chamber would face such an expenditure.

* * *

THE private view of the ninth annual exhibition of the Women's International Art Club was held at the Royal Institute galleries on Thursday. In a very mixed company of exhibits the landscape painting of Mrs. Dods-Withers, the nude "Enfant au réveil" of Mdlle. Madeleine Carpentier, Miss Bethia Clarke's pastel picture of Dutch children "Going to School," Mrs. Austen Brown's colour wood-cuts, Miss Maud Beddington's imaginative conception "Echoes," and Mrs. Cayley Robinson's tempera designs, are prominently meritorious. As regards the rest, the exhibition suffers from the usual defect of large shows in so far that it includes a good deal which, without being artistically bad, is of no earthly importance to anybody.

Politics and Affairs.

A CRITICAL YEAR.

THIS year, which has opened so quietly, bids fair to develop into a stormy, critical epoch in modern politics. The quiet of to-day can deceive no one as to the difficulties and disturbances of to-morrow. We are witnessing a play in which, like most modern plays, the first two acts are but talk and preparation, leading up to the third, in which the heart of the drama is revealed. It would be unfair to summarise the first two sessions of the Reforming Parliament as entirely occupied with talk and preparation. Much effective administration has been restored in part the old Liberal traditions. Much beneficial and most necessary legislation has been dealing with problems whose consideration has been too long delayed. But it would be fair to assert that the heart of the drama is concentrated in the third act. Difficulties which could not be fairly met in the earlier time have all been relegated to this period. The Government has announced its intention of joining issue with the House of Lords in a combat which, when commenced, must be pushed to its conclusion. It has promised a scheme of Social Reform in connection with the aged poor which may excite either a great devotion or a great disappointment. It is confronted in Ireland with a situation trembling on the margin of danger, and only preserved from complete chaos by the efforts of those who believe in the reality of the Government's promises. It has guaranteed Bills on a variety of subjects, satisfying its various sectional supporters in their demand for a fair payment during the past two years by promissory notes redeemable in the present Session. So that it will start with a programme whose realisation, even with the best will in the world and no obstruction in either House, will require nearly continuous sittings from January to December. The situation is not a gloomy one. It is rather the testing of great capacities: the occasion for which previous energies have provided a training and a preparation. If the present Administration proves equal to the strain, it will go down to posterity as one of the great reforming Governments of the world.

Three main questions overshadow all others. The first is the campaign against the Lords. The second is the Old Age Pension scheme. The third is the congestion of public business. The first is definitely to begin as action superseding assertion. We are no longer to be content with academic motions of protest. The Bills which have been mutilated and slain by the Upper House during these past two years are to go back to that House again. An attempt will be made, that is to say, to ascertain if the Lords will accept the arrangement outlined in the Government scheme for enforcing the supremacy of the People as embodied in the representative Chamber. That scheme definitely recognises the possibility of considerable variations in the "second thoughts" of the Commons. The function which it leaves to the Lords is a function of far-reaching importance. They can compel the Commons to reconsider any legislation in a later Session, to delay for many months the passage of a Bill into law, during which the members of the Commons, in full communication with the electorate, may have time to ascertain how far the first attempt embodied the wishes of the electorate. In the present instance, we can imagine that the two Scottish Bills will be returned to the Upper House practically unchanged. Political controversy, dormant this autumn in the southern, has been exceedingly vigorous in the northern half of these islands. The Small Landholders Bill has been copiously discussed in every village; the Land Valuation Bill—with the policy of land rating, to which it is avowedly preliminary—copiously debated in every town. The result has been, so far as we can ascertain, to demonstrate that outside a small section of landowners, their agents, and large farmers, these Bills command the enthusiastic approval of the bulk of the people of Scotland. The Scottish representatives will declare what minor changes, if any, are desirable. And the Bills, with these minor changes, will be swiftly despatched again to the House which so contemptuously rejected them last August. In education, on the other hand, it is probable that there will be found considerable variation from the original scheme. Mr. Birrell's Bill represented a very elaborate attempt at compromise, with such balances and adjustments designed to placate all the interested parties, as left it, at the end, a measure of unusual complexity. The new Bill will be simpler in its operations; and, although no one can imagine that it is possible at one blow to rectify the extraordinary anomalies and injustices which have grown up in our elementary educational system, yet it is exceedingly probable that some attempt will be made to cut through the tangle by use of one or two firmly asserted Liberal and Democratic principles. What will be the future of the whole controversy? What relationship will operate between the two Houses twelve months to-day? Few situations have been more difficult to forecast. The choice indeed—perhaps unfortunately—rests with the Lords. If they agree, however reluctantly, to swallow these three Bills on their second presentation, they will undoubtedly take out the heart of any anti-Lords campaign in the country. They will be able to ask with some complacency, "What is all this pother about, when we have done exactly what you design us to do in the very scheme which you have yourself prepared?" If, however, they decide to fight, a fight would appear to be inevitable. The Prime Minister, in an interesting interview published this week in the "Manchester Guardian," anticipates two or three years more of sound and useful Liberal legislation. But the decision of the Lords at the end of this year once again to defy the action of the Commons would seem to make the prospect of such sound and useful legislation chimerical. It would relegate to the Session of 1909 those necessary rectifications of electoral machinery which are demanded immediately before the appeal of the elected House against the hereditary House is placed definitely for the decision of the people.

And if this great constitutional question provides the chief ground for uncertainty, an equally great social question provides a chief ground of hope. By careful preparation, and by most cautious advances, the present Government have led up to a moment of profound possibilities. Without committing themselves at the last election to the granting of old age pensions, or winning the votes of the electors with such a policy, they are now setting themselves to a reform which nine out of ten of the labouring classes would place before all others. The land and pensions—so runs the universal testimony —are the vital questions in the minds of the people: the land to provide work for the day, pensions for the waiting time before nightfall when the day's work is done. And the sole danger in connection with the scheme is that the high hopes which have been already excited, and which will intensify as the controversy continues, may find a sudden cold douche cast upon them by the production of a scheme timid, limited, and imperfect. We do not advocate old age pensions because it will form a popular subject in the country—an indirect bribe to the electors. Were such a policy required, it would be far more effective if maintained as a promise rather than a performance. For Democracies speedily forget, and accept the past with acquiescence, being always more interested in what is becoming rather than in what has been. We ask for it as a wise, large, humane method of social organisation which will remove the reproach that at present challenges our modern civilisation—the treatment of its aged poor. We ask for it because we believe, if established on sound and generous lines, it will stand to posterity as a not inadequate return for a more than adequate national trust: a return to the people of this country, to-day and for all to-morrows, from a Government called to power by the largest vote of confidence that has ever been given to any Government since Democracy was born in England.

The third question is the congestion of public business. First-class Bills rudely jostle each other, like the souls in the philosopher's vision crowding round the channels of egress to obtain reincarnation in the world. The Temperance Bill is being matured amid pressure from various militant temperance organisations, and a feverish organisation for "protection" on the part of "the Trade." An English Land Valuation Bill has been promised as a preliminary to the rating of land: the only great social measure which in the Northern cities is able to excite an enthusiasm rivalling that of economic Socialism. Ireland will insist on at least two Bills: the University scheme to which Mr. Birrell has pledged his political reputation, and that Land Act dealing with the breakdown of the land purchase scheme which is the law-abiding alternative of cattle-driving. The Housing Bill promised last year is understood to be completed, and will form a measure of great importance, but transcending the normal party divisions. The Miners' Eight Hours Bill has been guaranteed to go forward. The Port of London Bill is already in print. The new system of Committees worked excellently last Session. Many of these Bills unfortunately cannot be referred to them. But tact, patience, and some restraint upon loquacity will be needed if anything like this programme is to be harvested at the end. The greatness of the present opportunity is measured by its gravity. No serious reformer dreads the challenge. Politics which two or three years ago seemed dead and an offence, have to-day become serious, compelling, and alive.

THE NEW HELOTS OF SOUTH AFRICA.

MUCH as we regret Lord Elgin's decision to sanction the Transvaal Immigration Act, we are surprised to find the Conservative Party among his critics. For if there is one feature of British policy in South Africa for which the late Government and the two High Commissioners it appointed are more responsible than for any other, it is the aggravation of the old Boer policy towards the Asiatic trader. They ought, of course, to have mitigated it. They had a free hand; their responsibility was absolute, and there was no form of representative Government to dispute it with them. The treatment of British Indians by Mr. Kruger furnished the Government of 1899 with part of what Mr. Lyttelton called "the British case against the late South African Republic." It roused Lord Lansdowne to "indignation," and Mr. Chamberlain to intervention. But when the British power was firmly seated in Pretoria, the old anti-Asiatic law of 1885, on which the present structure of oppressive legislation was built up, was reaffirmed and strengthened. "The position which the Boer Government took up," said Lord Milner, "is one I fully approve," and he proceeded to descant on the hatred of the white population of the Transvaal for "low-class Asiatics" with "insanitary" habits.

Nor, unfortunately, was the home Government able to change Lord Milner's purpose. The anti-Asiatic law of 1885, like many Boer laws, was laxly administered and partly inoperative. The Boers were not, as a rule, town traders, and did not feel acutely the competition of the Indian community. Their Act offered no impediment to the entry of British Indians into the Transvaal, it gave them distinct rights of trading for a fee, and it imposed no degrading or offensive conditions of registration. Under British rule, the right of entry was restricted to ante-war residents, and the modern and very humiliating method of identification by finger-marks was initiated. And now, all real powers of citizenship have been withdrawn or suspended. Both Governments have refused Indians the vote, barred them out from the ownership of fixed property, and tried to segregate them in filthy town locations. Lord Milner began by calling for a general registration of the community. This has now been made compulsory, and re-registration has been called for, coupled with forms repugnant to free men. Even the right of entry for old residents, guaranteed by Lord Milner, has been withdrawn. The Registration Act, passed last summer, was simply Lord Milner's Peace Preservation Ordinance—one of the most arbitrary documents ever issued in a British Colony—re-drafted for the benefit of the Asiatics. Now it is reinforced by the Immigration Restriction Act, which gives the formal power to deport Asiatics who will not register, and the Indians are invited to choose between re-registration and expulsion. The new Act discriminates in favour of Yiddish, the bastard tongue of European Jewry, and against the ancient languages spoken by hundreds of millions of our Imperial citizens, whose standard of culture and civilisation is, we should say, quite as high as that of the "Peruvian," or Jewish, cabmen of Johannesburg. It is against this final stamp of servitude which the Immigration Act inflicts that the East Indians of the Transvaal have gone out in a kind of passive revolt. The wrongs of these helpless settlers, the redress of which, as Lord Lansdowne declared in 1899, the Empress of India was "powerless to secure at the hands of a small South African State," have been multiplied since that State passed under the rule of her successor, and King Edward has been made an innocent accomplice in the "helotry" of thousands of his subjects.

This is the plain case of the Indian traders of the Transvaal. We confess our reluctance to accept Lord Elgin's decision to assent to so grave an act of injustice, so large a disturbance of the equality of British citizenship, in face of the provision of the Constitution which gave him the veto on all such legislation. The motives of the anti-Asiatic movement are well known. They have nothing to do with the problem of mine labour. The opposition is that of the white retail traders, and is engineered in each town in the Transvaal by the local rivals of the Indian shopkeepers. This again is enforced by the fierce colour prejudice that would exclude Prince Ranjitsinhji or Admiral Togo from a Johannesburg hotel, and shuts the grounds of the racecourse even to the most refined and representative members of the East Indian community in the Transvaal. Yet this rigidly exclusive society is not a self-dependent community. Economically there never was a more dependent one. As a rule, the white races are not manual labourers. They rely on coloured people for the mass of their unskilled work, reserving for themselves the easier rôles of proprietorship, superintendence, and the more responsible kinds of skilled employment. Coloured workmen cook for them, wait on them, mine their coal, their gold, and their diamonds, load and unload their ships, tend their orchards, reap their crops, make their roads, herd their cattle, drive their trollies, carry their tools, and nurse their children. A society thus constituted tends to resent any and every effort of the dependent races to rise above the status which the powerful, possessing caste assigns them. But it is a grave question whether the Imperial Government is called on to enforce this colour inequality on thousands of its own subjects against whom no moral fault or conspicuous intellectual inferiority can be sustained.

It is not as if the vast spaces of the African veld were being rapidly filled with white settlers, flowing naturally into all kinds of occupations. White South Africa does not expand with rapidity. The British part of it has the mobile and restless character that belongs to all town populations, so much so that it is often difficult to maintain a true register for electioneering purposes, even in the older towns of Cape Colony. Large bodies of whites still regard this country as their home, and we doubt whether the business of small retail trading, which the British Indians sustain, is congenial to them, or could be well served by the race that monopolises both the Government and all the larger commercial undertakings of the sub-Continent. We know that the Dutch and English in the Transvaal practically unite on the policy of exclusion, and that the small State of white planters and overseers which we call Natal even outdoes the Transvaal in zeal to maintain the servitude of nine-tenths of its population. So long as white South Africa calls for some equalisation of the standard of life between Oriental and white traders, most people will agree that the claim is just. But that is a matter for industrial and sanitary law rather than for cunningly devised edicts of expulsion, directed mainly against British subjects. The least that an Imperial Government, ruling millions of black, yellow, and brown men for thousands of white ones, can do when faced with a demand to establish not merely a ruling but a commercial white caste, is to call for delay and consideration. It can surely ask the Transvaal to wait until the united voice of British South Africa requires such a violent disturbance of Imperial custom. The policy of Cape Colony towards the great variety of coloured races who inhabit its coast towns is far more enlightened than that of the northern States. Cape Colony acknowledges some kind of responsibility, some form of duty, towards the industrious Asiatics who feed the prosperity of the State, and are indispensable to its town activities. We think Lord Elgin might fairly have referred the brand-new Transvaal Government to Cape Colony, and asked for the postponement of a measure like the Immigration Restriction Act until the unification of South Africa was an accomplished fact, and the great colour problem could have been calmly considered by the federating States. We shall wait to know why he has failed to exercise a function of guardianship expressly reserved to him under the free and very liberal Constitution of 1906, which, like all Constitutions worth the name, was designed to bestow rights, not to destroy them. For if one class of the King's subjects cannot freely enter or leave one part of his dominions, cannot trade there, or vote there, or hold land there, we must cast aside the great Roman example, and admit that we are unable to fix a common standard of Imperial citizenship. And will not that be an omen, almost a confession, of separation?

THE END OF A REVOLUTION?

"THE peoples of Europe are leagued against us," said Danton. "We throw down before them as a gage of battle, the head of a king." M. Stolypin has just addressed a more pettifogging defiance to the conscience of Europe. For the trial of the 169 deputies of the First Duma who signed the Viberg manifesto is not a mere move in a realistic game of politics. It is a shout of triumph, an assertion of a principle. It deserves the name which Spanish inquisitors used to give to their executions. It is an "act of faith." The First Duma was long ago destroyed. Its members have ever since been outlaws excluded from civic life. And now its corpse—the corpse of a Parliament—is, as it were, exhumed and publicly burned, with the civilised world as spectator. The time for this great spectacle has been carefully chosen. When the First Duma was destroyed, the only one of the three which wins a place in the world's imagination, the Duma which other Parliaments had saluted at its birth as their comrade, it was possible for all Europe to repeat with the British Prime Minister, "La Duma est morte, vive la Duma." While the Second Duma sat, the idea of constitutionalism still lived. It is only since the coup d'état that a packed Parliament, docile, impotent, and insignificant, has killed the promise of that prediction. Safe at last in the possession of a Conservative majority, securely based on a gerrymandered franchise, M. Stolypin retraces his steps to imprison and degrade the men who had the sympathies of Europe and the confidence of Russia. His purpose in this long-deferred trial clearly is to work on the imagination of mankind. He gains no concrete end. The judges have not dared to treat the noblemen and professors of the Liberal First Duma as they treated the Social Democrats of the Second. They passed a sentence of three months imprisonment on Professor Muromtseff and his colleagues, while they sent Tseretelli and his comrades for life to Siberia. A punishment which entails no moral degradation, and only a trifling personal inconvenience was not worth inflicting for its own sake. Nor was it necessary to try these 169 ex-deputies in order to exclude them for ever from political rights. The mere threat of a trial had that effect. A Russian Minister who wishes to silence and ostracise a political opponent has only to indict him; his political rights are suspended from the moment when the charge is formulated. By merely hanging over the heads of these ex-deputies the threat of a trial which never took place, M. Stolypin might have kept them for ever in a political limbo. Since he chose to try them, but did not press for heavy sentences, it is fair to assume that he reckoned mainly on the psychological effect to be derived from this grandiose and public vengeance.

What M. Stolypin intends to convey is that the revolutionary period is now at an end. The prisons were never fuller, the gallows rarely busier, the police and the terrorists never engaged, since the eighties of last century, in so deadly a duel. There is, in short, no sign of acquiescence or pacification. But still in the official view the epoch of construction has now begun, and with the imprisonment of the Liberals of the First and the Socialists of the Second Duma, a dead past has buried its dead. The new régime is being organised on the Prussian model. The revolution of 1848 gave Prussia an equitable franchise. The reaction of 1851 introduced the monstrous three-class system which survives to the present day. That precedent has been literally followed in Russia, and doubtless the bureaucracy imagines that by the skilful manipulation of interests, class rule may prove as serviceable and permanent a method of autocracy as it appears to be in Prussia. The Octobrists seem destined by nature and accident to fill the part which the National Liberals play in Germany. Professing a timid faith in constitutionalism, their hands are tied and their action compromised by their acquiescence in the coup d'état of last June. They owe to the new electoral law their predominance in the Third Duma; while they profit by that arbitrary ukase they must tolerate the thesis that the Tsar is above all laws. A mixed party of officials, industrialists, and landlords, they will reap the reward of their loyalty in an economic policy based on their class interests. M. Stolypin is stamping out trade unionism. His land policy is creating a proletariat which will provide their factories with an inexhaustible supply of cheap labour. The old communal and family system of land tenure is being rapidly destroyed, and this, though we hear little of it in the West, is unquestionably the biggest constructive feature in M. Stolypin's policy. The lands of the nobility are being sold at extravagant prices through the State banks to village moneylenders and the more prosperous peasants. The communal lands are being broken up into private allotments held by an individual tenure. The migratory labourer and the factory worker, who had of old always one foot on mother earth, because he still retained his share in the common heritage, is being gradually disinherited. All this means the reconstruction of village society on an individualist basis, the destruction of the ideal of communal property which was the basis of the Revolutionary Socialist propaganda, and the creation of a class of peasant proprietors who may perhaps reinforce the Conservative upper class.

The defeat of the Liberal revolution means much more than a new lease of life to the old-world bureaucracy. It means the evolution in Russia, as in Germany, of a reactionary policy based on class interests. The model is slavishly copied. A world policy marches side by side with the social policy. Despite the deficit, expenditure increases both for the army and for the navy. Naval officers are beginning to preach the need of a great fleet with all the zeal of the German Flotten-Verein. Russia is visibly aspiring to renew her pretensions to be once more a Great Power in the European Concert, filling the place which her British and French understandings have held open for her. She even aims at consolidating the Slavonic world, as Prussia consolidated the Teutonic, and sees in the Balkans her natural outlet. The end of the revolutionary period means for her official optimists the inauguration of a magnificent future, haunted only by the spectres of bankruptcy and terrorism.

In one sense this calculation is probably not extravagant. The failure of the Cadets to give effect to the Viberg manifesto did, in fact, spell the Odern of the Liberal Reform Movement. The Cadets believed that the dissolution of the First Duma meant the beginning of a coup d'état which would be followed by a popular rising. A combination of circumstances put them in the wrong. M. Stolypin was, in fact, reserving his last card. He did not on this occasion tamper with the electoral law, and he promised betimes that a Second Duma should meet after an interval of governmental terrorism. The result was that the mass of the people saw no need to revolt. They had waited a century for freedom; they could afford to wait for six months more. The Social Democrats spoiled the idea of passive resistance by organising the foolish naval outbreaks at Cronstadt and Helsingfors, while the Social Revolutionaries started a furious campaign of terrorism. The Cadets launched their defiance and then lay low, imagining that a mere limit would induce the peasants to refuse to pay their taxes. Had they coupled that hint with a promise of land as well as liberty, and sent their emissaries to rouse the villages, it is just conceivable that they might have succeeded. But many of them went abroad; nearly all kept silence. They did enough to justify M. Stolypin in proscribing them as an "illegal party," but too little to retain their moral ascendancy as the leaders of a democratic revolution. Robbed by prosecutions of all their best men, reduced by Socialist successes to half their previous numbers, they never regained their original courage and impetus. They are to-day a party of compromise. The emergence for a moment into publicity of men like M. Petrunhevitch and Muromtseff, who still utter from the dock the words that used to ring from the tribune of the First Duma, only serves to remind us how much the party has lost in resolution, in clearness of vision, and in eloquence. Their batteries were ill-served at Viborg, and when, last year, the real crisis came with the alteration of the electoral law, it found them without gunners and without ammunition. While that law lasts, they cannot regain their lost position, and nothing but a movement outside Parliament can destroy that law.

The failure of the Liberal revolution has probably condemned Russia to years, it may be to decades, of repression and reaction. We shall often be reminded of Prussia. But there are essential differences. The Russian bureaucracy does not understand the meaning and use of safety valves, and the national temperament on both sides tends to extremes of violence unknown among Teutonic peoples. Above all, though the "intellectuals" and the middle classes, who have experienced the brunt of the repression, may be for the moment weary and discouraged, the immense mass of peasants and town-workers is too numerous to have suffered in the same individual way. Its sufferings are rather those of sheer hunger and economic exploitation, and every stage in the development of bureaucratic class-rule only makes it riper for some eventual revolution. The pioneers of the reform movement are prisoners in the enemy's tents. But the fighting ranks, filled with obscurer combatants, are being formed and marshalled in their rear.

PAPER FORTUNES AND MISFORTUNES.

READERS of a representative list of 387 stocks, possessing a nominal net value of £3,425,000,000, which appears in the "Bankers' Magazine," will be keen to note a depreciation within the last twelve months of about £342,000,000, or nearly nine per cent. This means that a person who invested £100 at the beginning of the year would find that if he had wished to realise his investment at the end he would only have had £91. Nine pounds in the hundred is the average loss. If he had invested in British Consols he would only have lost about £2; if in German Three Per Cents. his loss would have been £3. Had he put his money into English railways, his losses would have been comparatively small unless he had been unlucky enough to choose Brighton "A," or Metropolitan, or Metropolitan District, or the Tubes, in which anything from a third to a half of his capital might have gone off into thin air. Upon the whole it is certainly true that British securities have contributed less than an average to the tremendous international shrinkage in stock market values which this year has witnessed. The causes of that shrinkage are well known. The supply of interest-bearing paper has enormously increased, and there has been no corresponding increase of liquid or loanable capital. In fact, liquid capital, or "money," to use the fallacious language of City men, has been hard put to it for the ordinary work of business and commerce. The high prices of raw material and food have made the money and credit requirements of the world greater than ever, and it is really almost surprising that international capital could find all the money that had to be borrowed by Russia and Japan to carry on their war. If the two countries had not had the British and French markets to turn to, the war could hardly have lasted for six months.

Perhaps we have already said enough to show that the suggestion of the Protectionist Press that Socialism has caused the fall in British securities is nonsense. What they have to explain is why British funds, British railways, British industries, have fallen so much less than American, Canadian, Japanese, or German stocks. Let us take a few cases from the other side of the Atlantic. Suppose a millionaire had put £280,000 into the Union and Southern Pacific Railroads, two great favourites at the beginning of the year, his investment on the last day of the year would have been worth £198,000. So much for Mr. Harriman's achievement. Had our imaginary capitalist chosen the Erie, one of Mr. Pierpont Morgan's railroads, he might have put in £44,000 and drawn out £17,500. Mr. Carnegie's great steel combine, which was arranged by Mr. Morgan, would have yielded rather better results. But even there £490,000 invested at the beginning of the year in the Common Stock would have shrunk to less than £280,000 by the end of the year. Some equally tremendous losses have been incurred by English speculators in Canadian stocks. A month or two ago it was known in the City that certain newspaper magnates were throwing a good deal of this stuff overboard. Let us suppose that these gentlemen had put £280,000 into Grand Trunks at the beginning of last January, and had been compelled to realise on December 31st. They would have lost about £90,000. Hudson's Bay would have proved even more disastrous, and £60,000 would have been lopped off a similar sum sunk in Canadian Pacifics.

But the speculative investor was hit in every direction. If he avoided the American or Canadian snare he might have been quite as badly caught in mines—gold, silver, copper, tin, or lead. Rand Mines sank in the year from over 7 to under 6; Rio Tinto from 90 to 66; Broken Hill from 47 to 12½; Kalgurli from 12 to 8; and De Beers from 24 to 14. Rubber shares, motor shares, nitrate shares have all gone down, and many of the weaker companies have disappeared altogether.

We need not wonder, then, that the year has been an uneasy one for the great financiers, whose profits depend upon the promotion of companies, the floating of loans, and what is called the judicious "milking" of the investing public. In the United States, where the magnates have actually secured control of banks and trust companies in order to lend money to themselves for the purpose of inflating the prices of securities in which they were interested, it is not surprising that the public took alarm and that depositors began to prefer cellars to banks. There have been panics also in Japan and Genoa and Amsterdam and Egypt and Chili. But the world has never seen such an overwhelming collapse of credit and business as overtook the United States at the end of October. Suddenly unexampled prosperity was turned into dismal adversity. In one week the New York papers were boasting that trade had never been so good. In the next, employers in all parts of the country were at their wits' end to find cash to pay their workers. There was a universal suspension of banks. Tens of thousands who could find their passage money streamed back to Europe. Hundreds of thousands in the great cities are out of work and have to face winter with no prospect of employment. The shutting down of furnaces and factories in the States has caused a great falling off in the consumption of home and foreign goods; but gold has been withdrawn in enormous quantities from Europe, and the cash famine in New York has made money very dear in London and Berlin. Dear money invariably curtails trade, and we already see a general reaction in manufacturing activity. Happily, the home trade is still fairly good; but in view of the shortage in the world's crops, the high rate of taxes, and the high price of food, it would be folly to expect trade to be as good in the new year as it was in the old. The last revenue returns may serve as a warning. It will take a long time for the world to recover from the effects of public and private extravagance. The expenditure upon war and armaments and private luxuries has been so profligate that for a time legitimate enterprise must starve, and millions of honest workmen all the world over must pay for the folly of their governments and the roguery of their financial magnates. Let us hope that all classes, whether they are employers or employed, will realise in the coming year that there is something to be said, after all, for the virtue of honesty and the blessing of peace.

Life and Letters.

THE RECURRENCE OF DISEASE.

THAT all diseases will be slain by science, and all slain speedily, was one of the accepted anticipations of the earlier nineteenth century. In the great outburst of a triumphant optimism which inspired the early Victorian literature, the present, whose discontents were clearly diagnosed, was sharply contrasted with a future, where such discontents would be no more. Here on the solid ground a new race should arise, whose life, if limited, should be at least secure. Sorrow and sighing, those "two black birds of night"—at least as excited by loss and physical suffering—would "flee away." How far are those high hopes entertained to-day by an age introspective, wearied, a little disappointed at the slowness of human betterment? On one side, it may be confessed, there are evidences of a continued and almost exultant progress. We have eliminated from Europe the menace of those sweeping cyclones of pestilence, whose terrors brood like a grey cloud over all the brightness of the Middle Ages. Onethird of Christendom perished in the few months' agony of the Black Death. The sound of its lamentation, the madness caused by its apparently irresistible destruction, still remains revealed in those "Dances of Death" which absorbed the later medieval time, and in the literature of protest and despair of a similar age. The Plague still terribly ravages the East, but science has succeeded, and apparently will succeed, in protecting Europe against it. Other malignant fevers we seem on a fair road to stamp out altogether. Small-pox has almost disappeared, under the combined effects of sanitation and vaccination. Diphtheria has lost its terrors since the arrival of the anti-toxin treatment. Hydrophobia has become merely a dread memory of the past. Even Tuberculosis, the special and terrible scourge of the northern races, seems likely to become in the future but as an evil memory of old years. Science again, through the devotion and intelligence of a long roll of famous men, has boldly sallied out from the limited abode of men, into the wild and shaggy regions of Nature, in the determination to strike its enemy boldly at his very heart. It is not content with mere preventives and prophylactics, dosing men with drugs or covering them with veils and protections. It is setting itself to extirpate the very instruments of the propagation of the disease. Its enemy is the insect. That extraordinary populous and intelligent kingdom might have once attained the supremacy of the world; but for some inexplicable limitations in size which has prevented any of its denizens from challenging the forces of mankind. Michelet has described the kind of horror with which the head of an ant inspired him as first seen under the microscope; with its vast complicated eyes, its evidence of incalculable brain power, but with the utter absence of any of those elements akin to humanity which are revealed even in the vertebrate animals. Yet those ants can exhibit inexplicable powers of communication, and a social organisation which has been the envy of many a philosopher, as he contrasts with it the chaos of human life. Ants charged with Mr. Wells's "Boom food," ant communities of many thousands, all six feet high, might provide a considerable obstacle to the accepted supremacy of mankind. But the insect, however tiny, is becoming more and more to be recognised as one of the ultimate enemies of humanity. There is here no possibility of compromise. We can be sentimental over the cat, the dog, and the horse. If we are sentimental over the insect we are lost. "Why should I harm thee, little fly?" is Uncle Toby's famous inquiry. "Is there not room enough in the world for me and thee?" Science is unhesitatingly pronouncing a grim negative to the question. There is not sufficient room in the world for "me and thee." This is probably true of the common house fly, who more and more is coming to be regarded as a propagator of disease. It is already accepted of his cousin, the mosquito, against whom the whole of the world is turning with a set purpose of extermination. The alleged unhealthiness of marshes and tropical regions, formerly ascribed to heat and noxious vapours, is now declared to be entirely explicable by the spread of a definite bacterium through the bites of insects. Where the insects are destroyed the white men flourish. Panama, in the early days of the Canal building, was converted into a small hell, in which a population rioted and rotted and died, as they rioted and rotted and died in the days of the plague. The Americans to-day have descended there with all scientific resources. They burn the insect, they choke its offspring with oil, they drain the stagnant pools where it can breed, they consume it in clouds of evil-smelling smoke; they are rapidly making Panama a healthier place than New York and Chicago. All down the coast of South America yellow fever has decimated mankind for centuries. To-day it is well on its way to becoming a thing of the past. Six years ago an international campaign was inaugurated against the Stegomyia fasciata, the "white-ribbed mosquito," which spreads the disease. At Rio Janeiro Dr. Cruz, "Cruz the mosquito killer," has practically removed its menace. Repairing choked-up gutters, draining stagnant marshes, fumigating and isolating, scattering oil on the still waters, he is speedily and relentlessly, extinguishing this enemy of mankind. Yellow fever and malarias will become shortly things of the past, as the warfare, at present of necessity limited to the neighbourhood of the cities, is extended through all the waste places of the world.

And if the discussion passes from the prevention to the cure, here also the sanguine dream of our fathers might seem in process of realisation. We can treat the tortured human body as Brutus wished to treat the condemned Cæsar, "Carve it as a dish fit for the gods," and still preserve life and ensure recovery. First in antiseptic, then in aseptic surgery, we have discovered a method of safe operation, under which death would have been inevitable a few years ago. Gambetta perished in early manhood, because the doctors were afraid of an operation in which to-day over ninety per cent. of the patients recover. Opiates and anaesthetics, combined with the agile use of the knife, have eliminated on the one hand an almost inconceivable burden of pain, on the other have rendered possible a tearing and lacerating of the frail physical human body which would seem almost magical to our predecessors. Nor can any one imagine that we are anywhere but in infancy in this particular progress. If, as many eminent physiologists assert, the nerves of pain are distinct from the nerves of sensation or volition, there would seem no impossibility in the discovery of some subtle drug which will completely blockade these particular channels of communication, and render mankind henceforth completely immune from the pangs of physical agony.

But then thought turns to the other side of the picture; and is immediately confronted with a challenge to its optimism. As soon as one disease is eliminated, another steps into its place to continue the old tragic function of scourging mankind with piety and terror. Science is always discovering new maladies, which baffle its exultant energies. Medical, as distinct from surgical effort, is still largely in the condition of alchemy: stretching blind hands in the darkness towards a secret not yet revealed. A great man of science once recently asserted that there were only two medicines whose beneficial effect—in application to specific disorders—could be guaranteed—quinine and mercury; and that the operations of both of them were completely mysterious. We drain our cities, we use our knives and our medicines, we maintain armies of doctors, huge hospitals, and halls of research. And the result is that in the factory centres one-fifth of the children born perish within the year. Consumption, plague, malaria disappear. Their places are readily assumed by cancer, which is steadily increasing; by appendicitis, which had not even a name twenty years ago; by meningitis, which is excited by the ordinary harmless cold in the head. One woman in every twelve dies of cancer, and the cure—exultantly proclaimed year by year—still remains unknown. The human body in increase of prevention, seems also to lose the power of resistance. Carefully shielded from the rough forces of the world, it falls a prey to injuries born out of the very conditions of safety which it has so laboriously constructed. "He who has ordained all things in measure, number, and weight," said Mansel, "has also given to the reason of man, as to his life, its boundaries, which it cannot pass." Some unknown Power seems with these "boundaries" still to defy man's determination to push them back or fling them down. In ten thousand years mankind has not added a cubit to his stature. The Greek vision of bodily perfection has shown no advance in succeeding time. In the Middle Age, with its outward squalor and frequent pestilences—so operative in men's minds that to some observer the whole appears as a kind of physical delirium—there are figures of Popes and Emperors taking the field at eighty years of age, and an ineffable impression of an enormous physical vitality. It would appear that, at least as far as one can look ahead, uncertainty, sorrow, pain, and longing are still to be accepted as the normal companions of the life of men. From these, indeed, have been born men's highest achievements. Metchnikoff—that great sane optimist—still proclaims unfaltering faith in the triumph of human intelligence, and sees a vision of humanity sustained on a diet of soured milk, to well beyond a normally secure centenarianism. The cry of such might still be the cry of Tithonus—"Release me, and restore me to the ground"; a desire for the return to the fate of "happy men that have the power to die."

THE LIMITATION OF FRANCE.

THE figures that were published the other week lay bare one of the oldest and most anxious of the problems of France—her dwindling population. Dwindling is not quite the right word, because the population of France does not really decrease, nor does it remain stationary; it advances, but very slowly. It is only relatively that the French birthrate has lagged behind. The returns for 1906 show, it is true, a decided falling off from the average number of births during the past decade; but the statistics of a single year cannot in such a connection as this be allowed much weight. There have been other years in which the French population was apparently only maintained by the Swiss, Belgian, and Italian immigrants. But if one runs over the records of half a century, one sees that France adds to her population; but adds to it so meagrely that in a comparative and competitive world she seems to be standing still. In 1850, for instance, the populations of France and of Germany were practically the same. To-day France has 39,000,000, and Germany 62,000,000. In the past fifty years the population of France has increased by only four millions, and that of Germany by twenty-six millions. At the present moment, Germany seems to be generating more than thirty times as many units of manpower per annum as France. In another decade it is calculated that Germany will have twice as many conscripts as France. "Then she will begin to devour us," say the French alarmists, and the fear of being devoured lies near the root of their anxiety over the question of depopulation.

One of the obvious objections to Malthusianism is that it is rarely adopted by those who superficially seem to gain by small families. As a rule, those who ought not to have large families have them, and those who ought to, have them not. This is getting to be the case in England; it is pronouncedly the case in the United States; and even in France, where the restriction of population is almost a national purpose, the generalisation holds good. Where the Church is strongest, and her teachings most faithfully obeyed—in Brittany, for instance—there the birth-rate is highest. But practically it is only the poorest and most backward districts that are prepared to accept the clerical commands on these intimate points of secular conduct. The prosperous farmers of Normandy and Picardy, restrict themselves to at most two children, while in less well-to-do regions, such as Lozère and the Haute-Loire, the increase in population is continuous. In the industrial districts, and among the working classes, it is the poor who are the most prolific, in France, as elsewhere. So that, on the whole, one might say that in France prosperity and small families go hand in hand, and that it is really the devout poor in the country, and the non-saving poor in the towns, who are the mainstays of the French birth-rate.

The causes of "race suicide," as Mr. Roosevelt has called it, have probably in all countries the same economic origin. They may be complicated and intensified by local and special conditions, by the prevalence of disfiguring social ideals, and by the incalculable turns of religious emotion. But primarily people confine themselves to small families because to do otherwise is to become involved in a mass of anxieties and an assured loss of the comforts of life, such as they would prefer to avoid, both for their own and their children's sake. In France, this elementary reasoning is greatly reinforced by the dowry system, and by the law of equal testamentary division of property. Napoleon borrowed the idea of this enactment, as he borrowed much else, from Montesquieu; and nothing that he accomplished has left a deeper or more abiding impress on the social life of the French people. It has been one of the prime causes of that vast diffusion of wealth which must for ever make the word ruin inapplicable to France. It has helped to turn France into a nation of small-holders. It has promoted stability and content; it has checked the ravages which a submerged tenth creates in the well-being of a community; it has prevented the growth of latifundia. Indirectly, by making most Frenchmen capitalists or property owners, to some extent, it has also made them unambitious, apt to seek a career in the safe and unexciting service of the State, apt in consequence to applaud the creation of posts and offices at the expense of the taxpayers. Again, it has given birth to a peculiarly territorial form of patriotism, a passion for the actual soil of France—such a sentiment as is only engendered when a large proportion of the people are able to measure their stake in the country in tangible acres, roods, and perches. And as a result of this France is made so comfortable, placid, and pleasant a place to live in, there are so many ties binding the citizen down to his share in the national heritage, that the idea of bettering himself by emigration hardly occurs to the average Frenchman, and even a temporary exile becomes a form of torture. If the French do not colonise, it is because there is so much ready money in France.

But the most direct effect of the law of morcellement is to be seen in the necessity it entails of limiting the population. After several generations of constant dividing and parcelling out of estates, whatever their dimensions, the peasants, if they would hand down more than a square yard of land, are forced to renounce all hope of large families. There comes a time when even the largest estate may be so subdivided as to afford adequate support to no one. The thrifty, prudent farmer has therefore no option but to limit the number of his offspring. This has now become a habit, and has encouraged the idea that the land is incapable of supporting even those who already dwell on it. Thus a new impulse is given to the migration of rustics to the towns; and as life in the streets is soon discovered to be no easier than life in the fields, the refugee peasants, according to Mr. Bodley, carry out and spread abroad the doctrines which they believe to be the salvation of the countryside, and hope to see eventually adopted as the remedy for all social ills. Then, again, there is the dowry system, which hovers over every French cradle like a disenchanting ghost. In all countries an extra child means extra expense; in France, it means an extra fortune, and that is a very powerful reason why the French have few children. "The social conventions," says M. Demolins, "make their task an impossibility; and then, not being able to destroy the conventions, they destroy the race."

Malthus lived before conscription, before agriculture became scientific, before the laws of heredity were more than guessed at. How far have the conditions of to-day and the discoveries of the past century sustained or modified his propositions? Is the example which France presents to be regarded as a reach forward to a better dispensation or as a sign of yielding in the fight for international existence? There are probably few questions more bemused with spurious saws than this of population—which should be, and one day will be, the first care of statesmanship. We know at present very little about it, and though the best thought of the world is coming more and more to regard it as the fundamental issue, and though the tendency to surround marriage with more stringent safeguards in the interests of the common stock of health will almost certainly increase, it is questionable whether the data yet exists for anything that could be called a population policy. There are no ad hoc remedies either for "race suicide" or for the rapid and reckless "multiplication of the unfit." France has trifled with many "solutions" of her special case—taxing bachelors, exempting the father of a certain number of children from all imposts, investing him with votes in proportion to the size of his family, employing none but married men and women in the service of the State, and such-like devices. Nothing has come of them. They beat in vain against the impregnable compactness of the French family, which is patriarchal in spirit if not in numbers, and against the ingrained instinct of thrift. France continues to cut her coat according to her cloth, to regulate her population by her resources and her well-worn social arrangements. She remains the supremely civilised, prosperous, provident, and strictly limited country that we know.

FRIENDSHIP.

ONE of the defects of our present order is the chasm it often creates between society and friendship—two things that should quicken and reinforce each other. The ideal society is the communion of people who are mutually delightful and inspiring, people who refresh each other, who have enough in common to make giving and taking possible, but not so much as to make it superfluous; people who subdivide naturally into smaller groups of friends.

Unluckily, what is called society, though adopting lines of classification that are all very well in their way but have no relation to our spiritual and mental needs, often hampers, rather than promotes, friendship. Men and women still choose their associates too exclusively from those of the same rank, the same income, those who have passed through the same University curriculum, or subscribed to the same number of Articles; and it means that the people who are drawn together are very often the last people to make good one another's deficiencies. You can see the results in a deterioration, both spiritual and mental, that corresponds to the result of continual intermarriage on the physical plane. We ignore the potent factor of cross-fertilisation.

This is only to say that we form our companionships, as we do our lives, not after the pattern showed us in the Mount, but after the blind, incongruous suggestions of the Valley. It is a blunder. If there is any wealth the soul bears with it when it leaves the body, surely such wealth includes the memory of our ideal friendships, the friendships that were life to us. They are too good to be sacrificed to any convention, to any social, or pecuniary or theological difference. "'Tis a hard matter for friends to meet," says Elia, "but mountains may be removed by earthquakes, and re-encounter."

You may do without friendship, perhaps, in the heyday of prosperity, whether it be worldly or otherworldly. Acquaintances may serve your turn. But it is another matter when things go ill with you. Perhaps moments come to most people of such utter discouragement, such disillusionment in themselves, that if they were not surety for more than their own souls, they would curse God and die. And many a hard-pressed fighter has been saved from desertion because there was someone to whom he could say in his heart, "I am worsted spiritually and morally, and I have no strength left to fight for my own hand. Yet I must strike one more blow for the sake of the man you believed in."

In other words, that sense of responsibility to something not ourselves, a feeling that holds when all that we have called ourselves seems utterly past redemption, is at the root, not only of what is technically called religion, but of all the other great things. We can acquiesce in the thought of our own folly less readily than in the thought that our friends have been fools.

Your claim is a sorry claim. You have never found a nugget in it, and you are convinced you never will. Yet, because others have a stake in it, you must go on washing out the scanty gold-dust from the immeasurable sand, till the day's work is done. You see your own reflection in the mirror of self-knowledge, and it is an ugly sight. You would often like to do away with the reflection, and the mirror, and the person reflected as well. But—you who feel this most acutely—look, in the portrait-gallery of your friend, at the picture that bears your name. You have dreamed of yourself with that aspect, and it has only been a dream. It is more than a dream to him; he has painted it on the one kind of canvas that is indestructible, and he calls it the real you. Probably, he has a shrewd inkling that you do not always resemble it, but that, to him, is but another reason for guarding it with reverence, so that if you should ever want to know what you are eternally like, there may be a picture to tell you. Nor does he greatly care how many snap-shots people take of you, grouped with the world, or the flesh, or the devil, whichever, at the moment, you honour with your allegiance. He knows that the only authentic portrait is the portrait that hangs on his wall.

An enduring friendship requires the greatest output of individuality, and the least of egotism; and it bars out a number of things. One form of egotism which it bars out may be called a thirst for recognition in detail, which leads to continual explanations, questionings, probings of our own hearts and the hearts of other people. We want, not only recognition along broad lines, in round sums, but the recurring decimals of recognition. Probably even the most sincere of us crave for it more in respect of our goodness, than in respect of our evil. It is more marked in women than in men; but in a certain type of man it is quite marked enough. And it may be accompanied by a trust, not only to be recognised, but to recognise in detail, which makes it still worse.

It is ruinous for more than one reason. In so far as it can reach them, it destroys atmosphere, and mystery; and gives, instead, a sense of garishness, or of the dissecting room. It robs the soul of its shadowy background. There are people who are perpetually dragging the background into the front of the picture, with innumerable journeys, with infinite toil and travail. And when they have completely obliterated the meaning of the picture, they think they have accomplished a notable deed. So they have; they have wrecked a friendship.

There should be something illimitable about friendship, something instinct with all the mystery of life and death, something that, much as it gives, suggests far more—not only a comforting hostel in time, but windy spaces, and an outlook on eternity. These blunder, who desire to see the souls of their friends mapped out, or try to map out their own souls for the benefit of their friends. In most souls there are jungle growths, which the closest friends should not seek to penetrate, although they may be well aware of their existence; and there are mounts of vision that each must climb—alone with God and memory. There are hours in which only the memory of us can commune for us, with our friends; but they are the hours in which friendship shakes off the fear of death. Why crowd them out by visibilities and tangibilities, by a too curious scrutiny, by any passion for spiritual or emotional statistics? God gave to friendship the glamour and the wonder of an unexplored country. It is our own fault if they ever fade.

Another thing that spoils friendship is a continual demand for the small coin of affection and sympathy. Some people do not understand gold and bank notes. They must have trivial observances and demonstrations and soft words, the pence and farthings of friendship. Of course, there is an opposite error of persons who so despise copper that they will give nothing but gold. That is wrong: even among friends there are occasions that demand a threepenny-bit, with the knowledge of gold behind it. Yet, as a rule, the less small change the better, especially in a world where bright farthings look like sovereigns.

Or again, you find people who are less hungry than greedy, complaining bitterly that their friends have given them stones for bread—and when you look at the stones, you see priceless diamonds. Such people are always being wounded in the house of their friends, whether they hide their wounds like histrionic Spartans, or bandage them for the world to see. The mistake is to be wounded at all. A friend should have such a panoply of faith in his friend—a faith that is not credulity, but loving wisdom, as to be practically invulnerable. And till we wear this panoply, we may be martyrs, but not friends.

Such martyrdoms are always occurring when people lay too much stress on the emotional side of friendship, when they regard it primarily as a vehicle of joy. That always ends in it becoming a vehicle of pain. It is one offshoot of the self-considering instinct which leads us to love our friend's relationship to ourselves too well, and his relationship to God and man too little. We value the narrow isthmus of affection and sympathy that unites his soul to ours more than his soul itself, which is a whole country. If we could, we would make it all isthmus—and we are apt to be jealous of countries on the opposite borders. But when you touch a friend's spirit, you touch something free, universal as the atmosphere, something that to capture is to vitiate and spoil—something that no one can wish to possess. We often think that we are walling in some spiritual possession, when we are really walling it out, and hermetically sealing a vacuum. We ask for stability and constancy in human beings; but we forget that constancy is the child of freedom. There is a certain constancy about a frozen stream; but the constancy we need in friendship is one of life, not death—the constancy of the flowing current that the whole world renews.

Questions of emotional profit and loss should not arise in friendship. It is an artist's affair to paint the best picture he can, to realise his ideal to the utmost, without considering the price. Otherwise, he will paint pot boilers. This is not to say that it may never be a man's business or duty to paint pot boilers. But it is clearly not the artist's business. So, when a person is trying to realise an ideal of friendship, he must not be always wondering how much pleasure, or relaxation, or even support, he is likely to get out of it—or the result will not be a friendship. It will be an emotional pot boiler. There are too many of these, and whether they sell or don't sell, there is nothing immortal about them. And as for people who try to build a friendship out of feeling—they might as well try to build a house out of foam.

Friendship is not the communion of a few select souls in an ark, an ark æsthetically sound, and warranted to glide through seething torrents, unsubmerged. Rather, it is the comradeship of men in a lifeboat, fighting hard against loss and death, not for themselves, for others, holding their lives in their hands. Distrust all heavens of light, and happiness, and sweetness, that take no cognizance of the dark night, and human sin and agony, that wage no warfare with hell. Heaven must either destroy hell, or become hell. And if it does not do the first, it will very soon be the second.

A PORTUGUESE MONASTERY.

EVEN were it not linked for all time with the sad story of Ignez de Castro, the church and monastery of Alcobaca would still be one of the sights in Portugal which no self-respecting tourist may afford to miss. Unfortunately for the mere birds of passage who touch at Lisbon one day and steam away the next, Alcobaca is not so handy as Cintra. They all make for Cintra, whose attractions of two or three kinds are undeniable. It is a frequented and lovely spot for lotus-eating and loud admiration, with plenty of associations, bright and poetic in the main, and one or two of the best hotels in the country. Alcobaca is altogether different. It lies almost mouldering in a hole about seventy-five miles north of Cintra, several miles from a railway station, and although one may be stimulated by the vision of Affonso Henriques, first King of Portugal, himself breaking the sod for the abbey's foundation in 1148, and much diverted by the records of the establishment's magnificence in its prime and onwards, a veil of melancholy now shrouds it. Its 999 monks are gone, and their home is a barrack and stable for cavalry. One thinks of the Black Death, which in 1355 swept through the dormitories of these Cistercians until only eight remained alive. One thinks also of that torch-light procession from Coimbra far north, in 1361, when, with bent head and grim revengeful brows, Dom Pedro, "the Severe," followed the disinterred body of his beloved Ignez through long leagues of pine forest, up and down hills, to the tomb here prepared for her—a tomb one would call incomparable if his own were not alongside to vie with it in sculptured glory. On the heels of such suggestion it seems childish to mention the relative indifference of Alcobaca's inn. This is not nearly up to Cintra's level. Its bran pillows scarcely yield to the most leaden head, and though, thanks to the cultivated appetites of the cavalry officers who mess in it, the fare is good, it is uphill work for a stranger to mix freely with fellow guests to whom the place has become a sort of private club.

Like most such buildings of national importance, this of Alcobaca was a thankoffering to Heaven for victory in war. Portugal was only in the making in the twelfth century. The Moors had still to be turned out of Lisbon. Previous to this, Santarem was besieged, escalated and taken by the king in person, and in joy of his triumph, Affonso wrote to St. Bernard for a few of his own monks, and founded this enormous home for them and their successors. Seventy years were devoted to its erection. The history of its origin and construction is charmingly portrayed in its fine Sala dos Reyes; a series of large blue-and-white tile panellings, very suitable for the hot Portuguese summer. One may go to the Saracen records for enlightening details about the king's prowess. This "Enemy of God"—as Ibn-Sahibi-s-salat terms him, was ever the first up the ladders and into the Moorish citadels; the first to seize a sleeping sentinel by the throat; and the first to shout "Santiago!" when the onslaught was ready.

For another hundred years Portugal thus enlarged itself by the sword as a Christian kingdom, contemporaneously with the growth of Alcobaca's noble church. The cloisters followed—as rich in detail as the church is simple. Affonso the Second and Third, with their queens, were buried here. Then came that troop of thousands of torch-bearers down the hill from Aljubarrota, and the burial of Ignez in the little chapel, to which a wheezing sacristan will at once lead the appreciated stranger. Ignez's lord died next, and lies adjacent to her. Recovering itself after the pestilence, the monastery now enjoyed centuries of importance and usefulness under its mitred abbot, with no cessation of its church offices night or day. Then, little by little, the religious spirit fell away from the great house. Instead of self-denying friends of the poor, the monks became splendid voluptuaries. Beckford's description of their kitchen in 1794 must be given in his own words:—"Through the centre of the immense and noble groined hall, not less than sixty feet in diameter, ran a brisk rivulet of the clearest water, containing every sort and size of the finest river fish. On one side loads of game and venison were heaped up; on the other vegetables and fruits in endless variety. Beyond a long line of stores extended a row of ovens, and close to them hillocks of wheaten flour, whiter than snow, rocks of sugar, jars of the purest oil, and pastry in vast abundance, which a numerous tribe of lay brothers and their attendants were rolling out and puffing up into a hundred different shapes, singing all the while as blithely as larks in a cornfield." A delightful picture, if one can forget the original pious purpose of this brigade of cooks. But in a few years more the French came, and only the mocking shadow of Alcobaça's impressive past was left to it. When, in 1810, the British Army appeared, those of the monks who had not run away, waited on the officers in the palatial apartments, and gave them the keys of the place, with an invitation to help themselves to anything they fancied. The French and the English seemed to them the devil and the deep sea, and they preferred to be raided by the friends of their own country. Whatever our faults in Portugal, we did not disturb poor Ignez in her majestic tomb. The French were ruthless. They dragged her out by her long hair, carried off tresses of it, and knocked out her teeth as further mementoes. The tale of their occupation of the monastery is, otherwise also, of the usual kind. One more glimpse of them, and we have done with these degenerate Cistercians. After the restoration of order in Portugal, the establishment tried to pull itself together. But though still good to the poor, the reassembled monks could not recover their earlier excellence in morals. When Miss Pardoe visited them in 1833, she found a company of extremely gallant and hospitable old and young gentlemen, and nothing better. They put a rabbit and a weasel on the floor for her pleasure, and suggested that she should indulge them with a "pas seul" in the church for their pleasure. A little later the State suppressed them and appropriated their remaining treasures, and thus ignobly there was an end to the Cistercians of Alcobaça.

There is much to see in their disestablished and transformed home. A church of the purest twelfth-century architecture, as grand internally as any of its period in Europe; well preserved, but tapestried with cobwebs. Exquisite Gothic cloisters, much mutilated, but still indescribably beautiful. The stately kitchen which made Beckford's mouth water, the stripped library, once as remarkable for its elegance as that of the Escorial itself still is, and a few other rooms protected from military occupation. But, best of all, are the tombs of Ignez and her princely lover. They stand foot to foot, so that on the resurrection day Dom Pedro and Ignez may come face to face at the moment of their uprising. Lions support the King's effigy, and angels that of Ignez; and hours may be spent examining the other details of these marvellous specimens of fourteenth-century stonework. The mildewed nakedness of the neglected church is no insult to them. One looks and remembers the red story of their lives and outraged bodies, and realises that it were a mockery indeed to surround them with decorative splendours. And, by and by, when, a thousand miles away, one recalls Alcobaça, these two tombs stand forth in the memory as its most precious part.

Short Story.

FAME.

"Not guilty," said the foreman of the jury. "I 'eaved a sigh of relief for it was my pal Bill as was being tried for murdering a mate of 'is called Alf 'Awkins. The trial 'ad lasted four days and was the talk of the town. The Prime Minister, who was abroad for 'is 'ealth, was lucky if 'is bullytins got a blessed line in the papers, for every column was about Bill. Duchesses, dramatists, and dustmen, like meself, fought 'ard for places in Court. K.C.'s 'ad been at it daily 'ammer and tongs, and more than once things 'ad looked uncommon black for the neck of my pal Bill. 'Awkins, yer see, 'ad been found shot dead in 'is own little 'ouse with a revolver that was Bill's, and when nabbed and searched Bill 'ad on 'im more money than 'e could account for, not to mention a few knick-knacks that 'ad belonged to 'is pal. A witness swore the dead man 'ad told 'im Bill meant to murder 'im, and Bill was obstinate and wouldn't give no account of 'is whereabouts on the night the job was done, but only kept on saying as 'ow "Alf 'Awkins was 'is best pal, and 'e 'ad never done 'im no 'arm in 'is life."

"All's well as ends well," and though I never could 'ave believed as 'ow Bill could a done a cold-blooded murder, I was just that glad to 'ear the Beak say the evidence were inconclusive, and the Jury acquit 'im.

Then for the next few weeks Bill 'ad a mighty fine time. Interviews in the daily papers, the story of 'is life in a weekly (and didn't them Editors pay—better than Limericks), 'is portrait on the sinnymattegraph, not to mention a enterprising Music 'All Syndikit, finding 'as Bill 'ad a good voice and a fair notion of singing, billed 'im large in "Excerps from the Sacred Oratorio's" for three 'Alls, each doing two 'ouses nightly.

Two 'underd quid a week for a matter of a month 'e got, and the Syndikit apologised for not making it more, explaining as Bill 'ad only been tried for murdering a man, and their clientail preferred a case with a woman in it.

Bill took it all very quiet and a bit mysterious like: 'owever at the end of a month 'e found 'imself with a matter of fifteen 'underd quid in a Bank. Then 'e took an' bought the "Blue Dragon" with 'is 'ard-earned wealth, and the 'ouse soon did a roaring trade, for Bill was a 'ero, my word!

One afternoon, a drizzly sort o' day, I dropped into the "Blue Dragon" meself to pay my respects to Bill, and wish 'im luck in 'is new venture.

Though the bars was crowded and beer and gin a-flyin' round, Bill looked down in the mouth, but seemed to cheer up a bit when 'e saw me, and asked me to step inside the bar parlour. 'Aving shut the door 'e offered me a seat and a drop o' gin. I asked 'im 'ow 'e was feeling, and 'is answer give me a rare start. "D'you know," sez 'e, "I'd give this pub an' all to 'ave a clear conscience, and old Alf 'Awkins alive again."

I suppose me thoughts showed in me face, for 'e sez quick, "Don't be a fool, I didn't murder 'im, but there's more be'ind than Scotland Yard knows on. Look 'ere, I must tell someone; can I trust yer not to split?"

"'Ave yer a 'oly Bible?" I inquired, but 'e took me 'and an' sez, "Fair does it, that's good enough for me."

Then 'e began in a far-off sort o' voice, "You remember old Alf 'Awkins," 'e sez, "'e 'ad a lot o' trouble afore 'e died; lost 'is wife, lost 'is child, lost the use of 'is right 'and, and would 'a lost 'is job but—Death took 'im." "Death took 'im," Bill repeated in a voice so strange that the cold shivers ran down me back. Without saying of another word 'e put 'is left 'and in 'is breast pocket and 'anded me a letter, which I recognised as the writing of the departed Alf.

"Dear Bill" (it ran),

"I've 'ad more than my share o' trouble and life don't seem worth nothing without my old woman and the little kid, and I've made up my mind to end it. First I intended just to make a hole in the water, but then I thought of you, as had always been a true-blue pal, and I thinks out a better way. So I took the liberty of borrowing your pop-gun when I came to see you to-night, and I put all my money and a few odds and ends of mine into your pocket, and I told old Stumpy, as lives next door, as you'd swore to kill me. I'll just post this letter to you, and then come back and finish it all, but I'll take care to shoot myself so it don't look like a suicide, and if you play the game, gets arrested and have a exciting trial, what with the newspapers, and the Music Halls, you ought easy to make a tidy bit out of my death.

" 'It's an ill-wind,' and good luck to you, mate,

" Yours now and always,

" ALF HAWKINS.

" P.S.—If things go nasty at the trial, this letter and a alibi will easy save your neck."

" There ain't many pals like Alf," sez Bill, laconic-like, as I 'anded back the letter. He 'elped 'imself to another drop o' gin, and sez, apologetic, for there was tears in 'is eyes, " I ain't got over 'is death yet."

WALTER HERBAGE.

Poetry.

THE TRANCE.

LORD GOD, I saw Thee then; one mind, last night,
Met Thee upon Thy ways.

I was upon a hill, alone;

My drudgèd sense was aching in amaze:

Into my thought had too much gone

The inconceivable room of the blue night,—

The blue that seems so near to be

Appearance of divinity,—

And the continual stars.

I was afraid at so much permanence,

And was in trouble with vastness and fixt law.

All round about I saw

The law's unalterable fence;

And like a forgery of shining bars

The stresses of the suns were there,

Keeping, in vastness prisoner,

My thought caged from infinity.

And then, suddenly,—

While perhaps twice my heart was dutiful

To send my blood upon its little race,—

I was exalted above surety

And out of time did fall.

As from a slander that did long distress,

A sudden justice vindicated me

From the customary wrong of Great and Small.

I stood outside the burning rims of place,

Outside that corner, consciousness.

Then was I not in the midst of Thee,

Lord God?

A momentary gust

Of power, a swift dismay

Putting the infinite silence to disarray,

A thing like anger or a mighty lust,

A zeal immeasurably sent—

So Law came and went,

And smote into a bright astonishment

Of stars the season of eternity,

And grazed the darkness into glowing lanes.

Swiftly that errand of God's vehemence,

The passion which was Law slid by,

Carrying surge of creatures, fiery manes

Of matter and the worldly foam

And riddles of confused flame;

So the law's kindled shaking came

A moment, and went utterly.

And seemed to be no more

Than if through the eternal corridor

Of emptiness a sob did roam,

Or a cry out of a fearful ecstasy.

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

Letters from Abroad.

THE LAND QUESTION IN GERMAN TOWNS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—At the time when the present German Empire was founded—1871—there lived of its population 64 per cent. in rural places and 36 per cent. in towns of more than 2,000 inhabitants. In 1905, i.e., only thirty-four years later, the proportion of people living in rural places had fallen to 42·58 per cent., whilst that of people living in towns had risen to 57·42 per cent. The whole increase of the population of the empire is represented by the growth of the towns in number and size. The rural population was 26·2 millions in 1870, and is to-day 25·8 millions, whilst the town population has grown from 14·8 millions to 34·8 millions.

Of this increase the towns of over 100,000 inhabitants have had the largest share. They were 8 in 1870, and 41 in 1905, their population not quite two millions in the former, and eleven millions and a-half in the latter year. Then follow the medium towns, comprising from 20,000 to 100,000 inhabitants. Their number increased from 75 to 208, their population from 3·1 to 7·8 millions. The small towns (5,000 to 20,000 inhabitants) were 529 with 4·6 millions in 1870, and 945 with 8·3 millions in 1905; the country or rural towns (2,000 to 5,000 inhabitants) 1,716 with 5 millions in 1870, and 2,386 with 7·2 millions in 1905.

To the expert reader these figures suggest that in the big and medium towns at least there must be something of a land question. He will be fortified in this presumption if he learns that the speed of their growth has until quite recently increased from quinquennium to quinquennium. It was comparatively slow in the first two lustra of the Empire, but since then it has become quicker and quicker, as a few more figures may illustrate:—

		Population of	Population of big towns.	medium towns.
1870	...	1,948,537	3,147,272
1880	...	3,273,144	4,027,085
1900	...	9,120,280	7,111,447
1905	...	11,509,004	7,816,360

At the foundation of the Empire, not quite the twentieth part of its population lived in big towns, in 1880 it was about the fourteenth part; but in 1905, almost the fifth part of the population was herded in places of more than 100,000 inhabitants.

This sudden growth found the authorities in town and State in many respects very little prepared for the tasks it involved. Of building laws and by-laws there were a good many, and some of them good enough, as far as they go, or as the particular purpose the aimed at was concerned. But of a housing policy there was almost nothing; all and everything in regard to the supply of houses and dwellings was left to the speculative builder. Recently, I have seen in an English paper much praise of the German system of mapping out whole plans of town enlargement before any permits of building in the respective districts are granted. Systematic laying out of street, &c., plans has surely its advantages. But before imitating the German example, people would do well to get information on all the features and effects of the system. For until now it has been practised in Germany in a way that has made it one of the most powerful agencies of raising the price of building lands to quite usurious levels. As one of the best-known writers on housing reform in Germany, Dr. Karl von Mangoldt, the General Secretary of the German Society for Housing Reform, puts it in a book just published: "Germany is, indeed, a very orderly country, but she is also a country with a want of liberty, under the rule of the police, a country which has to pay dearly for her orderliness."

The work in question has the title "Die Städtische Bodenfrage" (Goettingen: Vandenhoeck und Ruprecht), and offers all the features an Englishman would expect from a German book: comprehensiveness, depth of investigation, effusiveness in regard to theory, and a certain diffusiveness in argumentation and exemplification. The result of many years' painstaking, the book may be regarded as a standard work on its subject, the land question of the German towns. It fully justifies its sub-title: "facts, causes, and remedies." It is crammed with facts, but they could have been presented in a more lucid arrangement.

There exists for the named period no exact compilation of the rise of the ground values of the German towns in their total. But from the statistics of the individual towns an estimation of the whole amount can be arrived at. In regard to Berlin it has been ascertained that the increase of the value of land on which houses are built has been from 530 millions of marks in 1870 to 2,118 millions of marks in 1898. This comprises only the old precincts of the town. In the suburbs where in 1870 the land in most cases had only an agricultural or, at best, a garden value, the rise was much larger. The late Dr. Paul Voigt, a much appreciated economist, has calculated that alone in the twelve years from 1887 to 1898 the ground value of the suburbs of Berlin had a rise of not less than a round milliard of marks. In the suburban town of Charlottenburg each newcomer has in the decade 1887-1897 increased the ground value of the town by 2,500 marks, the family of six heads by 15,000 marks, and this increase continues. In Schöneberg, another suburban town of Berlin, the ground value rose in the eight years from 1895 to 1903 by 231 millions of marks, i.e., by about 30 millions per year. These are western suburbs, but in the eastern suburbs the rise has been no less remarkable. In Rummelsburg, part of Berlin, the value of an estate of 24 acres rose from the eve of the Franco-German war to 1,901, more than twenty times. In Britz, another eastern suburb, and like Rummelsburg mainly inhabited by working-men, an estate was sold at twenty-five times its former value when a station of a suburban railway was erected there. The owner, a farmer, got 1,300,000 marks paid in cash for what a few years before he could not sell at 50,000 marks.

True, an equal rise has not taken place everywhere. Berlin, with her surroundings, is to a certain degree an exception. But considerable increases are reported from everywhere in Germany—from large towns, from medium towns, and even from the small towns. Towns of the size of Breslau, Dresden, Frankfurt, Leipzig, &c.—i.e., of several hundred thousand inhabitants—show increases up to ten times the original site value; towns like Freiburg, Giessen, Halle—i.e., with less than 100,000 inhabitants—can point to increases of three and four times the former price; and even in a State like the Duchy of Oldenburg, with only small towns, the price of building sites in towns has in twenty years almost trebled. In 1869-73 the hectare was paid 852 marks; in 1889-1893 it brought 2,224 marks in the average. On the ground of all this, Professor Schmoller estimates that the increase of ground values of all the German towns together exceeds the increase of those of Berlin and her suburbs by considerably more than twice the amount. The fortunes made since 1870 by the increases of site values in towns exceed in their total six milliards, and may even be put at eight milliards. And three-fourths at least of these were the spoils of idle property taken from the combined labour of the nation.

Such spoils of property, or whatever you may call it, are to be found everywhere. So far as the principle goes, Germany is no exception to the rule. But it appears that the rise of ground values is in Germany, on the whole, greater than in many other countries; and Dr. von Mangoldt shows that in the eastern part of the Empire, particularly the old Prussian provinces, the rise is greater than in the western and southern parts.

Now, it is in the eastern parts of Germany that the big tenement or block building, the Mietskaserne (rent-bearing barracks) flourishes. The five and more storeyed tenement house has found its admirers and passionate defenders; and economists have tried to prove that, far from increasing the rents of dwellings, it actually lowered them. They insisted that if undeniably the block dwelling raises the price of the building site, it was still true that each new floor reduced the share per dwelling so much that in the end less ground rent was paid in the rent of the individual dwelling than in the rent of the corresponding small one-family house. As the tendency to erect block dwellings has also gained ground in England, it may be of interest to know that this theory, so seducingly obvious at first sight, had to be given up. Even its most fervent advocate, Professor Andreas Voigt, is, in his book, "Kleinhaus und Mietskaserne," compelled to deny ever having said that the Mietskaserne—the block dwelling—has led to a reduction of rents. It only reduces the rent-raising effect of rising ground values. This means, as a matter of fact, that the block dwelling facilitates and generalises the rising of ground values.

Those who doubt it and are ignorant of its consequences may well read the chapters on town enlargement in Dr. Mangoldt's book. They will see how it is impossible to have cheap small houses even in the surroundings of those towns where the blockdwelling prevails. The traveller who comes to Berlin can already see, twenty miles outside of the town, high blockhouses, so to speak, in the open field. Ground rents are so high that it does not pay to build small houses unless it be expensive villas for very wealthy people. The block dwelling dictates the price, and, as if this did not suffice, the authorities do their very best to make cheap building almost an impossibility.

This they do by their thoughtfully worked-out plans for new quarters. If you see these plans on paper you will probably be delighted in finding how wide the streets must be and how squares and everything to secure air and light are provided. The regulations will tell you that nobody is permitted to start building unless the street is constructed from the corner where it is connected with another of the laid-out streets to the next corner on the map, that the new houses must be wholly separated from the agricultural land around. All and everything is wisely premeditated. So many charges are laid upon the shoulders of the daring entrepreneur, and starting new streets becomes such an expensive affair, that the builder is compelled to erect high blockhouses on the sites left. It is the opinion of almost all the economists who have studied the question that—contrary to popular conception—as a rule it is not the speculative dealers or companies to whom the high price of building sites is mainly due, but the bureaucratic spirit of the authorities on the one side and the greed and obstinacy of the original owners, the freeholding farmers, on the other. The farmer near the growing town can, in most cases, wait much longer than the speculator before he condescends to sell. The site dealer and the land company have to meet so many charges that, as a rule, they are driven to re-sell or build themselves as quickly as possible; the farmer finds many ways to lie down, like the dog in the manger, and wait his time, even when his farm is taxed on its site value.

Consequently a more or less wide border surrounds the town where sites are exceedingly dear, and this explains the fact that high block building starts mostly not in the centre of the towns, where it would appear most natural, but in the outskirts where open land seems to abound.

This is the feature of all the great towns where the block dwelling obtains and the town is in the hands of the propertied classes. This is the case in Prussia, where the communal franchise reserves two-thirds of the town representatives to the wealthier classes, and prescribes besides that one-half of the representatives must be house-owners. As the house-owner is here also the ground landlord, it is quite obvious that drastic measures, such as are wanted to fight the evil, cannot be expected from them.

We may get the best laws, and the laws introduced by the late State Minister, Dr. Miguel, are comparatively good, but they will in their most important sections either remain dead letters or be applied in a half-hearted fashion, which produces no real improvement. Thus Dr. von Mangoldt, though a middle-class reformer throughout, puts as the first condition of an effective reform of a state of things where 30 to 40 per cent. of the rent of dwellings is ground rent, the right of compulsory expropriation and a democratic reform of the town franchise.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

THE total number of books published during 1907, according to the useful summary issued by "The Publishers' Circular," amounted to 9,914, or 1,311 more than in 1906. Of these, new editions and reprints account for 2,213, leaving a total of 7,701 entirely new issues. There is a slight decrease in fiction, only 1,862 new novels having been published—an average of five for every day including Sundays. Religion and Philosophy increased by 213, Law by 145, History and Biography by 232, and Poetry by 69, while a large increase is noted under the heading Arts and Sciences. Those who are appalled by the sight of these figures may console themselves with the thought that a large percentage come under Charles Lamb's classification of "books which are no books—biblia à-biblia," and that from the point of view of statistics every pamphlet, no matter how small, is given the dignity of a book.

* *

THE next volume in the "English Men of Letters" Series will be a life of James Thomson, by Mr. G. C. Macaulay. It will be interesting to see whether the book will revive interest in a poet who is now little read, although his descriptions of nature are usually considered to have opened a new era in English literature. Hazlitt called him "the best of our descriptive poets," and Dr. Johnson, when writing on him, in "The Lives of the Poets," overcame two of his greatest prejudices—against blank verse and against the Scottish people—and praised him warmly. Lord Lyttelton's famous eulogy that Thomson's works contained

"No line which, dying, he could wish to blot" is to be found in the prologue to "Coriolanus," a tragedy which was produced after Thomson's death for the benefit of his family. Coleridge, too, thought highly of Thomson. "The love of nature," he says, "seems to have led Thomson to a cheerful religion; and a gloomy religion led Cowper to a love of nature. The one would carry his fellow-men along with him into nature; the other flies to nature from his fellow-men. In chastity of diction, however, and the harmony of blank verse, Cowper leaves Thomson immeasurably below him; yet I still feel the latter to have been the born poet."

* * *

By the issue of their "Tudor Facsimile Texts," Messrs. T. C. & E. C. Jack are rendering a valuable service to the study of early English literature. The series, which is under the general editorship and supervision of Mr. John S. Farmer, claims to be the first systematic attempt to reprint pre-Shaksperian literature in facsimile. Among the volumes now ready to be issued to subscribers are "Wealth and Health," "Johan, the Evangelist," and "Impatient Poverty"—the three "lost" Tudor plays recently discovered; four volumes of unrecorded editions of scarce old plays, viz., "Darius," "Lusty Juventus," "Nice Wanton," and "The Play of the Weather," and a facsimile of Massinger's autograph of "Believe as you List." Other issues arranged for are seven volumes of Early Enterludes (including "Everyman"), five volumes of Early English Comedies and Tragedies, a complete collection of Heywood's "Enterludes," and the "Enterludes" of John Bale with the exception of the "King John" manuscript. The enterprise is a spirited one and deserves to succeed. It will enable every Reference Library in the country to have, if not the original, at least an exact copy, of rare plays and other documents which are now practically inaccessible.

* * *

MR. BROUGHAM VILLIERS, whose volume, "The Opportunity of Liberalism," showed real power of political generalisation, has just finished a book on "The Socialist Movement in England," which will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. It traces the history of Socialism from its early beginnings, through the period of Labour organisation in the latter part of the nineteenth century, to its revival as a political propaganda in the early 'eighties. Mr. Villiers also discusses the influence of Socialist ideas on the Labour movement generally, on the older parties, and on current literature and thought. He ends by attempting to estimate the probable results of the appearance of a Labour Party in politics, and the type of society likely to be evolved by the action of the Socialist spirit on the temper and institutions of the English people.

* * *

MESSRS. MACLEHOSE & SONS are adding to their library of books of travel the "Itinerary of Fynes Moryson," first printed in 1617. Their "Coryat" and "John Smith" were complete in two volumes. "Fynes Moryson," in the same handsome scarlet boards, printed in the same fine type, will fill four volumes. With this reprint (when completed), and with the reprint of the lengthy MS. at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, first printed by Mr. Charles Hughes five years ago, the scholar will have a complete sociological survey of Europe (and of part of the Holy Land) as they were at the end of the sixteenth century. "Fynes Moryson" is little known to the present generation. He was neither a buffoon, like Coryat, nor a venturesome man-at-arms, like Smith; but a shrewd, quiet gentleman, interested in character. Coryat was moved by gallowses and by the Heidelberg Tun; Smith liked some desperate feat of arms. Moryson, a much more intelligent man, found his delight in interesting people. He met Cardinal Bellarmine; he met Beza; he served as secretary to Lord Mountjoy, the lover of Sidney's Stella, and subduer of Tyrone. He saw the whole of the horrible Irish war, known as Tyrone's Rebellion; and his account of the state of Ireland ranks with the famous discourse of Spenser. More than this, his nephew was celebrated by Ben Jonson in a famous ode, while his niece married Lucius Cary, the second Viscount Falkland. The reprint (like all the famous reprints from Messrs. Maclehoose) contains many good illustrations, reproduced from the old copper engravings. Some of them are "drawn rudely"; but while a modern illustration amuses, these help the reader.

* * *

THE bi-centenary of the death of Mabillon, which was celebrated on December 27th in Paris, calls to mind a book which to-day seems to be almost neglected—the "Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography," by Sir James Stephen. It is made up of contributions to "The Edinburgh Review," and in its day enjoyed a vogue almost as great as Macaulay's "Essays," to which it bears more than a superficial resemblance. Among the contents is an essay on the French Benedictines which gives an excellent account of Mabillon. Other articles in it deal with Hildebrand, Saint Francis of Assisi, the Founders of Jesuitism, Luther, the Port-Royalists, Richard Baxter, William Wilberforce, and the Clapham Sect—a wide range of subjects all treated with sympathy and enthusiasm, not infrequently, as in the case of Gregory VII., with singular power.

* * *

DR. FRIEDJUNG, the greatest living German historian in Austria, and, in the opinion of many, the greatest in all Germany, has just published a "History of Austria, from 1849 to 1859"—a dismal decade of oppression. A Viennese correspondent writes: "Friedjung is a fine literary man who should be appreciated in the fatherland of great historical literature, the home of Macaulay and Morley." Friedjung won fame by his splendid "History of the Austro-Prussian Rivalry from 1859-1866"—a work which, though consisting of two large volumes, has run to nine editions in ten years. This brilliant Austrian author is the confidant of many leading families in Austria; hence his new work contains and may almost be said to be based on hitherto unpublished letters, papers, and diaries of famous Ministers like Dr. Bach, Prince Schwarzenberg, &c., who really ruled Austria from the overthrow of the revolutionaries until the Battle of Solferino. The second volume of the new book, which will also be published before the end of the year, will throw some remarkable light on Palmerstonian policy.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Diaries of Edward Pease, the Father of English Railways." Edited by Sir Alfred E. Pease, Bart. (Headley Brothers. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Royal Manor of Richmond, with Petersham, Ham, and Kew." By Mrs. Arthur G. Bell. (Bell, 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Bridge of Fire." Poems. By James Flecker. (Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.)

"Vronina." By Owen Rhoscomyl. (Duckworth. 6s.)

"The Explorer." By W. S. Maugham. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"Blaise de Monluc, Historien." Etude critique sur le texte et la valeur historique des "Commentaires." Par Paul Courteault. (Paris: Picard. 12 fr.)

The Drama.

MR. SHAW'S GOSPEL OF COMMON SENSE.

I HAVE a shadowy recollection of a shadowy performance of "Arms and the Man" at the Avenue Theatre, some thirteen years ago. That ghostly remembrance is not likely to survive Mr. Granville Barker's very robust revival of the play at the Savoy Theatre, on Monday night. Mr. Shaw's dramatic types and methods are now well known to the public, and Mr. Barker's intelligence, verve, and facility as a manager ensure them a brilliantly easy and flowing interpretation. Moreover, Miss Lillah McCarthy is so well able to breathe abundant life and charm into Mr. Shaw's idea of womanhood, and looks so handsome in a Victorian costume of 1885, which recalled to me a picture of the present Queen, that this early and comparatively simple example of his work is likely to stand with "Candida" and "You Never Can Tell," in the rank of "popular favourites." The laughter it provokes is all open and pleasant; and its satire seems to hurt only some far-away Victorian moralist. The play, therefore, ought to realise Mr. Shaw's original and modest expectations—expressed in his preface to the published edition—of what a well-constructed comedy of this type should achieve. So light and sure a touch on one's sense of the absurd can hardly fail, even with the coarsely fed play-going public of 1908.

Meanwhile, it is interesting to trace the progress of Mr. Shaw's art through the stages which began with "Candida" and "Arms and the Man." The truth is that he does change his point of view; that he is one of the very few British playwrights of whom any kind of progress, intellectual or moral, can be predicated. Mr. Pinero does not advance; nor Mr. Jones; nor Mr. Hall Caine, unless it be that, like the crab, they advance sideways. The reason is simple. These gentlemen aim at the success which issues from an able calculation of the kind of dramatic work suited to that portion of the play-going public which they best understand. Within these limits, they may aim high or aim low; but at the best their estimate will be steadily material and practical, an aim with which the thoughts, feelings, and desires of the artist, and his determination to express them, have little or nothing in common. Mr. Shaw, on the other hand, possesses the kind of salient and wilful personality that we call artistic. What the Pinerian and Jonesian personality is may be revealed in some future incarnation of these highly talented men, but is imperceptible in this, for it is purposely suppressed. Then Mr. Shaw has something worth saying. He has thought seriously about life, and has seen men and women, not merely as trees walking, but in relation to each other, and to the facts of existence, as far as he discerns them. His work is vital, and therefore changing, work.

Furthermore, he represents an ever-recurring tendency of human thought. With some reserves in favour of romanticism, which at the bottom of his nature he may cherish, he is still an anti-romantic, certainly an anti-sentimentalist. Thus he rejects most of the conventions which crowd the pages of the Victorian romanticists. Thus he judges "ideal" love-making ridiculous, a kind of moral drunkenness, mixed with something of the sentimental make-believe of inebriation. He thinks (and so do most sensible men) that it is horribly, nauseatingly overdone in our modern imaginative literature, and that it overlays more important and useful aspects of human nature. So, by the way, does Tolstoy, so (if we could only bring them to life again) would almost every actor in the great bygone drama of English Puritanism. He treats other modern literary habits in the same way. The self-deceptive pose of the lover, the way in which he dramatises his rôle, and fortifies himself by half-sincere adaptations from the romantic poets and rhetoricians, is no falsier than that of the swaggering soldier or the self-conscious patriot. Love and war (to take two great human interests) are matters of business; war a very bad business. Much selfishness is at the back of them; all sorts of small, though very human, calculations. So, as in "Arms and the Man," Mr. Shaw fills the stage with humbugs, very sparkling humbugs, it is true, with plenty of good manly and womanly stuff at the back of their natures, but still humbugs, who give up their pompous game only when Mr. Shaw waves a harlequin's wand over them, and turns them into average sensible, self-confessing, human beings again.

All this, of course, is the old stuff, the old method, of the satirist. In "Arms and the Man" Mr. Shaw makes Bulgaria at the period of the Servian war the scene of his travesty of the heroic sentiment in literature. A battle in Bulgaria is, of course, no more to him than it was to the author of "Candida"; Bulgaria is Mayfair or Streatham Common. We all strut on a little stage of our own construction, muttering rhetorical glorifications of ourselves, much as a self-absorbed man talks to himself in the street. To the congregation of sham idealists in "Arms and the Man"—to Raina, sly, and like all Mr. Shaw's women, something of a "cat," but fairly honest at heart, sick of her posing lover, and to Major Saranoff, tired of his own affectations—Mr. Shaw introduces the Swiss, Bluntschli, a mercenary soldier—i.e., a man who fights for his bread, not for his ideals—good-natured, resourceful, kind-hearted, helpful, practical to the finger-tips. Through this medium, the muddy sentimentalism of the Petkoff family gets gradually clarified. Life is accepted for what it is, and not what it is supposed to be. Incidentally Mr. Shaw tells a great many plain truths about war, which our later experience of the Boer War revealed to a nation that has now completely forgotten them again.

So far so good. Mr. Shaw, in "Arms and the Man" preaches the good old gospel of common sense, impartially scouting Liberal idealists, romantic lovers, glorifiers of war, and rhetorical poets and phrase-makers in general, and incidentally producing a brilliant and highly entertaining stage-play. But since then he has entered on a more difficult and complex development of his art, and on times which have sorely tried his Fabian creed. Things were going the way that Mr. Shaw imagined them. Imperialism waxed; Home Rule declined, the nationalities went down right and left—the Boers in South Africa, the Finns in Northern Europe; and yet the times seemed to promise a rather better lot for the proletariat, under enlightened, though not democratic, ideas of Government. And the dramatist, continuing his criticism of life, and misled both by his reading of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche and his interpretation of events, turned his good fairy, Bluntschli, into the cynical "Overman," Undershaft, contemptuous of everything but material force moulded by the strong individual will, and determined to show up, undermine, turn inside out, not merely sham idealists like Raina and Saranoff, but honest, if rather short-sighted, reformers of the type of "Major Barbara." Here Mr. Shaw forgot that it was precisely this kind of element in the working out of the world's destiny that events were discrediting. Liberalism came into power. The nationalities rose to their feet again. The Finns got back their liberty; the Boers secured Home Rule; a struggle of terrible seriousness, developing all kinds of heroic qualities, broke out in Russia. On the other hand Imperialism, battered at Port Arthur, and badly wounded in South Africa, has by no means been able to reconcile itself with liberty, to which Mr. Shaw is attached, and has developed no special capacity even for working out the economic problems of civilisation. Again arises the demand for ideals, for poetry; and Mr. Shaw, if he will not identify himself with the coarse materialism of his age and become in practice more of a Tory than a Socialist, finds himself bound to take account of spiritual forces. His intellectual delicacy and fastidiousness keep him a rebel; presumably they will in time lead him back from the indirect flattery of the powers that rule the modern world—and rule it very badly—which plays like "Major Barbara," and, less markedly, the delightful "John Bull's Other Island" suggest.

M.

Letters to the Editor.

THE FATE OF THE MILITIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Haldane's speech at Edinburgh last Saturday, and the memorandum issued by the War Office on Monday, put an end at last to the uncertainty that has surrounded the fate of the Militia force.

Now the country is informed that the Secretary of State for War has obtained Royal sanction to "the biggest order of recent years."

This is the abolition of the Militia.

Mr. Haldane's "expert advisers" have had their way with him and the old constitutional force, older than the British Navy or the English Parliament, is to disappear.

The statement that Militia Battalions are to become special reserve battalions is the flimsiest of evasions.

The avowed intention of the Army Council, who have always been jealous of the Militia, because they work only partially under their control, is to squeeze out, in the shortest possible time, the present Militia officers, and to substitute ex-Regular officers, while the terms of enlistment, and conditions of service for the men, show that the force is simply the Militia Reserve of the 1882 Act (which was abolished by Mr. Brodrick) brought to life again. That the Militia has fallen on evil days, no one will deny, but that they are incapable of being revived, and again becoming of use to the country, is a matter of grave doubt. There are two reasons why the Militia should have been saved.

They have never failed the country in a time of emergency.

They have always been the people's force, under popular control.

The origin of the force is lost in the dim past among the wild tribes of our Saxon ancestors.

King Alfred organised the force.

It was the Militia which rallied round Harold at Stamford Bridge and Senlac.

When the Conqueror William organised his military forces, he retained the Militia as a check against the feudal armies of his barons.

It was the Militia that fought for the first Henry, and laid siege to Rochester Castle.

It was the same force that supplied the bowmen of Crecy and Poitiers, and it was from this force that Cromwell made his army.

When the issue lay between King and nobles, the people's force was with the King; but when the issue was between the King and Parliament, the Militia was with the people's representatives. At Waterloo and in the Peninsular War, the Crimea, and in South Africa, the Militia responded readily to the calls made on them.

They have abundantly proved that, without them, the Regular Army machinery breaks down in a time of stress. They were embodied in 1900, and went cheerfully to Africa and the home garrisons, without reward and without thanks, and now, after waiting six years for recognition, they have got it—abolition. They are being destroyed for no other reason than that the Army Council finds it inconvenient to depend on Parliamentary sanction for embodying an essential part of the Army, and on the willingness of the Militia—a willingness which has never yet failed—to undertake foreign service. Apologising for the length of this letter,—Yours, &c.,

A. M. O.

"THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The old-fashioned air of "Oxonian's" letter, with its superficial contrasts and distinctions, its rough and simple-minded gibes, may serve to remind us that the same causes which lead us to perceive the decline of the Oxford Movement are lifting the whole Christian question and controversy into the large and noble freedom of what has been well-called a "super-confessional" movement. Harnack and Sabatier, Eucken, "Il Rinascimento," Laberthonnière, and all the great "Modernists" are pointing out the way to a condition of things in which the most terrible reproach that has ever been brought against the Church of Christ—"See how these Christians love one another"—may become her praise.—Yours, &c.,

WM. SCOTT PALMER.

December 30th, 1907.

MR. HALDANE AND THE INITIATIVE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—To defend Mr. Haldane appears to me unnecessary. Yet I would attempt that task. For Mr. Haldane echoes only the sentiments of many good Liberals, when he states that "the greater the Sovereign, the greater the initiative he could and did show."

Surely we have room in our great Liberal and Radical Party for even the admirers of a King's initiative. Our majority is large enough to admit of some variation of opinion.

With the larger part of your article (of December 21st) the great mass of Liberals must surely agree.

With a small part of that article we may be allowed to differ. Yet differ, I trust, without heat.

Who and what is our King? Surely the chosen, the accepted of the people. The Head of a Limited Monarchy venerated and respected by the people.

In the present instance, though, he happens to be something more. You yourself admit that King Edward is an "excellent and most impartial Monarch."

No Dictator's power is sought for by, or granted to, the Presidents of the two great Republics—France and America. The power of these two Presidents, as by constitution conceded, may equal that of a British Sovereign. Assuredly it does not exceed it. Granted, then, that the brains of our hereditary or chosen representatives are equal, what fact stands foremost to arrest attention? It would appear to be this. That, whilst Republicans can listen open-mouthed to the remarks of their Presidents, the Radicals of Britain are to be reprimanded for imagining for an instant that their King can possess one single idea of his own.

On the face of it, this hardly seems fair.

The question revolves itself into this—Ought a King (given he be a King of the type of King Edward) to dwell—like his State jewels—in some safe place, apart, merely as a nonentity, merely as an ornament?

Many good Liberals could answer, No.

And that without jeopardising their creed.

For surely, exceptions to this time-honoured rule of a King never taking the initiative can be made though the power of Parliament stands untouched, though the power of the Monarchy remains strictly limited. No British Sovereign would lose the sympathy of many Liberals by endeavouring to create good feeling, for instance, between his nation and the other nations of the world.

If he possess the grace to accomplish this, if he succeed in maintaining the peace of the world, to that King's initiative we Liberals have cause to look with thanks. In this connection, the entente with France I can surely name.

Again. No British Sovereign would lose Radical regard who used his initiative to help to bring to a close a sanguinary war, waged between his nation and another.

Surely, too, a British Sovereign could initiate schemes for meeting immediate and dire distress, when, through some unlooked-for and appalling catastrophe, his nation lies crushed and bleeding.

For "class distinction" and "aristocratic privilege" no Liberal cares. The words "tire" him.

But for the Monarchy he cherishes usually a deep respect.

I was privileged to listen to a Labour Member of Parliament, speaking on a Liberal platform, only last week. It was no revelation to me to learn that he bowed to no Conservative in the strength of his patriotism.

Firmly as sits the Eddystone Lighthouse upon its rock, so firmly, and even more firmly, sits the love for the British Monarchy, deep-seated in the people's hearts. That being so, a light can surely be permitted to shine forth sometimes—even from the sanctity of some Palace wall.

When it shines, there need, in some cases, be no protest. Nay, even, in others, there may be applause—the applause of staunch Liberals.

Some of us remember the call, “Wake up, England.” To that call, to that initiative we may be indebted perhaps for our present sound Liberal position. Who knows?—Yours, &c.,
MAXWELL ROUSE.

Firby, Bedale, Yorkshire.
December 28th, 1907.

SIZE AND COST OF FLEET.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“Retrenchment” has done a service to the British nation in pointing out the true lines to be adopted in dealing with naval expenditure. The German bogies are laid low by a master hand in two concise paragraphs.

The fact is that a country can be weakened by an excessive load of taxation just as much in peace times as if at war with a foreign Power. Supposing, at present, more ships are built, in a few years’ time, through fresh scientific discoveries, such as construction of superior airships and other possible causes, they are rendered obsolete; all the money is, indeed, “thrown into the sea.” Therefore it behoves our Government to be cautious and curtail ruinous expenditure. A nation in rags, less even pocket money, would be a poor substitute for a few Dreadnoughts. The greatest reserve force is to be strong financially.

The Liberal Party, if it truly represents the democratic forces, must go in for social reform undeterred by Whiggery or Jingoism; the third line of defence lying more in a contented prosperous people than in the piling up of gigantic armaments.—Yours, &c.,

J. MACKENZIE.

Caledonia, December 23rd, 1907.

“THE VIRGIN BIRTH.”

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I turned with some interest to the review of Dr. Orr’s book, “The Virgin Birth of Christ,” in the last issue of THE NATION. That the criticism would, possibly, be keen I anticipated. It did not occur to me that it might not be rigorous in its statement of fact. This is, however, my complaint about it. As a Radical, who has been wont, with pride, to associate scrupulous fairness in such matters with intellectual Radicalism, I was the more disappointed. Let me say it is no part of my purpose to enter into controversy with your reviewer on “The Virgin Birth.” I wish simply to point out what appears to me, at least, one serious inaccuracy. Referring to the Fourth Gospel, he says, “We are not surprised that it has its theory of Divinity; but it is the Logos theory, and concerns ‘Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph’ (i., 45).” Is this a fair statement of fact? Does the Fourth Gospel declare that its “Logos theory concerns Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph”? Such is the obvious implication of your reviewer’s words. What is the fact? The Fourth Gospel records conversations between Andrew and Simon, and Philip and Nathaniel, in which there was eager communication of the fact that they (Andrew and Philip) had “found the Messiah.” It was Philip—a new and, necessarily, somewhat uninstructed follower of Christ—who said to Nathaniel, “We have found Him of whom Moses in the Law and the Prophets did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph.” Is it legitimate criticism to represent such a communication, so recorded, as expressing the view of the writer of the Fourth Gospel on the origin of Jesus?

Again, your reviewer is not happy, it seems to me, in his choice of words when he writes, “The fact that He is throughout spoken of as ‘the seed of David according to the flesh.’” The use of “throughout” is surely not justified. The phrase he quotes occurs twice only, I believe, in the New Testament, once in Acts, and once in Romans. I should not have inferred this from the use of such a comprehensive term. The subject is grave enough in the estimation of some of your readers to demand the greatest care in statements of fact.—Yours, &c.,

WM. WINDSOR.

Lyndhurst,
Lancaster Road, Birkdale.
December 23rd, 1907.

ENGLAND’S GENEROSITY TO IRELAND.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—“He (the average Englishman) thought that, by paying £14,000,000 of his own money, he had got rid of the landlords”—Where, in heaven’s name, does THE NATION or the average Englishman get this thought, so stated in THE NATION of December 5th?

Mr. Birrell lately recommended the average Irishman to act on the principle of the old lady who declined to read Gibbon’s history because it was better to let bygones be bygones. But Mr. Birrell is not always serious, and he never introduced such a principle into his educational programme in England.

Irish history has been practically excluded from Irish schools, but the average Irishman reads and knows enough of it to make him think that at the Union Ireland was compelled to accept an agreement at the point of the bayonet, and that her pocket was rifled at the end of the performance; that Ireland’s national debt was created by money spent in systematic corruption and final purchase of the Irish Parliament; that, when the separate Exchequers of the two countries were amalgamated by a device almost too shameful for belief, Ireland was made responsible for the English national debt; that the leaders of Protestant ascendancy and O’Connell for fifty years after the Union exposed and denounced the injustice, yet the system was not remedied, but intensified; and that the financial relations of the two countries were, and are, as shamefully unjust as their political relations.

I quote from an historical work by Gavan Duffy, which is not read, but ought to be, in Irish schools and colleges. Without exploring the whole of that great dustheap called history, it is necessary to know something of the past financial relations in order to understand the present situation, and to estimate justly such statements as that in THE NATION.

Liberal leader-writers, who don’t seem to know anything of Irish history, past or present, continually speak as if all money voted for Irish purposes was a gift from Great Britain, and ignore that from £10,000,000 to £12,000,000 of the revenue dealt with by Parliament is raked into the British Exchequer, and that it is raised and spent in ways that Irish taxpayers have not consented to, and in many cases object to. They can’t understand that the average Irishman feels justified in resisting a claim that his fellow-subjects in Great Britain, generally ignorant or indifferent, should have entire command of the fortunes of Irishmen, by taxing them without their consent, and spending their taxes without their approval.

They ignore that the overtaxation of, and the wasteful expenditure in, Ireland was established by a Royal Commission so lately as 1898 (they are ready to let this be a by-gone), and that the almost unanimous conclusion of the Commissioners (eleven out of thirteen) was that, instead of contributing one-eleventh of the revenue, Ireland’s share should at most not exceed one-twentieth. In face of that uncontradicted report, how can it be alleged that the English taxpayer contributes anything to the expenses of Irish administration or reforms?

What has England done? Not lent, but imposed the use of her credit on us with disastrous financial consequences. Is it likely that an Irish financial authority would raise money, up to a possible sum of 150 millions, at over three per cent., and lend it for such a purpose as land purchase, for the exclusive benefit of a small class, or for any purpose, at 2½ per cent.? That is the main cause of the present financial difficulty in Ireland; and this course was not imposed on Ireland until every care was taken that the inevitable loss from such Bedlamite finance was guaranteed by, and saddled on, the revenues of the local authorities.

The average Irishman believes all this and much more that he has learnt from recent and present history. He has always been too ready to let bygones be bygones; but he sees no sign of repentance or amendment in financial or legislative methods. Feeling miserable, and being helpless, he protests, just now by cattle-driving, which it is surprising to find is not considered by his English critics and advisers an improvement on former popular methods of protest. They are hard to please.—Yours, &c.,

MURBOUGH O’BRIEN.

December 24th, 1907.

"VITAL CAUSES OF IRISH DISCONTENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In spite of his humane intentions I fear that your correspondent, Mr. Robert Lynd, has not succeeded in grasping the "vital cause" of Irish discontent any more firmly than your leader writer of the previous week. This is not surprising to anyone who knows Ireland, where everything is as elusive as the skies or the mists on the mountains. One sometimes wonders, in this land of shadows, where life itself seems hardly real, whether it is ever possible to discover the real cause of anything. You will find in Ireland people who know the country thoroughly, people who are full of sympathy for the public weal and who are genuinely disinterested, all holding the most widely differing views, not alone about what are called elsewhere matters of opinion, but about the actual circumstances and conditions of life with which they are surrounded. Everything in Ireland is a matter of opinion. In no country is it so difficult to get at the actual facts, and if it is difficult for the people who live in Ireland to understand her, how much more difficult is it for those who look at her from across the sea, or from the motor car which carries the well-disposed British official through the wilds of Connaught. It is a truism to say that the Irish are a paradoxical people. But I think that few amongst the many students of modern Ireland have realised the extent to which this is true. There is, in the Irishman, an extraordinary listlessness with regard to life and constructive social and political effort, and, along with this, a core of primitive savage energy which drives him forth to attack individual institutions—all that we know as the social order. Yesterday it was the landlord, to-day it is the grazier; to-morrow it will be somebody else. Ireland is perpetually eating her heart out. The people have not yet found themselves; nor will a change in the machinery of government, nor even "the settlement of the land question" suffice to solve the problem. Two things, however, give one hope for the future. One is a growing interest in Irish affairs on the part of the Protestant minority, now a third of the entire population; the other, the demand for a better system of primary education.—Yours, &c.,

E. D.

United Arts Club, Lincoln Place, Dublin.

LAND LEGISLATION IN ROUMANIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With reference to the note in your issue of the 21st, dealing with the agrarian reforms in Roumania, I beg to send you herewith a copy of a telegram received from Bucharest, which would indicate that the Government have been able to secure unanimity for the agrarian reforms which they are introducing.

Should it interest you, I will send you in a few days' time the complete projects of law for agrarian reform.—Yours, &c.,

A. STEAD, Consul-General.

49, Parliament Street, S.W.

December 24th, 1907.

"The Government and the Opposition have come to an agreement on the principal point in the project of law relating to agricultural arrangements between the great land-owners and the peasants, namely, on the question of the pasturages to be granted to the peasants. Owners of more than one hundred and fifty hectares of land will voluntarily sell to the peasants pasture-lands not exceeding one-eighth of the extent of their estates. All the abuses of agricultural usury are suppressed and placed under severe penalties as the result of this agreement. The law will be voted by the Corps Législatifs and put into force with the least possible delay. The agricultural crisis of last Spring will thus find a solution which will be accepted by all political parties."

PREMATURE BURIAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. James R. Williamson, has called attention to a subject that is ripe for legislative action, and by "legislative action" I mean Governmental action, as the private M.P. now hardly counts as a law-maker.

The whole practice of death certification needs reforming, it being now in a very unsatisfactory condition, and one which greatly increases the risk of that ghastly catastrophe, premature burial.

Then again, considering the unsatisfactory domiciliary conditions under which great numbers of people live, the provision of public mortuaries is pressingly needed. In this matter we are far behind some parts of the Continent.

A good deal has been written, and by very competent writers, on the subject of the signs of death; but the net result of their labours leaves the matter so uncertain that the only sure proof of death seems to be the signs of putrefactive decomposition. The trouble lies chiefly in cases of apparently sudden death, catalepsy, &c. It is obvious that both, as a sanitary precaution, and for decency, or seemliness, the bodies of persons so succumbing should be removed from cramped homes, and carefully placed and tended until the fact of death is placed beyond dispute, or restoration takes place.

This important social reform is one that could hardly encounter any serious opposition in Parliament, and it may, therefore, be hoped that the present Government will adopt with any modifications that may be deemed helpful, the Bill which has already been drafted at the instance of The Association for the Prevention of Premature Burial.

The subject is fully dealt with in a volume published by Messrs. Swan, Sonnenschein & Co., and written by Mr. William Tebb, F.R.G.S., and Col. Edward Perry Vullum, M.D.

Surely THE NATION will lend its powerful aid to bring about the improvements indicated that are so manifestly needed?—Yours, &c.,

J. H.

SCHOOLBOY MISTRANSLATIONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The list of school-boy mistranslations in your last number reminds me of one which came to my notice. The following passage from a fable by La Fontaine, "Une grenouille vit un bœuf qui lui sembla de belle taille," was rendered "A greengrocer lived on beef which seemed to him to be well cut."—Yours, &c.,

MAGISTER.

London, December 24th, 1907.

THE BIRCH ROD FOR OLD TRAMPS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The recent birching sentence passed upon an old vagrant, named Podmore, by Lord Hatherton—the victim being the same age as Lord Hatherton himself, viz., sixty-five—was perfectly legal under an antiquated Act which at one time permitted the birching of women, and but for the prompt action of the Humanitarian League, the punishment would have been inflicted. As Mr. Collinson has on more than one occasion pointed out, the law allows such disgusting sentences to be carried out almost immediately after they are pronounced. Neither the prison governor nor the police are under any obligation to communicate with the Home Office on the subject, and, under these circumstances, the intervention of the Crown, either in the way of remission or of the exercise of the Royal Prerogative, is impossible. At Gloucester, about three years ago, an insane man was flogged within twenty-four hours of the passing of the sentence, and at Dorset five old tramps, convicted of sleeping out and begging, were birched before the Home Secretary had time to interfere.

May I call attention to the fact that under this infamous Vagrant Act men who are not vagrants at all, but genuine unemployed labourers, if convicted of street-begging a second or third time, are liable to be flogged with the "cat"? Some time ago a London magistrate said he would send three labourers to be punished as "incorrigible rogues" if they came before his Court again. It was proposed by Sir M. W. Ridley, in 1889, to abolish the punishment of flogging in such cases, and, but for the action of the House of Lords, which threw out his amendment to the Vagrant Act, this would have been done.—Yours, &c.,

VETERAN CRIMINOLOGIST.

December 28th, 1907.

Reviews.

THE CREED OF A CATHOLIC LIBERAL.*

I.

It is no exaggeration to say that Lord Acton's Essays are the book of the season, and that their publication is an event. Their author stood in the first rank of Gelehrte. His reading was immense, his memory unailing. He added to his learning a considerable knowledge of affairs and an almost passionate moral energy. The former kept him in touch with life, the latter with principle; he lived in the world of men without descending to its level; he raised and inspired. The works of such a man are of public, it is not too much to say of European, interest; and while welcoming the volume before us, they form, we hope, an instalment only. For, even if we add to them the "Lectures on Modern History," the "Letters to Mrs. Drew," and Dr. Gasquet's judiciously compiled Tendenz-Schrift, "Lord Acton and His Circle," we possess but a small part of his published, not to speak of his unpublished, work. The list of his anonymous articles fills more than twenty pages of an octavo volume; "Quirinus," the contributions to the short-lived "Chronicle," much of the historical and other comment on the controversies which culminated in the Vatican Council are scattered, difficult of access, or out of print. Were private motives, however natural, to stand in the way of an adequate memoir and of the editing by a competent hand of his remains in full, the world of letters would have reason to complain.

To his foreign blood, his German training, and his hereditary creed he owed the large outlook, the absence of the provincial note, that distinguished him. Continental thought was nearer to him than English; his studies were cosmopolitan; he had much of the "massive solidity" of the German mind. The years (1848-1854) spent at Munich were decisive; he threw himself into the intellectual movement of which the Bavarian capital was the centre; and, associating intimately with Döllinger, shared the development, the disillusionment, and, ultimately, the defeat of that distinguished man.

Whatever may be the case to-day, half a century ago the standards of German were higher than those of English science; Acton learned to be a severe judge as of his own so of other men's work. But what moved his indignation was less ignorance as such than the pretence which seemed to him a moral fault. His judgment of Buckle—"he is neither wise himself nor likely to be the cause of wisdom in others"—was ethical rather than intellectual. He disliked what seemed to him the parade of "slovenly erudition," but he resented much more "the laborious endeavour to degrade the history of mankind to the level of one of the natural sciences"; and, though his sense of the unity of science increased in later years, he would have protested to the end against an attempt to construe ideal in the terms of material fact. This austere temper passed over into the practical province. Hence a certain academic strain in his political judgments which recalls Burke or, in our own day, Mr. John Morley.

"To treat politics as a game, to play with truth, or make it subservient to any cause other than itself, to take trivial views, was to Acton as deep a crime as to waste in pleasure or futility the hours so brief given for the salvation of the soul would have seemed to Baxter or Bunyan. Indeed, there was an element of Puritan severity in his attitude towards statesmen, both ecclesiastical and civil. He was no 'light half-believer of a casual creed.'"

This was the key to his admiration for Mr. Gladstone and his antipathy to Lord Beaconsfield; to his enthusiasm for Rothe, whose "Ethik," he said, was the book which he would give to anyone who he wished to turn out a good Catholic—a term which he used in an Actonian rather than a denominational sense—and his distrust of Newman, whom, with all his gifts, he regarded as "a sophist, the manipulator, and not the servant of truth."

His criticisms of public men were acute. Of Goschen—"his lips have never been touched by the sacred fire of Liberty": of Lord Liverpool—"his mediocrity was his merit"; what his party valued was "the safe sterility of his mind." So too with writers. Of a certain professor of history—"his lectures are, indeed, not entirely unhistorical, for he has borrowed quite discriminatingly from Tocqueville"; of another—"ideas, if they occur to him, he rejects like temptations to sin."

He was not without the defects of his qualities; the historian's judgment of Demosthenes, "he was an idealist, and overestimated the efficacy of moral forces in times of danger," applies. A failing that leans to virtue's side is still a failing; his "périssent les colonies plutôt que les principes" indicated a stiff-jointedness which amounted to a real weakness. This came out in his views of Imperial policy, of the Italian Risorgimento—"he (Cavour) was not intentionally a persecutor or consciously an enemy of religion"; "his means were, on the whole, better than his end"—and of the relation between Church and State, e.g., "where ecclesiastical authority is restricted, religious liberty is virtually denied." On the last head, it is true, experience modified his opinion. The triumph of Vaticanism in the Roman Church taught him to distinguish between "authority and authorities," and led him to a certain sympathy with Prince Hohenlohe's view that religion ought to be maintained in its integrity and not only in its independence, that society is interested in protecting the Church even against herself, and that the enemies of her liberty are ecclesiastical as well as political. But on the principle he never wavered, and it is in the principle that the fallacy lies. "It must be wrong to do wrong" is the phrase in which the editors sum up his attitude. Yes; but while the aim, at least the ideal aim, is to moralise life as a whole, and while the science of social as distinguished from that of individual ethics is, we grant, in its infancy, to apply the standards of the latter to the former is misleading. As well argue from "resist not evil" to pure passivity; and, starting from the Christian duty of forgiveness, disband the police, close the law courts, open the prisons. It is a reductio ad absurdum; society would be at an end. Acton, indeed, did not go the length of non-resistance. But his principles looked that way.

"It was not his (Mr. Gladstone's) successes so much as his failures that attracted him. What he most admired was what many condemned. It was because he was not like Lord Palmerston, because Bismarck disliked him, because he gave back the Transvaal to the Boers, and tried to restore Ireland to its people, because . . . his politics were part of his religion, that he used of Gladstone language rarely used and still more rarely applicable to any statesman."

When the different idols to which men are led agree in diverting their attention from certain important truths it is an unwelcome task to point out the relativity, if not of these truths in themselves, at least of their application. We are not criticising the Gladstonian policy. Mr. Gladstone was a great moral force in politics; and he may have been right in his view of the questions referred to. What we are concerned with is the principle that in morals, as elsewhere, applied differs from pure science. And that for this reason. Society, whether in Church or State, is as yet only to a certain extent moralised. It is, as Jowett reminds us, largely mechanical; and rests primarily on certain motives, partly self-regarding, partly altruistic, which have been found strong enough to bind men together; on certain institutions tested by use and handed down from former generations; on certain compacts, tacit or avowed, between conflicting ideas and interests—liberty and law, the good of the individual and that of the community, present pleasure and future pain. Ethics, like religion, presents us not with a concrete polity but with an ideal; and "an ideal is by its very nature removed from practical life." Ethical motives have never existed, perhaps are never likely to exist, in such strength as to make it safe to entrust them with the preservation of social order. Other instincts, therefore, not so much immoral as, apparently and on the surface, unmoral, exist for this purpose. To disparage those is to assume that the Divine manifests itself only in the sphere of conscious morality. But this is not so; Schiller's maxim, "Die Welt-Geschichte ist das Welt-Gericht," while capable of abuse, is the expression of a truth which no monistic conception of the universe can safely overlook. The ethical notions which conflict with this truth, however important in their own province, have no jurisdiction outside it; they are of the number of those which "the moralist can never afford to forget, nor the metaphysician to remember."

* I. "The History of Freedom and Other Essays." By Lord Acton. Edited, with an Introduction, by John Neville Figgis, M.A., and Reginald Vere Laurence, M.A. Macmillan. 10s.

II. "Historical Essays and Studies." By Lord Acton. Edited by John Neville Figgis, M.A., and Reginald Vere Laurence, M.A. Macmillan. 10s.

This loyalty to the moral law led him to forget the gradual purification of its prescriptions. "Are you aware," he once asked, "that St. Charles Borromeo was a party to a scheme of assassinations?" "Must we not make allowances for the morality of the time?" it was urged. "I make no allowance for that sort of thing" was the emphatic answer; and he protested against Manning for holding up the authority "that canonised this murderer to the veneration of mankind." To see in this way is to see out of focus. A patron of the ring to-day would be put down, justly enough, as a depraved person. And it is possible that to a future generation the criminal code of our own may seem at once stupid and barbarous. But our grandfathers who patronised the ring were, man for man, as virtuous as we are; nor whatever we may come to think of the laws which they administer, are our magistrates specially inhuman. In the sixteenth century, as in our own, there were men who were in advance of their age; but they were exceptional, and, when we remember that the author of Utopia was himself a persecutor, their professions must be received with reserve. There is a flaw in the syllogism which excludes the average; the premisses are strained.

It is probable that a personal factor entered into Acton's rigorism on these questions.

"In early life he had sought guidance in the difficult historical and ethical questions which beset the history of the Papacy from many of the most eminent ultramontanes. Later on he was able to test their answers in the light of his study of original authorities. He found that the answers given him had been at the best but plausible evasions."

He had been "put off with explanations that did not explain, or left in ignorance of material facts." The falsehood of the system, its teaching, its representatives, was essential and incurable. This at least was his deliberate judgment on a question which no man in Europe was as competent to judge as he. And exaggeration bred exaggeration; it is dangerous to set belief in the Pope on the same level as belief in God. He escaped the "all or nothing" dilemma over which so many of his co-religionists have made shipwreck; he was a religious man and a sincere Christian throughout. But his natural and proper suspicion of Ultramontanism led him at times to "see men as trees walking." He forgot the relativity of moral standards; he forgot, in judging Liberal divines like Rosmini and Newman, that men are often better than their principles; and that the question to be asked is not, Are they consistent?—few of us are so, fortunately—but, which way do they face? The key to this was the fact that his own position in the Church of Rome was an ambiguous one. "Pour faire l'histoire d'une religion," says Renan, "il faut ne plus y croire, mais il faut y avoir cru." Had Acton possessed this twofold qualification, his criticism of Vaticanism—which, it must be remembered, he distinguished, rightly or wrongly, from Catholicism—would have gained in balance what it lost in fire.

In the first stage of his literary activity he possessed the confidence of the reformer and something of the self-assurance of youth. He was convinced, with reason, of the fallacy of many of the ideas associated with the democratic movement; he was contemptuous, also with reason, of the parochialism of English thought. Perhaps in each case he did not sufficiently distinguish form from substance; or discern the potentialities of the crude and immature. The next ten years were taken up with theological controversy. He fought the Papacy, and was defeated; its hour had not yet come. He survived the Vatican Council for more than a generation. During this time his attitude to the Church was one of detachment; he remained, as he had been born, a Catholic, but he viewed the politico-ecclesiastical questions which absorbed his co-religionists from without. With the view of his editors that in later life he felt that the Infallibility Dogma "need not have the dangerous consequences, both in regard to historical judgments and political principles, which he had feared" we cannot agree. Six years after the definition he wrote:—

"I do not know of a religious and educated Catholic who really believes that the See of Rome is a safe guide to salvation: I do not believe that there are Catholics who sincerely and intelligently believe that Rome is right and Döllinger wrong."

And in 1884:—

"A man's opinion of the Papacy is regulated and determined by his opinion about religious assassination. If he honestly looks at it as an abomination, he can only accept the Primacy with a drawback, with precaution, suspicion, and aversion from its acts."

Here, certainly, there is no surrender. And, if it is asked how a man holding this view of Rome could be a Roman Catholic, we can only quote Patmore's "I believe in Catholicism as it will be ten thousand years hence." He distinguished the merely lengthy from the eternal, and looked to the future—perhaps the far future—for the triumph of his ideas.

H. F.

(To be concluded.)

THE WRITING OF HISTORY.*

THE present book, which consists of a series of lectures recently delivered by Professor Pollard, well known for his researches in the Tudor period of English history, at University College, deserves, in more ways than one, the highest praise. It merits recognition, as a production of up-to-date English academic training, by reason of its general freedom from bias, as well as its unsparing criticism of many time-honoured prejudices with which the academic exponent of history has been wont to regale the raw and receptive student mind. It is further worthy of commendation for the absolute lucidity of its exposition, and for a charm of style which rarely flags. Mr. Pollard would, probably, himself hardly claim any especial originality for the subject-matter of these lectures. The course of development, the facts and the relations of fact, which Mr. Pollard so admirably presents, are probably known to well-nigh all serious historical students of the present day, and the points of view here given are accepted by all who are moderately free from such prejudice as is likely to distort their insight.

The title of the present work is, perhaps, somewhat misleading, since it deals exclusively with English history during the period of which it professes to treat, i.e., the close of the Middle Ages to the present time. But, taking English history as their text, Mr. Pollard's lectures contain in many respects a masterly survey of the course of development from the Tudor period onwards.

In the first chapter, Mr. Pollard offers some excellent remarks on the qualifications requisite to a successful understanding of history. He very properly places "imagination" in the forefront of the natural gifts with which the student of history should be endowed. Imagination, in the sense referred to, historical imagination, like scientific imagination, is not, of course, to be identified with imagination in the ordinary sense, which is restricted to the "imagination of deeds which were never done, and of causes that never existed." As Mr. Pollard justly observes, indispensable as original research is to the historian, no ransacking of archives or accumulation of materials "will make a man a historian without the capacity to interpret and construct." It is this capacity to interpret and construct which determines the value of the historian. Historical reality, like all other reality, resolves itself, in the last resort, into two factors, or elements, a logical factor, expressing itself in laws or causal formulae, economical, psycho-social, political, &c., and an alogical factor expressing itself in the play of individual events and human wills. The first of these constitutes the universal, and the second the particular, side of historical reality. The one is law, the other chance. The task of the philosophic historian is to disentangle the law side of history from its chance side, but there is a danger here of falling into the delusion that history, as concrete fact or progress, can be exhaustively or adequately explained by a formula or set of formulae. No view of history can be adequate that does not explicitly recognise the seething mass of particular events and human wills, themselves irreducible to law, as an equally important factor in historical development as any law that we can formulate.

* "Factors in Modern History." By F. M. Pollard, M.A. Constable. 7s. 6d. net.

It is here that the historical imagination comes in, guiding its possessor between the Scylla of barren doctrinaireism and Prinzipreiterei on the one hand, and the Charybdis of losing himself in a mere superficial chaos of facts and personalities, on the other. There is a further problem for the historical imagination to determine, and that is as to the norm for its reality as reflected in our minds. We all know the puzzle of our childhood, which was the real object, the chair say, as seen with our eyes close to it, a few inches away, or a few yards away. So here, we may ask ourselves, is the true and real history of a period the history as seen through the eyes of a contemporary, and if so, of what contemporary, the man of thought, the man of action, or the man of artistic imagination; or, again, of the scholar of a later period, who reconstructs it with the aid of his imaginative faculty, working on the facts given and on the light thrown upon them by subsequent development? Of course, Mr. Pollard, as he does not profess to be writing a philosophical treatise on historic method, cannot go into these questions in the few passages which the limits of his task allow him to devote to general considerations.

Professor Pollard would emphasise the rise of the modern national state as the salient fact distinguishing modern from medieval, or ancient, history. The importance of the nationality as the political unit of modern times as opposed to the kinship or group unit of early society, or the local territorial unit (the village, manor, township) of the older civilisation, is unquestionable, but it may be fairly doubted whether it can be properly treated as ultimate, or, on the other hand, whether the change in the political centre is not rather itself deducible from causes lying deeper in economic development. Indeed, there are passages which would indicate that Mr. Pollard is himself conscious of this possibility. If such be the case, the evolution of the political nation as opposed, on the one side, to the cosmopolitanism, and, on the other, to the local independence, of earlier ages, resolves itself into a phase of a movement at once wider and deeper than itself. With all due acknowledgment of the recognition, as compared to earlier academic writers on the subject, which the economic "moment" receives at Mr. Pollard's hands, we would suggest that even he sometimes allows it to be over-weighted by the political and ideological side of things in his estimates of social change as a whole.

Some of Mr. Pollard's obiter dicta are certainly open to question. Take, for example, the dogmatic assertion on p. 45 that "if England is destined to turn into a social democracy, the transformation will be accomplished by the same gradual, legitimate, and peaceful methods as those by which feudal England was converted into a commercial middle-class community." It is surely, to say the least, rash to conclude, without reservation from the past to the future, in this way. Besides, is it quite true, as Professor Pollard implies, that social change in England has been, invariably, so entirely peaceful? How about the various risings in the earlier half of the sixteenth century, how about the Civil War, how about the Revolution of 1688? Again, the passing reference to the Paris Commune of 1871, on p. 170, is quite unworthy of an historical scholar of the calibre of our author, combining, as it does, bias and inaccuracy.

But, in spite of any slight drawbacks, every impartial critic must admit that Professor Pollard has furnished the best scientific survey of the course of English history as yet existing in the language, certainly within the same compass. He has not hesitated to blow many cherished myths to the winds, and in most cases to present, clearly and concisely, the causes of events in their true proportion. The book is one which should be in the possession of every historical student.

A PORTRAIT OF BEETHOVEN.*

M. ROMAIN ROLLAND, who is well known in France as a writer upon music, has had the original idea of writing a book upon Beethoven the man, with barely a reference to Beethoven the musician. The result is singularly interesting. The little book contains no new matter—none that is not already familiar to students of the German biographies of Beethoven and of his letters; but practically all the available information about his appearance, his manners, and his ways of thought is here compressed into a small volume that anyone can read through in less than an hour. In this way we get a swifter and more complete idea of the living man than it is possible to get by picking out the essentials here and there from the mass of details given us in the biographies and the letters. M. Rolland builds his data into a very penetrating and convincing piece of portraiture. For the most part he lets Beethoven speak for himself; only at one point does he idealise the portrait—when he regards the choral portion of the Ninth Symphony, the "Ode to Joy," as a kind of deliberate purgation of the composer's soul, the conscious adding of a coping stone of optimism to a life that Beethoven had consciously shaped with this end in view for years. "He has now," says M. Rolland, "come into possession of the object for which he has sought all his life; he has seized hold of Joy." Men do not dramatise themselves in this way, and Beethoven least of all.

To the psychologist Beethoven's is one of the most interesting of lives, in spite of—or perhaps because of—the fact that it is almost devoid of outer incident. It does not stand in the limelight like Wagner's, does not come down to the footlights and bawl its story at us till the least concerned of us cannot help but hear; it has not even the romantic garnishings of the lives of men like Chopin and Liszt. Beethoven, for the greater part of his career, rarely moved out of Vienna; and for a composer—and such a composer in such a time—he was fairly well treated by the Fates, his work being appreciated to an extent that is really surprising, and his material lot being felicity itself in comparison with that of Mozart or that of Schubert. Yet his life was on the whole the most tragic in the history of music, even when one remembers the poverty and the misery and the too-early deaths of the composers just named, and the pitiful endings of Schumann and Hugo Wolf. No other musician has had to face so awful a trial as deafness during practically two-thirds of his working life. What that meant for him we can, with all our sympathy, only dimly guess. It must have been heart-rending for his friends to see such a sight as Beethoven playing the piano and frequently drawing no sound at all from the keys, so lightly did he touch them in the more expressive passages, while he himself was unconscious of the silence, the rapture written on his face showing that his spiritual, if not his physical ear, was listening to the divinest strains; but for Beethoven himself, except in moments of forgetfulness like these, the anguish of that perpetually lamed sense must have been something beyond our power of imagination. The wonder is not that he should have thought of suicide so early as 1802, but that he failed to carry the idea into execution.

And yet the scientific student of his case sometimes asks himself whether, paradoxical as it may seem, music did not gain by Beethoven's deafness, for the simple reason that it withdrew him from the world, and concentrated almost the whole of his faculties upon his art. For Beethoven was a man of great physical energy, unflinching courage, and an exuberant—even turbulent—temperament; and with all these driving forces at the back of him it is hard to say whether, had all the ways of life been left open to him, he would not have wandered down many of the wrong ones and lost and wasted a good deal of himself. In that gnarled and ugly frame—the product of a vigorous but drunken father and a consumptive mother—there was a combination of physical strength and nervous fire that is not common among artists. There is not a shadow of doubt that he was very nervously organised; his letters, the Heiligenstadt Testament, and the evidence of his friends, prove it conclusively. But the organism and the life were kept from going to pieces by a fundamental toughness of tissue, a devouring ambition, and an abnormal tenacity of will. He could faint from sheer emotion after the performance of one of his works; but he could also endure physical fatigue and mental torments that would have broken most other composers to pieces. Men who unite such nervous fire to such strength of body and of will cannot confine their energies within ordinary bounds. Every now and then in Beethoven's letters and conversations we get an inkling of the disturbing force he might have been in actual life had not his deafness bound and caged him. "What a pity," he said of Napoleon after Jena, "that I am not acquainted with the science of war as I am with that of music! I would show myself his master."

* "Beethoven." By Romain Rolland. Translated by F. Rothwell, B.A. Henry J. Drane. 1s. net.

His energy, indeed, was always overwhelming. "My youth, I feel," he writes to Wegeler in 1801, "is only just beginning. . . . For some time past, my physical along with my intellectual strength has grown greater than ever"; and again, "I am happy every time I overcome something"; "I should like to live my life a thousand times over. . . . I was not made for a quiet life." As M. Rolland well expresses it, "A very contagion of courage evolves from his personality, an eager joy for the strife, the exaltation of a consciousness which feels the god within." Yet the Fates ordained, perhaps wisely, that for all this energy there was to be no outlet at all but music. "At the age of twenty-eight," he himself said in the touching "Heiligenstadt Testament" of 1802, "it is no easy matter to be forced to become a philosopher; such an obligation is even harder for the artist than for any other." It was undoubtedly hard for Beethoven. If any musician really went about the earth with a deep sense of his own mystic kinship with all created things, it was he. Like Schumann, he felt that his development as an artist was bound up with his development as a man; and he was willing to pour out upon his fellow-creatures an ideal love for humanity. "I shall be greater when you see me again," he writes to a friend in 1801. "I am not thinking of the artist alone but also of the man, who will show himself to you better and more accomplished in every way; and if there is not a little less misery in my birthplace than there used to be, my art shall be devoted entirely to improving the conditions of the poor." After the shock of losing Thérèse von Brunswick in 1810, he writes in his note-book: "Submission, absolute submission to destiny; no longer canst thou exist for thyself, only for others. . . . My God! give me strength to overcome myself." With sentiments such as these, we can understand the attraction Schiller's "Ode to Joy," with its call to universal brotherhood, had for him. Yet this was the man who was condemned by his malady to live a life almost of solitude, and who was driven by it to say at one time that the world was "altogether detestable," and at another, "I love a tree better than a man."

Even as it was, with his outer life so sadly clipped and confined, Beethoven remains one of the most interesting of musical personalities in his relation to the world. He was the first composer to dominate the environment in which he lived, instead of being dominated by it. The conditions had no doubt changed. Bach had to drag out an existence embittered by the ignorant and often unsympathetic overlordship of a small town council. Mozart ate with the servants, and was kicked out of a room by an insolent Philistine. Haydn was a musical house-servant practically all his life. When Dittersdorf, in 1760, ran away from the master whose livery he wore, he was brought back by the aid of the police, and when he was "ordered to be kept under arrest in the porter's house for a fortnight, with bread and water every fourth day," the leniency of the punishment so affected him that, as he says, "My tears choked me. I could scarcely find words to express my gratitude to so generous a Prince." The status of the musician had improved since then. But the improvement in the manner of regarding musicians as a whole does not account for the extraordinary power of Beethoven over everyone who came into contact with him; it was the personality of the man himself that lifted him into a position of contemptuous independence such as no musician in Europe had hitherto known. His refusal to take off his hat to the ducal family at Weimar, while Goethe stood bareheaded in the conventional attitude of the courtier, is typical of the granitic hardness of the man. Under no circumstances could he have become a servant like Haydn or Mozart. As Wagner said, one glance at that determined face would have been enough to deter any prince from choosing Beethoven for his Kapellmeister. He was, indeed, something new in the history of music, not only in his art, but in himself; an historical symbol as well as an individual.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE latest product of Mr. A. C. Benson's almost irritatingly prolific pen is a study in morbid pathology. "The Altar Fire" (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net) purports to be the diary of a successful man of letters, begun at a time when he has crowned all his previous achievements by writing a really great novel. Suddenly and unaccountably he is struck with sterility. He feels he can write nothing equal to his magnum opus, and is plunged into profound depression of spirit. Then all the misfortunes of Job come upon him. He loses first his only son, then his fortune, then his wife, and then his only daughter, and he is left miserable and lonely, pondering over the cruelty of his own fate and the mystery of "all this unintelligible world." The last few chapters of the book relate how he is brought into healthy relations with his kind, by contact with an invalid squire, a man of great beauty of character and calmness of outlook; and how his self-centred life is gradually made healthy and peaceful by spending itself in the service of others. In everything that Mr. Benson writes he more than half disarms criticism by his clear, limpid style—subtle, rhythmical, tender, and persuasive. And yet the book as a whole is unconvincing; the writer has not created a living character, but has only half animated a lay figure by imparting to it some phases of his own sympathetic and many-sided personality. For a few pages at a time we feel that we have got a glimpse of the inner recesses of the temple of sorrow—we think that "A wounded human spirit turns

Here, on its bed of pain."

And then the impression vanishes, and we realise that the story he tells is not the "journal intime" of a real sufferer, but only an inadequate attempt by a gifted writer to enter into experiences he has never realised for himself. "How often," he makes his diarist say in one place, "have I thought how deplorable it was to see a man issuing a series of books, everyone of which is feebler than its predecessor, dishing up the old characters, the stale ideas, the used-up background; I have always hoped that someone would be kind and brave enough to tell me when I did that." It would savour of ingratitude to one who, in "The Upton Letters," has made a unique and delightful contribution to English literature to turn these words of his own against him—at any rate, without saying that they are not in all respects applicable to the present book. It may, however, be permitted to express the hope that he may in future restrain his gift of easy utterance until he has some message for his generation fresher and more inevitable than the volume now before us. The best things in the book are a few penetrating flashes of literary criticism, but there is in it much of vapid and not a little rather feeble sentiment. The diarist is a self-centred creature, whose beautiful talk about his emotions only half conceals his essential egotism.

* * *

THE forty-six reproductions of "Drawings by Michael Angelo" (George Newnes, 7s. 6d.) preserve the outward character of the originals astonishingly well. This may be due in part to the virile nature of the latter, which enables them to suffer translation more easily than work depending wholly for its meaning on the subtler finesse of line; but it is also due to great care in the preparation of the blocks. At all events such studies as the pen and bistre figure for the "Bathers," the "Haman Dying on the Cross," and the anatomical "Study for the Dead Christ" at Windsor, lose little of their sculptural force, while the softer contrasts of the black chalk "Pietà" (Plate XXXI.), and others in the same medium are not inadequately rendered. The examples are culled from the collections at Windsor, Oxford, the British Museum, and the Louvre, and from one or two private sources, and an introduction by Mr. E. Borough Johnson voices the opinion of an artist on their characteristics and merits. There is less to be said about the half-tone plates in the "Sir Henry Raeburn" (Newnes, 3s. 6d.), though they compare favourably with those of the "Sir Thomas Lawrence" in the same series, probably on account of the stronger modelling that characterised the Scotsman's paintings. Mr. R. S. Clouston's prefatory letterpress is sympathetic and to the point. He shows that Raeburn's faculty for catching a likeness without the conscious effort required by many others constituted him a "Heaven-born portraitist," since it enabled him to devote himself to the painter-like qualities "which he primarily introduces to please himself." Mr. Clouston is not alone in deeming the full-length portrait of Dr. Nathaniel Spens as the artist's chef-d'œuvre. While Sir Walter Armstrong is disposed to rank the "Sir John Sinclair" as a more mature effort, Mr. W. McKay in his work on the "Scottish School of Painting" gives first place to the "Nathaniel Spens," and most painter critics will agree with him.

* * *

HUNTING men, especially if they belong to the older generation, will enjoy Sir Reginald Graham's "Foxhunting Recollections" (Eveleigh Nash, 10s. net). The book goes back as far as the early 'twenties, for two of the chapters are compiled from the hunting diaries kept by Sir Reginald's father, Sir Bellingham Graham, a noted sportsman, who succeeded Mr. Osbaldeston in 1821 as Master of the Quorn. The lavish scale on which he worked may be gathered from the fact that later, when offered a subscription of £700 to hunt the Hambledon country, his reply was: "Barely enough to keep me in spur leathers and blacking." Sir Reginald Graham's own recollections go back to the time of the Crimean War, when he was on active service. He retired from the Army in the "sixties," and hunted for several seasons with the Burton and Beaufort Hunts. In 1871 he became Master of the Cotswold, and afterwards, in succession, of the New Forest, the Tedworth, and the Hurworth, and, more recently, he kept a pack of harriers at Norton Conyers. It is difficult to avoid keeping dulness out of a chronicle of sport, but Sir Reginald Graham's style, if a trifle prolix, is engaging. His recollections of a number of foxhunting parsons of the old school—a type now almost extinct—add to the interest of his pages.

* * *

ANOTHER entertaining book on sport is Mr. Frederick W. Hackwood's "Old English Sports" (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net), which has also the merit of containing some good illustrations from old prints. Mr. Hackwood gives a mass of information about most forms of sport which have been popular in this country, and as he writes in an easy anecdotal style, his book may prove useful to those who shrink from more technical treatises on the subject. The predominant feeling in the reader's mind as he glances through the accounts of some of the "blood sports" treated of in the volume, is one of thanksgiving that most of them are now obsolete, though, as Mr. Hackwood points out, the law has not yet done all that it should to put down mere exhibitions of cruelty which still masquerade under the name of sport. We commend to the notice of those who like to see dogs with their ears cropped an account of how the operation is performed taken by Mr. Hackwood from the "Pall Mall Gazette." We are also glad to see that he protests against the senseless custom of "docking" dogs' tails. Dealers have persuaded the public into a belief that Dutch Schipperkes and English Bobtail Sheepdogs are born tailless. The fact is that both these breeds must have their tails removed before they stand any chance of admiration from the "fancy." If the tail is "docked" before the dog is nine days old the pain inflicted is comparatively slight—but pain there always is—while if the mutilation is deferred the pain is acute.

* * *

MR. HUBERT BLAND scarcely does himself justice in "The Happy Moralist" (Werner Laurie, 3s. 6d. net). We have, indeed, the light touch, the kindly cynicism, the tolerance, and the air of irresponsibility, which he has taught us to expect, but they are mingled with other qualities less entertaining. The catalogue of sources whence our food is derived in "The Lucky Ones," for instance, is much too long drawn out, and the reader runs some risk of boredom before its conclusion. However, boredom and Mr. Bland are ill-assorted companions; and in such essays as "A Question of Conscience" and "Her Plea of Independence," we have the Mr. Bland to whom we are accustomed. "Religion and the Child" contains some autobiographical memories of unusual interest; and in "At Hertford House" we have criticisms of the pictures and hints concerning the morals of the eighteenth century French artists. On the whole, however, these essays, though containing many shrewd thrusts and happy verdicts, lack the sparkle or the "dry" flavour we look for from Mr. Bland.

* * *

WE welcome the appearance of a new edition of the Rev. W. Tuckwell's delightful "Reminiscences of Oxford" (Smith, Elder, 6s.). The book, which is a mine of good stories, has been much enlarged by the addition of fresh chapters on Trinity and Corpus, and the introduction of the author's recollections of T. H. Green, Archbishop Temple, Frederick Meyrick, F. D. Maurice, Isaac Williams, Dean Lake, Vaughan Thomas, Warden Sewell of New College, and Monsignor Patterson. The notices of Pusey, Newman, Sir H. Acland, Provost Hawkins, and Mark Pattison have also been added to. Mr. Tuckwell is probably the oldest of living Oxonians, and forms a link between our own days and the Oxford of stage-coaches, sinecures, and bibulous Dons. His volume of genial recollections makes delightful reading from cover to cover. There hangs about it a flavour of scholarship and converse with life not often found in combination. To read it is—in the hackneyed phrase—to talk with a gentleman and a scholar.

* * *

"THE Art of Naval Warfare" (Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net) opens well with a generous dedication to Professor John Knox Laughton, whose work in unravelling the secrets of Sea Power, though unrewarded, ranks with that of Captain Mahan. Admiral Sir Cyprian Bridge was a scientific officer when the Navy was yet grasped in the firm stricture of rule of thumb. The book is a scholarly study of the lessons of naval warfare. The author believes that the only effective way of giving instruction in the art of naval warfare is to impart to the students a general notion of the art and to apply the knowledge acquired by them to the investigation of particular wars, campaigns, and sea fights. It is then possible to make deductions applicable to particular conditions, no matter how recent in date. Admiral Bridge's premises are unexceptionable; his conclusions are puerile to the shell fire of criticism. Although he "names no names," he employs his technical study of naval history as ammunition against the Admiralty. Sir Cyprian Bridge is the only prominent member of the late Syndicate of Discontent who has not accepted office under the "retrograde Admiralty." Sir Reginald Custance is Vice-Admiral of the Channel Fleet; Sir Gerard Noel is Commander-in-Chief at the Nore; and the author of this book, like the prophet of old, may say, "and I, even I only, am left." If war, as the author says, is essentially the contest of wits, preparation for war in democratic countries is a result of the struggle between the Tory and Liberal Parties in the sphere of naval warfare. Naval Tories read history in one way, naval Liberals in another. The Board of Admiralty appointed on the 21st October, 1904, was the first progressive Board since masts and marlinespikes were superseded by boilers and spanners. According to the Tory Party in the Navy, always a strong force, progress is counted as revolution, and reform as ignoring the teachings of history. The secrecy with which the "Dreadnought" was built, for example, is severely condemned by the author. He declares that official secrecy in regard to material conceals little or nothing from the future enemy. Its only effect is to keep the home public in the dark concerning the money paid by it in the form of taxes. This is the teaching of the naval Tory. We will not presume on so technical a matter as to contradict Admiral Bridge, but we note that when the "Dreadnought" was building, Germany contemplated for 1907-8 a paper programme of 70,680 tons. She actually laid down only 2,120 tons to date and a ship of last year's programme, which was postponed because the "Dreadnought" was then an experiment. To the plain man it looks very much as if the Admiralty were right in their policy of secrecy, and that Admiral Bridge's ipse dixit is not sustained by facts. There is much in this book of real value, although the veteran author gives the impression of taking himself so seriously as to mate pedantry with scholarship.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.*

On a public whose artistic perceptions are crude the subtle truth to nature and beauty of form of works of art are nearly always thrown away. The great public instinctively patronises writers who thrill it with sentimental scenes, utter its own confused ethics, or flatter its sense of national importance. The writers of this popular class, who are legion, are pained, even surprised, when a critic dismisses them with the epigram "to the mediocre mediocrity is excellent. They plead that their works interest and please a very large audience, and by this plea they define where they and their public stand, even if it cannot justify their existence. Mr. Mason's and Sir Gilbert Parker's last novels are of no account from the artistic standpoint, but as they are the work of highly popular novelists, it may be worth while enquiring why they appeal to so many thousand persons.

Of the two novels before us, Sir Gilbert Parker's is so out and away the worse that Mr. Mason's is quite acceptable by comparison. In "The Weavers: A Tale of England and Egypt of Fifty Years Ago," the atmosphere, the plot, the characters, the philosophy, are all so cheap, so journalistic in the usual sense, that the tale is hardly worth the honour of detailed analysis. To the commonplace picturesqueness of a "Christmas Supplement" are super-added a pretentiousness of tone and an emotional unreality that, from the pen of any man but Sir Gilbert Parker, would suggest insincerity. We cannot, however, charge Sir Gilbert Parker with the simulation of emotions and interests that he has not applied himself to fathom and reproduce, so we can only regret that he has taken for his subject the pure-souled magnanimity and high endeavour of a hero, for whom Gordon of Khartoum has apparently served as the exemplar. Sir Gilbert Parker modestly assures us in a prefatory note that his "book is not intended to be an historical novel, nor are its characters meant to be identified with well-known persons connected with the history of England or of Egypt." That may be, but it is unfortunate that his hero's character and aims should suggest Gordon's, while the closing scenes are practically a version of Gordon's last days in Khartoum. That much romantic stuffing should pad out the meagre bones of the narrative does not absolve an author from the critical charge of cheapening a subject that needs genuine depth of feeling and insight in the handling. For the charge that is brought against the unabashed journalist can be brought against "The Weavers." Any smart young man with a note-book, told off to "report" some grave issue of life and death, grates on our taste if he appends his trivial reflections to the "facts" he is enquiring into at lightning speed. But should he aim at fulfilling the artist's function and try and weave the contents of his note-book and his "snap-shots" of distinguished men, eked out with "local colour," into a "romance" that not only defies probability but caricatures nature, he increases his offence. What grates on us especially in "The Weavers" is that the author has travestied the most poignant situations. The young Quaker hero, David Claridge, an absurd cross between Gordon and the "Friend" of Transatlantic romance, is not possible in any of the situations Sir Gilbert Parker's colonial fancy is pleased to present us. David playing the flute in the Quaker Meeting-house before the Elders of Hamley is a picture worthy of Mr. Crockett's profitable imagination, but even Mr. Crockett, we think, would recoil from the absurdity of Chapter VI. in which the good Quaker youth becomes the favourite of the Prince Pasha of Egypt, ousts the astute Nahoum Pasha, rescues an English girl from the clutches of the sensualist Foorgat Bey (who is killed in the struggle), and then appropriately murmurs to himself: "I have taken a life, O my God. Accept mine in service for this land, for this poor land, for Christ's sake." The beauty of falsity in art is that the practitioner need only take one factor into account, the receptivity of his public. If Sir Gilbert Parker had recounted how his Egyptian Pashas rose in a body and danced an official hornpipe before the austere Quaker youth, or how Foorgat Bey was strangled before his eyes by a bevy of Nubian women, it would be all one to the generously receptive British people. As it is, the scene in which the "sullen, evil, cruel Achmet Pasha came to David to beg that he may die fighting, and for Egypt, and for thee, if it must be so," is so utterly theatrical that it is mortifying to think that it should be accepted in good faith. But so it is. Nothing is, apparently, too crudely coloured for a public which judges art by the same standards that it judges the heterogeneous contents of a sensational newspaper. To label "The Weavers" "fit for popular consumption" may seem unkind to the tastes and outlook of an audience, but we should be doing an injustice to its author if we were to class his last with those early works of his by which he first (and fairly) caught the critical ear.

In "The Broken Road" we find nothing of the shallow facility and strident assumption which characterise "The Weavers," and it is evident that Mr. Mason has made a conscientious study, to the best of his ability, of the false position in which his hero, the young Prince of Chiltistan, Shere Ali, is placed by his English education. In England Shere Ali is treated as an equal; at Eton, Oxford, and in London society everything is done to make him lose the taste for native life; but when he returns to India he has to live it, and while he finds himself a stranger among his own people, he is practically treated as an inferior by Anglo-Indians. This is the text of "The Broken Road," and we are far from denying that the novel may be useful. We sympathise with Shere Ali when, hopelessly in love with the charming white woman, Mrs. Oliver, he is told by her that though she has flirted with him and accepted his pearls in London, it is all "impossible" in Calcutta. "You know that it's impossible. We can't alter these things." But good intentions and conscientious endeavour do not necessarily produce good works of art. Though Shere Ali's skin is brown, in thought, feeling, and character he does not differ from a typical Englishman. And none of the other characters are, in fact, alive. Try as he may Mr. Mason can never force his people to tell us anything but commonplaces, or do anything but the expected thing. The situations are carefully prepared and the characters are grouped in attitudes appropriate to fighting, hating, and loving, but the one important thing, the force of nature, is lacking. The Linforths, father, mother, and son, for example, are like a wax-work group. Three generations of Linforths have devoted their lives to building the Road, the Road which goes northward through Chiltistan towards the Hindu Kush. And Linforth the second, captured by insurgent Chiltis, naturally employs his last hours in writing the expected thing to his wife—"May he meet a woman, like you, my dear, when his time comes, and love her as I love you." And again came the phrase—"I am very tired." It spoke of the boy's school, and continued: "Whether he will come out here, it is too early to think about. But the Road will not be finished—and I wonder—. If he wants to, let him! We Linforths belong to the Road." Simple and impressive, is it not? And the quality of Mr. Mason's art is always of the obvious order. The great public rejoices in the obvious, and so Mr. Mason's books seem impressive masterpieces. But to those among our readers who can tell the difference between mediocrity in art and the genuine article, we commend the study of the scene between Sybil Linforth and her son Dick Linforth. It is a good illustration of the pregnant saying, "To the mediocre mediocrity is excellent."

* "The Weavers." By Gilbert Parker. W. Heinemann. 6s.

"The Broken Road." By A. G. W. Mason. Smith, Elder, & Co. 6s.

2s. 6d. Net.

2s. 6d. Net.

Now Ready the January Issue of

THE ALBANY REVIEW

Edited by CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

CONTENTS: A Moorish Seaport—STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P.; Europe Unredeemed—THE EDITOR; Sir Richard Jebb—Prof. R. Y. TYRRELL; Transatlantic "Truth,"—Hon. BERTRAND RUSSELL; Some of Our Conventions—ELIZABETH GODFREY; The Fallacies of Collectivism—ARTHUR J. PENTY; The Character of the Anglo-Saxon—HAVELOCK ELLIS; Small Holdings: An Object-Lesson—Rev. A. E. T. NEWMAN; Abbe's Theory of Industry—The late B. KIRKMAN GRAY; The Greek Epic—JANE HARRISON, Litt.D.; The Celestial Omnibus—E. M. FORSTER; Current Events.

London: JOHN LANE, The Bodley Head, Vigo Street, W.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

WHAT MEN ARE SAYING.

WHAT MEN ARE DOING.

SEE... WHAT MEN ARE THINKING.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Every Friday. Twopence.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of "Public Opinion" is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines, and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political, and social progress.

"Public Opinion" can be obtained from any newsagent or book-stall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d., and to any place abroad for 13s. per annum. Orders should be addressed to:—

"PUBLIC OPINION,"

30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

JANUARY.

During 1908

I'll Drink

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

The Week in the City.

I MUST apologise for omitting my usual article last week; but even a financial writer must occasionally take a holiday, and in Christmas week there is very little to write about in the City unless one chooses to indulge in retrospects and forecasts. Perhaps after offering this apology I may now be allowed to atone by making a few remarks on the situation as it stands both for investors and traders. It is still indeed rather obscure owing to the uncertainty about America and Germany. Will the United States now gradually recover its balance, and will Germany scrape through its banking and trade difficulties without more than an unusually large crop of private failures? If these questions can be answered in the affirmative we may feel fairly hopeful. In any case people who remember Lord Rothschild's advice not to try to buy at the very bottom have had and will have for some weeks, if not months, to come, ample opportunities for purchases which are certain to look well in a year or two. It has, of course, been a splendid year for trade, though it may be doubted whether the profits have been proportionate to the increased volume. The costs of living and the costs of raw material have been so high that neither the workpeople have really enjoyed their higher wages, nor the manufacturers their higher prices. Lancashire and West Riding have, no doubt, had real prosperity and the mills are still fairly busy. Agriculture also has done extremely well. We have had splendid crops of everything, and there ought to be a much better demand than usual from the country districts for warm clothing. This should help to arrest the downward movement of trade. In Glasgow the outlook for ship-building is very bad, and there is much unemployment. London has never recovered from the war. High taxation and dear money hit her merchants and builders very hard. But there may be a revival in a month or two; for it is quite possible, after the reduction in the Bank Rate, that a spell of cheap money will come in the Spring.

MR. LAWSON ON AMERICAN FINANCE.

Messrs. Blackwood have just published a second edition of Mr. W. R. Lawson's book on American Finance, and the re-publication is undoubtedly opportune. As this most prolific of financial writers justly observes, since the autumn of 1906 when the first edition appeared, "A series of convulsions in the financial world have fully justified the warnings it contained."

In 1907 New York has seen two panics—the Wall Street panic of March and the Banking panic of October. The recoil of these catastrophes on American trade and industry has produced a deadlock which Mr. Lawson thinks may not be overcome for years.

Mr. Lawson is not a very accurate reasoner and many of his conclusions are erroneous. He seems to see more or less that the troubles of the Americans are largely due to trusts and that the trusts are the creations of the tariff. But he has not yet realised that the only way to purify American life and to restore honesty to American commerce or the confidence of the public in American banks is to sweep away the protective tariff. Such indeed is the confusion of his mind that while he inveighs against the Trusts he introduces his invective by congratulating the Yankees on being "wholly free from the Cobden fetish which has paralysed economic science in England." As a matter of fact, the best minds in America are rapidly awakening to the necessity for a Cobden fetish. The ground is being prepared for a great Free Trade movement and from what I can see and hear it is quite possible that the coming Presidential Elections may turn on Free Trade. For example, the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce has just passed, by big majorities, two resolutions demanding large and immediate reductions of the tariff. However, Mr. Lawson's book is readable and contains a good deal of interesting information. It is a little unfortunate that the second edition contains nothing new except the preface—not even an index.

FROM SEVEN TO SIX PER CENT.

A fortnight or even a week ago there was no prospect of any immediate reduction of the Bank Rate; but the fact that the Bank was able at the beginning of this week to secure the large supplies of gold available in the open market without difficulty opened up a hopeful prospect, and discount rates fell away sharply. There was much uncertainty, however, until the last moment. But a prominent banker put the matter very well early on Thursday morning when he said, in answer to a question, that unless the directors had some secret piece of bad news they would certainly not be justified in retaining any longer such a tax upon the trade of the country. The Stock markets did not respond to the stimulus. American prices are considerably above the lowest now, and there must be a tremendous amount of liquidation to be got through before banks and their customers are at all straight. Hence, no doubt, the sharp relapse in the Yankee market on Thursday. I think the directors were confirmed in their decision by an impression that the financial situation in Germany is less critical, though a number of commercial failures are still expected. It is curious to notice the pessimistic reviews of trade in the German Press, and the strenuous language in which the tariff is denounced for the exorbitant prices of bread and meat. Apparently, also, coal is much costlier there than here, and altogether the outlook both for employers and employed in Germany is very black just now.

DRIFTING TOWARDS CASH PAYMENTS.

Once more the currency premium is reported to be disappearing and the deficit of the New York Banks has been materially reduced. From a commercial and manufacturing point of view there is no improvement. But when once the banks have resumed cash payments, and those which cannot do so have been definitely suspended, trade ought to mend slowly. But for weeks and, perhaps, months the receivers will be busy and it is quite expected here that some big railways will have to throw up the sponge before long. This should be borne in mind by investors and they should take care in buying debentures to select lines that have a good margin.

REVENUE RETURNS AND TRADE OUTLOOK.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government and the Liberal Party in the House of Commons have suddenly received an unmistakeable warning that the fat years are coming to an end, and that the continuance of naval and military extravagance may speedily lead them into a morass as deep and fatal as that which engulfed their predecessors. So, at least, I read the figures, and I sincerely hope that these, coming on the top of the financial and monetary crisis, will have a sobering and salutary effect. The reports from the trade centres almost all speak of an actual or prospective decline of activity, and this is borne out by the fact that in the third quarter of the year almost every department of revenue shows a decline. It is just possible, however, that the tone of these reports would have been rather more cheerful had the writers been aware that the first week of the New Year would have seen a reduction of the Bank Rate to 6 per cent.

LUCCELLUM.

MR. A. R. ORAGE has set himself the task of popularising Nietzsche among English readers. His little book, "Nietzsche, the Diophysian Spirit of the Age," introduced the German philosopher to many who would otherwise not have heard of his amazing theories. Mr. Orage now publishes "Nietzsche in Outline and Aphorism" (Feulis, 2s. 6d. net), an excellent collection of Nietzsche's striking aphorisms grouped under separate heads, Philosophy, Life, Man and Woman, Art, Morality, Good and Evil, Superman, &c., each introduced by an essay containing a brief statement of Nietzsche's views on the subject. Unlike Mr. Common, whose "Selections from Nietzsche," now issued by the De la More Press, is chiefly made up of extracts from the longer works, Mr. Orage confines himself to the aphorisms, a form in which—whatever else we may think about him—Nietzsche was one of the greatest masters. Mr. Orage has made his selection with care and judgment. His book gives an excellent summary of Nietzsche's teaching which many who are puzzled by "Thus Spake Zarathustra," or the still more wayward "Genealogy of Morals," will be glad to possess.

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW

London & County Banking Company, Limited

REGISTERED UNDER "THE COMPANIES ACTS."

ESTABLISHED IN 1836.

CAPITAL - £8,000,000, in 100,000 Shares of £80 each.
Paid-up Capital, £2,000,000. Reserve Fund, £1,550,000.

Directors.

JOHN ANNAN BRYCE, Esq., M.P.
JOHN JAMES CATER, Esq.
ERNEST H. CUNARD, Esq.
VISCOUNT GOSCHEN.
C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.
CHARLES JOHN HEGAN, Esq.
WILLIAM E. HUBBARD, Esq.

SIR THOMAS JACKSON, BART.
WM. MCKEWAN, Esq. (Honorary Director).
OSWALD CECIL MAGNIAC, Esq.
WILLIAM G. RATHBONE, Esq.
CHARLES J. CATER SCOTT, Esq.

Auditors.

HENRY GRANT, Esq. THOMAS HORWOOD, Esq.
Hon. STUART PLEYDELL-BOUVERIE.
Head Office Manager—HERMAN RICHARD WYATT.
Deputy Head Office Manager—FREDERICK JAMES BARTHORPE.
Country Manager—WILLIAM G. ORGE GRIBBLE.
Chief Inspector—FRANK WILLIAM HOWETT.
Chief Accountant—HEOPHILUS JAMES CARPENTER.
Secretary—ELGAR FRANCIS ROBINSON.

Head Office: 21, LOMBARD STREET, E.C.

THE LONDON AND COUNTY BANKING COMPANY, LIMITED.

Opens DRAWING ACCOUNTS with Commercial Houses and Private Individuals, upon the plan usually adopted by Bankers.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS.—Deposit Receipts are issued for sums of Money placed upon these Accounts, and Interest is allowed at such rates as advertised, reference being had to the state of the Money Market.

CIRCULAR NOTES AND LETTERS OF CREDIT are issued payable in the principal Cities and Towns of the Continent. Letters of Credit are also issued payable in Australia, Canada, India, China, the United States, and elsewhere.

The Agency of Foreign and Country Banks is undertaken.

The Purchase and Sale of Government and other Stocks, also of English and Foreign Shares, are effected. Dividends, Annuities, &c., are received for Customers of the Bank.

Great facilities are afforded to the Customers of the Bank for the receipt of Money both from and in the Towns where the Company has Branches.

The following Banks will receive and transmit, free of charge, credits for customers of this Bank:—Barclay and Co., Ltd.; Capital and Counties Bank, Ltd.; Lloyds Bank, Ltd.; London City and Midland Bank, Ltd.; and National Provincial Bank of England, Ltd.

The Officers of the Bank are bound not to disclose the transactions of any of its Customers.

By Order of the Directors,
E. F. ROBINSON, Secretary.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees
One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL COLLECTIONS OF FLOWERING BULBS AND ROOTS.

Producing a most effective Display.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL COLLECTION OF BULBS.

No. 1. For the Open Ground. Price 15/- 25 Anemones, finest mixed; 200 Crocus, in four colours; 13 Daffodils, double; 25 Daffodils, single; 24 Tulips, double, finest mixed; 24 Tulips, single; 24 Hyacinths, in three colours; 25 Iris, finest mixed; 25 Jonquils, Major; 25 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, Polyanthus, mixed; 12 Narcissus, double white; 24 Ranunculus, finest mixed; 100 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 50 Scillas; 12 Allium Neapolitanum.

No. 2. For the Open Ground. Price 7/6. 12 Anemones, finest mixed; 150 Crocus, in four colours; 25 Tulips, double finest, mixed; 25 Tulips, single; 12 Hyacinths, in three colours; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 12 Daffodils, single; 12 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, double white; 60 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 12 Jonquils, single Major; 25 Scillas.

No. 3. For the Open Ground. Price 4/- 25 Snowdrops, selected; 100 Crocus, choice mixed; 25 Tulips, finest mixed; 12 Daffodils, double; 12 Narcissus, finest mixed; 12 Scillas; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 4. For the Open Ground. Price 2/6. 12 Snowdrops, selected; 50 Crocus, choice mixed; 12 Tulips, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 6 Narcissus, finest mixed; 6 Scillas; 6 Iris, finest mixed; 3 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 5. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 16/- 24 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 24 Tulips, named varieties; 100 Crocus, choice named varieties; 6 Early White Roman Hyacinths; 3 Lillium Harrisii; 12 Freesias; 24 Scilla Siberica; 50 Double Snowdrops.

No. 6. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 8/- 12 Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyanthus, Narcissus; 2 Lillium Harrisii; 18 Tulips, named varieties; 50 Crocus, choice named varieties; 12 Scilla Siberica; 6 Freesias; 25 Snowdrops; 3 Early White Roman Hyacinths.

No. 7. Popular Collection for the Open Ground. Price 1/- Containing 30 or more Bulbs of the following popular kinds—Snowdrops, selected; Crocus, choice mixed; Tulips, finest mixed; Daffodils, double; Narcissus, finest mixed; Scillas; Iris, finest mixed; Hyacinth, choice.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, Ltd. Name and address of nearest local agent, Catalogues and other details post free on application to Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed War-houses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL BULBS

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

NOW READY THE JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY,"
6d. NET. GIVING PARTICULARS OF THE LAST
BOOKS OF THE YEAR.

APART FROM THE USUAL FEATURES THIS
NUMBER INCLUDES A LONG AND SEASON-
ABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE
BY FOURTEEN OF THE MOST POPULAR
WRITERS FOR THE YOUNG.

Begin the New Year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly,"
a Specimen Copy of which you can get on application to the Publishers, Simpkin Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court,
London.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

THACKERAY HOTEL, Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones, Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses—

Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London." Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENCADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE S.S. 1/6 PRIZE BIBLE.

With 29 beautifully coloured Photographic Views and Pictures from the Old Masters. Maps. Handsomely bound in crimson grained cloth, red under gold edges. 1/6, post free; 6 copies for 8/6 post free. Also in crimson morocco at 2/-, post free; 6 copies for 11/6, post free. Also with References and 59 Pictures 2/-, post free.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE, 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

CHOICE BOOKS

are presents which give the most lasting pleasure.

The book-lover will find a mine of wealth in rare and choice editions in my Xmas Catalogue, sent free on request.

FRANK HOLLINGS, Great Turnstile, Holborn.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To secure FRIENDS AND FRIENDSHIPS, join the CORRESPONDENCE CLUB, 10/6, and the ENGLISH-SPEAKERS' LINK, 2/6, of 350, Mansion House Chambers, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANSGATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENCADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: *Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.*BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, Baldock, Hertfordshire.

FOR THE EDUCATION OF BOYS AND GIRLS.

Principal—Mrs. ENNIS RICHMOND (Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," &c.).

Head Master—Mr. KENNETH RICHMOND.

SPRING TERM begins January 14th.

"A Natural Education," the Report of a Lecture by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls, may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d.; single copy, 4d. post-paid.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 9d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

EDUCATIONAL.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER, B.A., Camb.ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.; NEXT TERM, JANUARY 15th.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Headmaster, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

ST. GEORGE'S PUBLIC CO-EDUCATIONAL SCHOOL, HARPENDEN, HERTS.

Headmaster—REV. CECIL GRANT, M.A.

The Spring Term begins on January 16th, 1908.

For Prospectus apply to "The Co-EDUCATIONAL PUBLIC SCHOOLS TRUST, LTD., 41, Moorgate Street, E.C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

TWO GREAT BOOKS

COKE OF NORFOLK

STATESMAN, sportsman, agricultural expert, friend of Fox, enemy of George IV., Coke of Norfolk has furnished posterity with material that falls seldom to the lot of any biographer. The work is not merely the story of a wonderful man; it is in itself a history, and the brilliant sidelights thrown upon men and things reflect not only a criticism of life, but life indeed.

¶ The Academy says:—"This life is so thoroughly well done, so carefully ordered, so reasonable in its judgments, and so well written . . . the result is entirely satisfactory, always interesting, and delightful to read. A review of a good book should send people to the book itself . . . and I trust I have said enough of this most interesting book to make my readers get it for themselves."

¶ The Athenæum says:—"Mrs. Stirling writes her praise admirably. . . . The book is of distinct social and historical value, confirming and, sometimes, supplementing such works as the Greville, Creecey, and Albemarle Papers. It is also remarkably entertaining, and should provide a profitably quarry for the anecdotist."

COKE OF NORFOLK AND HIS FRIENDS

BY A. M. W. STIRLING. WITH 20 PHOTOGRAVURE AND UPWARDS OF 40 OTHER ILLUSTRATIONS, REPRODUCED FROM CONTEMPORARY PORTRAITS, PRINTS, ETC. DEMY 8vo. TWO VOLUMES. 32s. NET.

HUBERT AND JOHN VAN EYCK

CRITICS and general readers alike pronounce Mr. W. H. James Weale's great work monumental. The result of upwards of fifty years' research, it is no mere excuse for a book, but rather the "last word" on the famous couple at the present time, and the certain foundation for any future studies based on the same subject. Forty-one of the plates are in photogravure.

¶ The Daily Mail says:—"Among the great mass of art books which are being turned out by the publishing houses in ever increasing numbers there are but three or four a year that are of permanent value to the student . . . that represent the result of life-long devotion to some particular subject . . . to this class belongs Mr. W. H. James Weale's imposing volume."

HUBERT AND JOHN VAN EYCK

THEIR LIFE AND WORK. . . . BY W. H. JAMES WEALE.
WITH 150 ILLUSTRATIONS. . . . QUARTO. . . . 105s. NET.

6/-

NOTABLE NOVELS

6/-

OPEN HATCHWAYS

By THE HON. HENRY COKE.

MR. COKE, octogenarian son of the great Coke of Norfolk, has previously been known chiefly as the author of "Tracks of a Rolling Stone." In "Open Hatchways" he has produced a novel of indubitable merit; an interesting and absorbing story is told in a delicate and graceful style.

¶ The Daily Telegraph says:—"There is more than a touch of Disraeli in this admirably written and constructed novel."

THE WINE OF LIFE

By MAUDE ANNESLEY

THIS is a novel of love and passion and desire. The story of a woman of nerves and temperament cruelly misunderstood. Maude Annesley writes with an understanding of the curious blend of angel, fool, and devil that composes man and woman alike, and a psychological insight into the subtlety of feminine thought and action; more, she has the "sorrowful great gift of laughter" and tears.

¶ The Daily Graphic says:—"A most surprising book."

¶ The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"The story is full of life and interest, and the startling dénouement is led up to with considerable skill. The character of Lady Branton's faithful friend is admirably drawn, and the girl is as fascinating as she is loyal in her friendship. The book will certainly find readers."

THE SON OF THE BONDWOMAN

By EMELIA PARDO BAZAN

LIFE in Spain in the sixties is depicted with wonderful effect in E. H. Hearn's translation of Emilia Pardo Bazan's clever and realistic romance. The leading character—the priest—is drawn with pathos, power and tenderness rare and unusual.

¶ The Nation says:—"Beautiful in its fresh force of feeling."

¶ The Daily Chronicle says:—"A refreshing change from the stock English novel . . . it has the spontaneity of a freshly written romance."

THE MALICE OF THE STARS

By E. W. DE GUERIN

THERE is much to interest and attract in "The Malice of the Stars," wherein is shown the varying fortunes sometimes endured by those whom the gods love most.

¶ The Athenæum says:—"In Mr. de Guérin we seem to have one who should go far . . . a plot of cunning structure told with much delightful humour and real insight into character . . . the dramatis personæ are excellently portrayed."

ASK ALSO AT THE LIBRARY OR BOOKSELLER FOR "PAINTED SHADOWS," BY RICHARD LE GALLIENNE; "THE WINGLESS VICTORY," BY M. P. WILCOCKS; "THE STRONGEST PLUME," BY HUGH DE SELINCOURT; "THE CONCLUSIONS OF AN EVERY-DAY WOMAN," BY HILDEGARDE GORDON BROWNE.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 15.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 517	A Crowd's Grievance. By "A Spectator" 533
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 534
The Government and International Peace ... 520	Books to be Read 534
The New "Times" 521	THE DRAMA:—
The Re-Making of America... 522	A Modern "Mystery" Play.
A Contemporary Myth ... 523	By M. 536
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	POETRY:—
Money. By John Galsworthy 525	To the World and a Poet a Thousand Years Hence. By James Flecker 537
The Boy and Girl School ... 527	ART:—
The Life of a Fox 528	Old Masters at Burlington House 537
The Making of a Village Library 529	REVIEWS:—
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	The Creed of a Catholic Liberal. II. By H. F. ... 538
"The Recurrence of Disease." By J. H. 530	A Precis of the Late Reign ... 539
"The Decline of the Oxford Movement." By "A Man in the Street" 531	Mother's History of Painting. By Professor Waldstein ... 540
The Black Death in Spain. By Sir Robert A. Hudson ... 531	Salmon and Salmon Fishing ... 541
"Premature Burial." By Basil Tozer and "Live and Let Live" 531	The New Theology 542
"The Virgin Birth." By "Your Reviewer" 532	The Great French Story-teller. By T. H. 543
The Real Irish Question. By Robert Lynd 532	A Book of Genius 544
"The Best Children's Books." By Richard Franklin Jupp 532	BOOKS IN BRIEF 546
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 548

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

It has been announced that Mr. Arthur Pearson, the director of the "Standard," the "Express," and some obscure and trivial publications, and also an active promoter of Protection, has been appointed managing director of the "Times." Mr. Arthur Walter, the fourth member of the Walter dynasty, which has conducted the "Times," with one interval, since 1788, becomes Chairman of the Board. Other new shareholders are said by the "Daily Chronicle" to be Lord Brassey, Lord Rothschild, Lord Iveagh, and Lord Strathcona, but we believe that the largest new shareholder will be Sir Alexander Henderson, who, like Mr. Pearson, is an active Tariff Reformer and a member of the Tariff Commission. The additional capital, which is said to be £200,000, is not a large fund for the sustenance of a newspaper of the character and size of the "Times." There appears to have been a conflict between the Protectionist and Free Trade interest on the paper, which would have ended happily for the "Times" in the appointment of Mr. J. A. Spender, the editor of the "Westminster Gazette." Mr. Pearson's appointment must be held to settle the dispute, but Lord Brassey and Sir Edward Tennant are Free Traders, and we have reason to believe that the "Times" will retain its nominal abstinence from merely partisan journalism. Mr. Buckle, the present editor, is, we understand, retained, but Mr. Moberly Bell, the manager and the protagonist in the Battle of Books, will leave. This implies the close of the war with the publishers, and the maintenance of the "Times" Book Club, if it is maintained, on lines which they will accept.

* * *

THE danger of a great industrial war in the cotton trade is still imminent, and a new effort of State mediation may be necessary. A general lock-out of operatives will be declared in all mills controlled by the Employers' Federation on January 18th, in the absence of an agreement. The dispute centres round the demand of the Oldham "ring" spinners, who are women workers, for a rise in their admittedly low scale of wages. The masters have denounced this demand as a breach of the Brooklands agreement, a point which the Crown lawyers, when appealed to, have left open. The dispute has been aggravated by the action of the workers in two of the Oldham mills in sending in their strike notices; while, on their side, the Federation seek the support of non-federated employers for a general closing of mills. Their contention is that workers in individual mills have no right to force the hands of the whole industry, bound as it is by a general agreement. This is a strong contention; but, on the other hand, it seems a hard policy to make 200,000 people responsible for the action of about 700. We are glad to know that the latest news suggests the probability of a settlement. The question whether the action of the ring spinners has violated the Brooklands agreement may be referred to arbitration. The point will probably be submitted to Lord James of Hereford, who has well earned the confidence of masters and men by his work and methods as an arbitrator.

* * *

A TREMENDOUS sensation was caused in New York on Tuesday by the arrest of Mr. Augustus Heinze—until lately "the Copper King"—on a charge of illegally certifying a cheque on the Mercantile National Bank for 62,768 dollars. He is also charged with illegally certifying other cheques to the value of 400,000 dollars on or about October 14th. At the time of the alleged offence Heinze was President of the Mercantile National Bank, which he and Morse controlled in order, it is supposed, to bolster up their copper corner. He resigned the Presidency on October 14th. The charge illustrates what is believed to be a prevalent vice of American banking—the habit, we mean, of those who control banks borrowing from them on favourable terms. It is one of the subtlest forms of corruption, and its existence amply justifies the nervousness of depositors. The abuse probably exists in a greater or less degree in all countries, and we should like now to see a statue passed providing that no person connected with the control or management of a bank should be allowed a loan or overdraft.

* * *

A REMARKABLE, but not altogether unexpected, development of the San Francisco "graft" scandals was reported in Friday's papers. Ex-Mayor Schmitz, one of the two chief "bosses" of the bribery syndicate, has been acquitted by the State Court. This is really a triumph of cynicism, since Schmitz and several of his chief accomplices long ago confessed everything. It means that the gang which captured the municipality also captured the law courts. For although Schmitz and Ruef posed as Labour leaders in San Francisco, they were in State politics the "bosses" of the Republican caucus. The local Republican party, from the Governor and the Judges, whom it nominated, down to the police officers, is evidently determined to stand by its chiefs, even in adversity. Public opinion is in all probability a negligible factor, largely because it is convinced that the group which has exposed Schmitz and Ruef is merely a rival gang of "grafters." The Harriman group, entrenched in the railways and other "franchises," is also bound to prevent the punishment of the men who accepted the bribes which it is supposed to have paid. "Graft" on this scale is something more than a local or accidental phenomenon. It is an inseparable accompaniment of the development of monopolist finance on American lines.

* * *

THE Belgian Cabinet, since the death of M. de Trooz, has been reconstituted under M. Schollaert, an ex-Minister and the President of the Chamber. He is said to command the confidence of the whole Catholic party, largely because he is believed to hold fairly liberal views on the Congo question. It is expected that he will insist on altering the King's proposals regarding the Crown Domain. These concessions may not suffice to conciliate the Liberals and Socialists. But the Catholics, if unanimous, can impose their own solution.

* * *

MR. GLADSTONE made an interesting reply on Wednesday to a deputation of the Mining Association of Great Britain, who desired an amendment of the Eight Hours Bill. Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis, the Secretary of the Association, made three points. He disputed the careful estimate of Mr. Rea's Committee that the eight hours day would mean a reduction of working time by 10·27 per cent., and declared that the reduction of hours would amount to 13·72 per cent., with a loss of output of nearly 34½ million tons per annum. Mr. Ellis, however, did not mention that the Committee considered that in time the entire reduction of output would be made up by increased efficiency of labour and of labour organisation. Mr. Ellis's second point was that the time occupied in bringing the miners down to their work and bringing them up again ought not to be counted in the eight hours day, which should be reckoned from the face of the mine, and not from the bank. His third point was that the cutting-down of the working day could only come into force after the mine-owners had been given time to make their arrangements. Mr. Gladstone's answer pointed out that the deputation did not resist the principle of the Government's action, which had overwhelming Parliamentary authority behind it. The case for the Bill, indeed, was so generally admitted that the only member of the Opposition who last year spoke on the Bill of the Miners' Federation urged the Government to adopt it on the spot. The Home Secretary did not depart from the principle of the Ministerial Bill, which provides an eight hours day from bank to bank, but hinted that the attitude of some of the miners suggested a compromise. This may be provided by the proposal of "Mabon," the Welsh miners' leader, that the time taken up by one winding might be included in the eight hours day, but not the other; in other words, that the normal working day should consist not of eight hours, but of eight and a half hours.

* * *

THE Bishop of Hereford, having examined the case against the new regulations for secondary schools, writes to the "Times," with equal breadth and force, on the new scheme of rules for training colleges. As to the existing colleges, the Bishop points out that as the Church of England now contributes only about five per cent. to the cost of maintenance, whilst the State and fees provide 95 per cent., the time has come for the opening of their doors to students of all denominations. This change the new regulations effect. As the Bishop says, they maintain denominational management, staff, teaching, worship, and atmosphere undisturbed. As for the new colleges, while the general tendency of the regulations is that teaching shall be, in the Bishop's words, "in the spirit of Christian unity," they leave parents of students free to obtain denominational teaching by applying to the governing body. On the general moral effect of the rigid denominational system the Bishop writes with great force:—

"The separatist, sectarian, denominationalist tendency to segregate our children into rival pens for all religious instruction (he says) may produce Pharisees, but hardly Christians. Indeed, this denominationalist spirit which has taken such a strong hold on some sections of our clergy and a few laymen, is doing much harm to the national Church and the national life."

* * *

MR. HALDANE, speaking on Women's Suffrage at Glasgow on Wednesday, declared that we were advancing year by year to a condition in which it would be difficult to withhold it. But the change was so important that it must be clear that a large preponderance of voices called for it. The inevitability of Women's Suffrage Mr. Haldane traced to the fact that modern life continually opened up fresh avenues to women, including the professions; but the Suffragettes were unwise to wage a kind of "bodkin" war against men, who, before such tactics, became sullen and resistant. Which is really equivalent to saying that men possess much the kind of character that they attribute to women.

* * *

WE are sorry to find that some of the railway companies interested in the settlement are approaching their non-unionist servants, and suggesting the payment of the expenses of the delegates to the Conciliation Boards. We cannot understand how Lord Claud Hamilton can maintain that this action does not violate the spirit of the Lloyd-George agreement. Lord Claud must know that the representatives of the directors raised this question during the Conference. Mr. Lloyd-George at once told the objectors that it was unfair to the union, which would never accept it, and that it qualified the freedom of the delegates. The point was conceded, and the proposal that the railway companies should pay the delegates' expenses was withdrawn. Why should it be revived now in the case of the non-union men? Lord Claud suggests the reason when he says that, the non-union men, having no fund for the raising of expenses, their delegates will have recourse to the union. This is possible, though we imagine that non-union men can act together for so simple a purpose. But the statement of the difficulty shows that the directors would be wise to recognise with frankness that trade unionism cannot be shut out from the railway services.

* * *

THERE has been a change of some importance in the personnel of the Prime Minister's Secretaries. Mr. Arthur Ponsonby has resigned his position as first secretary, and his place has been taken by Mr. Vaughan Nash, the second secretary. Mr. Nash's old place is to be filled by Mr. Herbert Montgomery of the Foreign Office, a very proper step in view of the immense complications of modern government and the difficulty which a Prime Minister must experience in following the tangled threads of exterior policy. Mr. Ponsonby's loss is serious, for though the present Prime Minister has assigned his secretary a less commanding position than did his predecessor, he has great responsibilities, and it would be hard to imagine a more admirable temperament or a better-equipped personality than Mr. Ponsonby's. Happily his successor, Mr. Nash, shares these qualities and adds some of his own.

* * *

A MEETING in support of the claims of the British Indians in the Transvaal was held in London on Thursday, with Lord Ampthill in the chair. Resolutions were passed protesting against the deportation of Indians as a penalty for refusing to register, and calling on the Government to instruct Lord Selborne to revise the order. The speeches were chiefly moderate and more extreme resolutions were lost, but Mr. Harold Cox disputed Lord Ampthill's proposition that South Africa must be retained as a white man's country, a place for the reception of the European overflow. This, of course, is the point. At present South Africa is hardly a white man's country, and if all the coloured merchants, traders, and workers, skilled and unskilled, black, brown, and yellow, withdrew from labour in a body, the community would cease to exist. The real question is, what political terms the coloured working classes of South Africa are to obtain in exchange for their indispensable economic services. This question Cape Colony has answered rationally by giving rights to coloured men—education in exchange for taxation, and a limited franchise, based partly on property and partly on culture. All the other States, while taxing the coloured element heavily, withhold education, deny the vote, refuse citizenship, and insist on extending the insignia of servitude from the more child-like Bantu races to the Asiatics, including the King's subjects. This is the true case of the British Indians in the Transvaal, not the precise character of the system of registration and deportation which Lord Milner initiated and the present Government has perfected.

* * *

THE Free Trade Unionists are suffering from the consequences of Mr. Balfour's Protectionist declarations at Birmingham. The Tariff Reformers have clearly decided to interpret those declarations not merely as conveying Mr. Balfour's personal adhesion to their cause, but as giving them the right to bring the Free Trade Unionists into line with at least the principles of Tariff revision, or to exclude them from party candidatures. This kind of pressure appears to have been applied to Lord Henry Bentinck at South Nottingham. Lord Henry, hitherto a Free Trader, had declared that he was no nearer Protection than he was a year ago, and was opposed to the taxation of food. This brought into action not only the local Tariff Reformers, but a body calling itself the Confederacy Club, whose agent visited Nottingham. Interrogated afresh, Lord Henry made the following concessions, which indicate, we fancy, the line that many of the weaker members of the Free Trade section in Nottingham are adopting.

"If selected as candidate for South Nottingham, I will be prepared to vote for a 10 per cent. tariff on foreign manufactured goods.

"Whilst objecting in principle to any taxation on corn or food-stuffs, I will refrain from voting against such taxation."

With this declaration the "Confederacy Club," whose organisation is said to be "backed up by wealthy men," expresses itself fairly content, if it is made good. But should it be qualified or withdrawn, Lord Henry will at once see a Protectionist rival in the field.

* * *

ON Tuesday the directors of the Road Car Company issued an ultimatum to their employés, who have gone on strike to the number of a thousand, declaring that, unless they returned to work by nine on Thursday morning, their licences would be returned, and they would be dismissed from the company's service. The cause of the strike is a change in the method of paying the men's wages, the company having decided that in future payment must depend upon the number of journeys completed, and not on the hours during which the men are engaged. This method would be equitable enough, provided motor-omnibuses were safe from breakdown, and therefore from delays caused by no fault of the drivers. The directors contend that many of the stoppages have been due to carelessness or negligence, and they believe that the adoption of piece work will lessen these inconveniences of which the public complain. It is suggested that it would not be difficult to devise a system of inspection, by which the responsibility for accidents to the machinery could be placed on the right shoulders. The directors, however, decline to consider this proposal; and at the time of writing there is no likelihood of a settlement.

* * *

M. PICHOV's visits to Madrid presumably mark a new departure in the development of the Moroccan question. France and Spain have for some time worked as ill together as France and England did, after Gambetta's fall in Egypt. It may be possible to give reality to their nominal partnership, but in what direction? It is believed that the plan of policing the coast towns with European troops is likely to be revived—a plan not contemplated in the Algeciras arrangement. The Sultan, moreover, is seeking, apparently with official approval, a loan of six millions sterling in Paris. Clearly an indebtedness so considerable, with resources so meagre, would entail a degree of control hardly removed from a protectorate. In Berlin it is said that while the Sultan has every right to seek money in Paris, the money once obtained must be transferred to the international Bank created at Algeciras, that is to say, internationalised. There are here unpleasant possibilities of conflict. Meanwhile, the forward movement goes on behind Casa Blanca, and the French vanguard is now twenty-three miles from the coast. Opinion is uneasy, and M. Leroy-Beaulieu, an ardent Colonial, a keen advocate of the conquest and exploitation of the Sahara, is preaching the abandonment of Morocco.

* * *

THE Consul-General for Roumania sends us an interesting account of projected legislation against drunkenness and the indiscriminate sale of alcohol in rural districts in that country. A Bill which has been drawn up by M. Sturdza, the Prime Minister, reserves the right of retailing alcohol exclusively to the communal (local) authorities. It limits the number of public-houses to one per 150 heads of families, or, reckoning five persons to each household, one per 750 of the population, though there is a provision that a public-house may be opened in a hamlet of more than fifty houses should there be no other within a radius of five kilometres. The regulations for the conduct of these communal public-houses are most drastic, and a committee of administration will be formed in each village to see that they are acted upon. By a clause of the Bill, the profit made from the sale of alcoholic drinks will become part of the ordinary income of the village, and will be applied to the improvement of rural schools, churches, infirmaries, roads, plantations, and in other similar ways. This promising attempt to solve many of the problems connected with the drink traffic deserves to be watched with close attention by reformers.

* * *

AFTER six days' play, the slow procession of facts that we call a Test Match, came to an exciting close. On Tuesday, the sixth day, England, wanting 282 runs to win, opened the day's play with a loss of four of her best batsmen, and with 123 runs to get. Her chance of victory seemed to disappear when Braund, Hardstaff, Rhodes, and Crawford lost their wickets, and the match depended on the wicket-keeper, Humphries, and Barnes and Fielder, the bowlers. These three men had to make 73 runs between them, and the last pair, neither of whom is an expert batsman, were called on for 39 runs. The best cricketers usually fail under the combined strain on nerve and skill which a very close game entails, for bowling and fielding, when victory is almost within the grasp of the attacking team, are usually at their best. Probably a pair of first-rate batsmen would have failed through sheer timidity; but the English Eleven won, and their feat redeemed a match marred by the intolerable caution of both sides.

* * *

THE eighth Exhibition of "The International" has attracted a host of distinguished Continental painters, the French impressionist school being particularly well represented. Nothing, on the other hand, comes from Zuloaga or Anglada-Camarasa, and the absence of these unconventional artists robs the New Gallery of a certain piquant, if not always pleasant, element. Signor Zuloaga, however, has been painted at full length by M. Blanche, and there are many other compensations for the loss of pictures from his own vigorous brush and that of his compatriot.

Politics and Affairs.

THE GOVERNMENT AND INTERNATIONAL PEACE.

THE publication of a belated blue-book on the Hague Conference has thrown a flood of perplexing twilight upon the international situation. The embarrassment of our Government and of other Governments in the chaos of naval laws and practices is exhibited in the confusion caused by the emergence of an international prize court. But behind all stands the tremendous and ever-growing problem of armaments, a problem whose economic side is more and more powerfully revealed as it is seen to threaten the stability of Governments from Japan to Russia and from Russia to Germany and even to Great Britain. In the face of so pressing and staggering a question, the arguments, or, rather, the excuses, which Sir Edward Grey puts forward for refusing assent to the proposal for releasing peaceful private property at sea from the risk of destruction or capture, seem lame and half-hearted. It is clear that there were stalwarts in the Cabinet who agreed with the overwhelming opinion of commercial men and of the Liberal members of Parliament, that this was a proposal to be freely accepted, from a purely national point of view. By accepting it, we should have put an end to the really criminal competition of nations in the building of warships specially designed to prey upon merchant vessels at sea, and have confined navies, as armies are confined, to the business of destroying one another. It is astonishing to find a man of Sir Edward Grey's clear and good sense arguing that the "right" to capture and destroy merchant vessels is a valuable offensive weapon for the Power which owns half the merchant vessels of the world, and has in its hands a vast proportion of the business of marine insurance. There is, however, a saving clause which should encourage independent men to raise this great question in the approaching Session. The despatch says:—

"If at some future date . . . changes favourable to the diminution of armaments were to take place, the British Government might be able to reconsider the question."

Let us hope that it will be considered without delay and in its proper place as part of the problem of the reduction of armaments. This, as we read it, is the tendency of the paragraph, and we heartily commend it to the attention of Parliament in a Session which is bound to bring into sharp contrast the mutually destructive results of social demands and of naval and military expenditure.

But what of our own policy in its relations to international peace? For the moment, the British proposals for the reduction of armaments have failed, partly, we are afraid, because, in refusing to abandon the right of capture at sea, we have given Germany an excuse for maintaining the increase in her fleet as an insurance of her mercantile marine. But the Government will not, we are sure, take the position that this country is thereby absolved either from further international action, or from exhibiting, in practical form, the sober and peaceful character of her own aims. For if the British offer at The Hague broke down, the year that is past saw the conclusion of the Russian understanding, which established a state of mutual non-interference in regard to Afghanistan and Thibet. Those who criticised the idea of a general treaty with Russia were expressly encouraged to look to that part of it which did away with the provocation on the north-west frontiers of India as carrying with it a substantial reward in the reduction of our military burdens. That instrument did not stand alone. It was the cause of a long series of ententes, or actual treaties, based on conventions, with naval Powers like Italy, France, and Japan, backed by a firm friendship, initiated by Lord Salisbury, and pursued by his two successors, with the United States. Doubtless these instruments took for granted the existence of a strong British Navy. But are we to be told that they were in the nature of warlike alliances, directed, let us say, against Germany, whose fleet does not at the moment stand at more than a quarter of the strength of our own? No responsible statesman will maintain such a theory. But if the long procession of ententes had a peaceful character and effect, can it be held that our diplomacy has done nothing to secure the safety of the King's dominions, and that it is necessary for us to find for our army and navy in 1908 nearly nineteen millions more than we found in 1898, the year before the Boer war, when none of these instruments existed, and when it could fairly be said that this country was genuinely unpopular abroad? We do not think that any such contention will be raised. We gravely doubt whether the present strength of the British Navy, consisting as it does in the main of three powerful and fully organised fleets in close communication with these shores, could be increased without reducing, rather than adding, to its efficiency in war-time. And we are certain it cannot be increased relatively to its rivals. The more we build the more we stimulate building and scientific inventiveness, now the common property of civilisation, on the part of other Powers. The louder our Jingoism talk, the noisier the response from the German Jingoism. And the farther this race in material force goes, the emptier do all the moral resources of diplomacy appear. Is it really true, or plausible, that we must spend nearly fifty per cent. more in armaments than we spent in the year when Russia had a strong navy and no kind of political understanding with us, when France was bitterly chagrined over Fashoda, Germany actively malicious, the Venezuelan dispute unsettled, and the now allied Japanese naval Power non-existent?

But there is another set of considerations which must be held to be binding on the present Government. Their election pledges in favour of a substantial reduction of armaments are absolutely overwhelming. Can it be maintained that they are fulfilled by a paltry saving of some 2½ millions on the last War Budget of their predecessors? No such theory can be upheld. In the late Parliament the then Liberal Opposition joined an important section of Unionist members in calling for a reduction of 27,000 in the men voted under the Army Estimates. This question of the cost and numbers of the Army is, indeed, a very serious one, for while we believe that both parties were agreed in 1906 that a considerable reduction was necessary, Mr. Haldane has re-started the dangerous heresy of the incompleteness of naval defence, and has fixed the strength of his "fighting force" at 150,000 men. But on this point of the numbers of the expeditionary force the Prime Minister, speaking in 1903 on the motion to go into Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates, declared that even the smaller figure of 120,000 was unnecessary. He said:—

"The first thing we ought to know is the actual requirement of the country and the requirement of the Empire for defence. But those requirements will depend upon the policy you pursue; and I am one of those who think that the real and only patriotic policy for this country is one which would probably put an end to the necessity for this large expeditionary force. There has certainly been nothing in the South African War which has altered the state of things since four or five years ago; and therefore I cannot but think that the right hon. gentleman has started on false premises altogether when he assumes as the basis of his argument that we must be ready at any time to send 120,000 men out of the country as an expeditionary force."

And in the same year, criticising Mr. Brodrick's scheme for the establishment of Army Corps, he subscribed freely to the doctrine that the army was being maintained on a scale of gross excess:—

"The hon. member for Oldham has said that up to 1897 our Army was a good one and sufficient for our purposes. That is true. The idea was then that we should never contemplate anything more than an expeditionary force of 70,000 or 80,000 men; and that was more than accomplished with the machinery and material that we had. The question is, What has caused since then an increased demand on the Army? If the Army was strong enough in 1897, why should it need to be stronger now? If the expenditure of 18 millions were sufficient in 1897, why should we now require an expenditure of 30 millions? . . ."

Sir Edward Grey went even further than the Prime Minister. Speaking on the Guest motion to reduce the Army by 27,000 men, he suggested that if the Navy insured us security from invasion and the Indian frontier were safe, the country might be "better off with a smaller expeditionary force of 80,000 or of 40,000," provided the auxiliary levies were ample. The Indian frontier has not been as secure as it is to-day within the memory of our generation; and as for auxiliary backing of the Regular Army, that is precisely the point which Mr. Haldane's scheme is supposed to secure. Yet we have a demand for an expeditionary corps larger by 30,000 men than the force which the Tory Ministry provided and the present Prime Minister and Foreign Minister declared to be excessive. Such a position cannot be maintained. The country will look for substantial reductions in the Army Estimates of this year. They are due and overdue, and we shall look to the Liberal and Radical Party in Parliament to co-operate with the Government in securing them, and in resisting hostile influences, wherever they reside. It must be remembered that the theory and practice of Liberalism are involved in a true attitude to the problem of armaments. If the excessive tendencies of the old system and of the Haldane scheme are not vigorously curtailed, the fund for social reform cannot be constructed and maintained. Moreover, the Liberal conception of the national power, without Quixotry or disregard of the actual balance of material elements, looks to moral forces to sustain it. Its rule is not military; its army is more an Imperial police force than a national levy, in the Continental sense, and this aspect of it emerges clearly now that the menace on the Indian frontier has been successfully diminished. And finally the Liberal Government is bound to have a special regard to that powerful factor in national stability which firm credit and a bearable and diminishing debt, provide.

THE NEW "TIMES."

MANY Englishmen who hear that the "Times" has passed under the managing directorship of Mr. Arthur Pearson will feel as if Westminster Abbey had been suddenly given over to the control of the "Shakers." Such a feeling is not, we believe, confined to those who regard the "Times" as a tower of defence of property, a broad ægis of the Empire. What Carlyle called the "emphatic, big-voiced, always influential, and often strongly unreasonable 'Times'" has become, in its way, a national possession; and, to do its conductors justice, they have never quite ceased to value this characteristic. For four generations the "Times" has remained under the control of a single family, which had become almost a dynasty, able and determined to maintain a continuous tradition. The family subsists in an executive function, but the "Times" now announces as its active conductor a gentleman chiefly known as a founder and promoter of the "Yellow Press." To the public we have in view, this kind of journalism is either unreadable or unspeakable, not infrequently both. Between it and the method of the "Times" newspaper a great gulf has been fixed all through the period when the sensational Press, closely copied from American journalism, was establishing itself in this country. The Americanised Press has gifts of its own. But it is no more than the bare truth to say that it tends to be untrustworthy in its news; ignorant, slight, and superficial in its comment; shifty, insincere, and exaggerative in tone; and disposed to feed, and to feed to excess, the commoner appetites of the people—the appetite for gambling, the appetite for hearing about crime, the appetite of curiosity about the private doings of the rich and the ostentatiously vulgar. From these failings, the columns of the "Times," while open to many prejudices, have been kept conspicuously free. The paper has not needed to minister to them. It has been proud to regard itself as the organ of the "governing classes," and to maintain a kind of world-reputation on that basis. The root of its enterprise has no doubt been commercial. But it has not been the commerce of the "Daily Express," any more than the philistinism of the "Times" is the philistinism of the "Daily Mail."

There will be another feeling about the new direction of the "Times." On the face of it, the transaction links it more or less closely with other newspaper ventures, and establishes unknown relations with them. The changes and developments that have gone on in Fleet Street during recent years make it difficult to say how near we are to the creation of a great newspaper combine, the prime object of which is to unite great wealth with great power over public opinion. Hitherto, the identification of half-a-dozen families with the ownership and control of leading London and provincial newspapers has guaranteed a certain steadiness and continuity of opinion and purpose. Now this stable element is disappearing. Newspaper after newspaper has changed hands, and the purchasers have rarely thought it necessary to consider its established views. Free Trade papers have become Protectionist with the passing of a cheque, and the old idea of a newspaper as the depository of a certain intellectual and moral trust, and of its writers as the guardians of that public treasure, seems to have been superseded. Incidentally this process has involved a real degradation of the status of the journalist with convictions. He has been passed on with the material stock-in-trade to the new proprietors, and left to choose between losing his bread and butter and forfeiting his influence and his power of self-expression. How far these considerations apply to the change in the proprietorship and management of the "Times" we cannot say. It has never been a steady force on the side either of Free Trade or of Protection. One view has prevailed on Monday; another on Tuesday. But an authoritative position has now been assigned to Mr. Chamberlain's "champion hustler," who has the merit, or demerit, of turning the "Standard" into an organ of tariff reform, and who brings to the proprietary a conspicuous member of the Tariff "Commission." The "children of light," the friends of ideas, and of the more hopeful and generous thoughts about mankind, have never had much to say to the "Times." But they and others would be loth to think of it as closely identified with the calculations and bargainings that underlie the framing of a great instrument of private advantage and public ill like a Protectionist tariff.

They will also, we think, seek for light on some features of the new management. They will want to know whether the best features of the "Times"—the fairness of its correspondence, the balance and impartiality of its reports, and the weight and authority of its foreign intelligence—are to be preserved, or to be gradually modified until the paper becomes as crude an organ of sect as the new "Standard." They cannot see how Mr. Pearson's identification with it strengthens these features, or contributes any element of power or stability to its general conduct. They have not been enamoured of the new enterprise which turned the "Times" into a kind of Yankee shop, stocked with costly "remainders." But these eccentricities have not spoiled the paper, or made it less interesting to the student of politics, or less important as an exchange medium for the powerful and the well-informed. Here it stands alone, or, let us say, with a small and fit company, of which a few contemporaries, like the "Temps," or the "Débats," or the "New York Evening Post," are less significant members. On these grounds it has inspired an exaggerated respect, and even fear, born of a unique self-confidence—a half-bullying tone and tradition—and a special brilliancy of expression that belonged to it under Delane, and have partly deserted it, or are shared in some degree among its rivals. Even to-day it would be possible to compile a respectable list of Liberal Ministers and politicians who might be described as "afraid of the 'Times.'" Probably these half-superstitious emotions would be dissipated by the sight of a collective photograph of the present leader-writers and conductors of the "Thunderer"—or of any newspaper written, or believed to be written, by mortal hands. But we are quite sure they will not survive the notion that it has been assimilated to the genius of the "Daily Express."

THE RE-MAKING OF AMERICA.

AMERICA, said Whitman, is destined either to realise a new beginning in the life of humanity or to prove the greatest historic failure of all time. This generous dream of a "new beginning" has haunted the minds of all the greatest American leaders. It inspired the devotion and sacrifice which broke the power of the Secession. "That form or substance of Government," Lincoln proudly defined the Republic, "whose leading object is to elevate the condition of men." In the War, John Bright wrote to the President, of "your great country, the great hope of humanity." "We shall nobly save, or meanly lose," Lincoln told his Congress, "the last, best hope of the earth." It is that spirit of exultant optimism which has led the American people to welcome immigrants from the poor and oppressed of every European nation. It is that spirit which has raised the great Statue of Liberty above New York Harbour, the first introduction to the wanderer who has left his country and his father's house for the sake of freedom and a home. That bedrock belief amongst the common people in its greatness and destiny alone to-day enables it buoyantly to confront problems of poverty, irresponsible wealth, and racial cleavage which might daunt the energies of the most experienced student of human affairs.

In a remarkable series of articles now appearing in the "Times," an "Observer of America" has focussed attention upon this ultimate question of race. Others have before noticed—for the thing is conspicuous and glaring—the hazardous future which these race problems indicate. No one has presented the challenge in a clearer and more definite fashion. Over a million immigrants sweep into the American ports every year. A few decades back they were recruited from the northern and western races—Irish, in enormous quantities after the famine; English men and women, sick with the squalor and poverty of the days of adversity; Germans, Swedes, Danes. To-day these sources have largely dried up. A new and increasing river of supply has been opened, which flows turbulently from the South-East of Europe. Southern Italians, Ruthenians, Polish Jews, Macedonians, offer a new and perplexing addition to a race problem already sufficiently complicated. In former days, again, when the voyage was hazardous, and work precarious at the other end, only the boldest and most enduring ventured on the journey.

To-day the immigration agent makes the transition easier than the transport of cattle. A man or woman enters his office in a village of Eastern Hungary; and thence his individual volition ceases. In a kind of sleep-walk he is shepherded across Europe and the Atlantic, and only awakens when engaged in the sweated unskilled industry of New York or Chicago. It is the weaker who come under such conditions. The employers call impatiently for more. The ground of America has only been scratched, and the scratching has hitherto almost invariably turned into gold. There are enormous potentialities of mineral wealth—as, for example, the great coal and iron strata which run for hundreds of miles across Alabama and North Carolina—which only demand for profitable working unlimited supplies of human implements. In the cotton mills of the south, working frantically day and night and being run up as fast as ingenuity can construct them—white children are working under entirely unregulated factory conditions, twelve, fourteen, and sixteen hours a day. The new immigrant races have the highest fecundity of Europe, and their large families of children are thus early woven into the industrial machine. The American type—the business men—largely of Anglo-Saxon descent, who have captured control of a Continent, have very few children at all, and seem to have lost their ancient emotional vitality in the hard intellectual competition of wealth accumulation.

These characteristic classes of Americans do no work at all, although they think that they are working harder than anyone ever worked in the world. They sit in offices embedded in great cliffs of buildings in the cities, each fitted with telephone and typist. They dictate to the typist or shout through the telephone orders and arrangements for the manipulation of the products of working-class America. Or they direct the control of machinery in great factories, or upon the land, where machinery has become so perfected that it can do everything except boast of its doings. Below is the huge mass of foreign sweated labour—Slav and Italian and negro—which accomplishes the manual work of the nation. It has acquiesced in this arrangement because hitherto it has gained so much upon its past that it has no desire to contrast its present with its future possibilities. Mr. Upton Sinclair, in "The Jungle," has shown the life of such a foreign family in the abysses of industrial Chicago: harassed, ill-treated, losing its ancient pieties and devotions, often subject to the last indignities; but still, from a material point of view, improved upon the hard, pitiless struggle with poverty in the village from which it has escaped. The compounds of the unskilled workers for the Steel Corporation at Pittsburg would cause a Chinaman from South Africa a sensation of disgust. But to the Macedonian who has been accustomed to anticipate outrage, murder, or robbery as a normal incident of his daily life, these compounds appear like the ante-chambers of the Kingdom of Heaven.

But although the Anglo-Saxon Plutocracy thus demands more and more of this cheap and wealth-producing product, the better minds of the nation are beginning to wonder whether it would not be well to cry a halt; whether (in an American euphuism) the Republic is not at present "biting off more than it can chew." Heroic efforts are made in the schools, by free use of the flag and all symbolic education, to assimilate the second generation to the American type. Yet that type itself must insensibly change under the impact of this torrent of human lives. There are those who see in the future a Latin-Slav civilisation, Roman Catholic or blatantly atheist in creed, complicated by the competition and antagonism of the negro; with the Eastern races beating defiantly on its Pacific borders; the whole only tremulously controlled by a diminishing number of American business men and politicians, insecure in the position of great wealth, which the common people greedily desire. There are others, however, who declare that all this mixture and fusion of races must ultimately consummate in the development of a higher type—the super-man of the future. They foresee the cheerfulness and artistic skill of the Southern mingling with the energy of the Northern and the patience and stubborn industry of the Eastern European races, to produce an ultimate type which will combine the excellences of all. From this roseate dream, however, two items stand excluded—the Jew and the negro. The Jew remains as apart in America to-day as he has remained apart in Europe for nineteen centuries. Whole districts of the cities—for he will not go upon the land—he has made into enormous ghettos. He is losing in the friction and hard energies of American life that old religion, with its poetry and symbolism, which kept the ideal in his heart through generations of persecution. He is becoming—for the moment—a rather repulsive and ugly type. And the wildest optimistic "fusionist" never dreams of suggesting that the negro shall enter the American amalgam. The introduction of his virility, his music, his passion, and his good temper, counts for nothing in face of an ultimate feeling of disgust and horror at contemplation of union between white and black. And, as the negro and the Jew are multiplying at least as fast as the remainder of the native population, the problem of their future, in that bubbling cauldron of human activity which we term America, remains blank and insoluble. The whole affair presents much the biggest thing that to-day is happening in the world. The migration across the Atlantic can only be paralleled by that unrest of peoples which coincided with the decay of Rome, and finally consummated the end of a world. Few members of that proud and secure civilisation, as they contemplated the barbaric invader, would ever have dreamt that from these wild men, Goths and Huns, and shaggy, uncouth creatures, there would arise in the fulness of time a grander society than they had ever known. It may be that in the future America may reveal, after a similar descent into the Dark Ages, a similar re-making of Earth and Heaven.

A CONTEMPORARY MYTH.

THE final proceedings in the Druce case have buried, for the time being, one of the most singular legends in contemporary annals. But if the exhumation of Mr. T. C. Druce's coffin has established the fact that Mr. Druce was merely himself, and that the fifth Duke of Portland was an eccentric nobleman, who lived and died decently within his own skin, it has left behind it a problem which is really much more fascinating than the legend itself. Had the tale been true, we should merely have said that the Duke was a daring actor, with a curiously limited imagination. A Duke who wished to escape from the full decorum of his station would be a sympathetic figure, if he had chosen his double with any taste. He might have been a pavement artist, a fiddler, or a backwoodsman; he might, like the vanished Austrian Arch-Duke, have commanded a smart sailing-ship; he might have been a Fenian or a secularist lecturer, a poacher, or even (if he had a boyish mind) an engine-driver. But a Duke who yearned to become a prosperous shopkeeper, the head of a mid-Victorian home, and the husband (in succession) of two middle-class women, might have been odd, but would hardly have been interesting. Romance has lost nothing in the rehabilitation of the Duke's taste. The science of mythology, on the other hand, has gained a contemporary legend to study, and history a baffling illustration of the fallibility of human testimony.

The figure of the late Duke was, to begin with, a natural nucleus for myth. His fabulous wealth, his odd appearance, his solitude, his misanthropy, his trick of disappearing, and, above all, his underground tunnels and rooms, invited conjecture and legend. Long before the world had heard of the Druces, the legend had begun to grow. There is, for example, a romance by Villiers de l'Isle d'Adam, published in the 'eighties, in which he figures, in a tale enriched with marvellously romantic pictures of Queen Victoria, as a heroic young man who had contracted leprosy by some act of devotion, and thereafter hid himself in a subterranean mansion. The basis for fiction is obvious on this side of the story. It is less easy to explain how the Duke came to be associated with a respectable and apparently commonplace person like the proprietor of the Baker Street Bazaar. The resemblance, which some think they see in their photographs, can hardly have struck their contemporaries, for the sufficient reason that Mr. Druce was bearded and the Duke shaven. No fact has emerged which supplies the least clue to the connection. It is equally difficult to suggest why the people of Hendon began to hint immediately after Mr. Druce's death, that he was not dead at all, as the family nurse—clearly a trustworthy witness—admits that they did. Whether any obscure business or relationship linked the Duke and the shopkeeper, we do not know. How the legend began we cannot guess. One suspects that there must be some simple and quite commonplace explanation; and it may be, that, in the interests of science, the Druce family may some day be induced to supply it. Meantime, the evidence which we do possess points to a good deal of interested lying, with some developments which doubtless were more innocent.

It is difficult for the normally honest person to conceive of false witness, on an elaborate scale, where no compelling personal motive of love or hate or fear exists to explain it. Caldwell's good faith it is unnecessary to discuss. In his opening statement Mr. Atherley Jones made the rather risky admission that if their stories proved untrue, Miss Robinson and Mrs. Hamilton, the two ladies who knew the Duke as Druce, must either be committing perjury or labouring under an hallucination. It would be improper to discuss these alternatives; if there was an hallucination, however, it is remarkable that two persons suffered simultaneously under hallucinations so happily complementary to each other and so likely, if believed, to be profitable. And yet, unless all these witnesses had believed the story, at least in its essentials, it is hardly conceivable that they would have ventured into the witness-box. They knew the risk that they ran. Caldwell, whose tale was clearly untrue from beginning to end, must himself have been the dupe of the Druce-Portland legend. He probably believed the tale of the alias and the lead in the coffin, and argued that in supplying a missing link in the chain of evidence, he did no substantial wrong. That may indeed have been the psychology of all or several of these witnesses. Druce, they would say, certainly was the Duke; it was matter of common knowledge; in adding their contribution to the common stock they benefited themselves and assisted the triumph of justice. They may have known that their bit of testimony was literally untrue, but it was ideally true; somehow thus, if not quite thus, the facts must have run. Given a basis of floating legend, and the detailed corroboration of witnesses will, under sufficient stimulus, be forthcoming. So, one supposes, the pious persons must have argued in the early centuries of Christianity, who forged the false Gospels and epistles, or altered the received text to suit the tenets of their own particular sect. They knew they were forging, but they forged in accordance with what they believed to be true, and the process in their view resulted not in falsifying fact but in establishing truth. The two witnesses, a photographer and a draper, who swore that they had seen Mr. T. C. Druce alive, after he was quite certainly buried in Highgate, probably belong to a more innocent stage of self-deception. They doubtless knew the legend, and the legend acted on a hazy background of recollection, gave it definiteness, and caused the memory to emerge labelled with a conveniently inaccurate date. They are in the same case as the contemporary respectable Jewish witnesses who informed Sir Paul Rycout of the facts of the miraculous life and reappearance of Sabatai Sevi, the Levantine Messiah of the Annus Mirabilis. He was seen preaching the old doctrine by many in his former haunts in Asia long after he had become an apostate to Islam, and taken up his residence at the Sultan's Court in Adrianople.

To the historian, the distressing and baffling character of this evidence is its plausibility and internal consistency. The tale which Miss Robinson and Mrs. Hamilton told was remarkable enough, improbable, it may be, but in no sense impossible, and quite consistent with itself. Even after a severe cross-examination, it was not seriously discredited, for an occasional slip as to dates, and variations in minor details are to be expected in all evidence about distant events. Caldwell's story was a trifle too complete, but it also was self-consistent. Mr. Ivory, by testing it by facts relative to Caldwell's own obscure history, reduced it to a tissue of fiction. But a historian, examining it after the lapse of some centuries, would not have had this material of comparison at his command. Had the narratives of these three witnesses, and of the two who saw Druce after his death, come to light in the form of affidavits two hundred years hence, history would have been compelled to accept the legend. There were kings before Agamemnon who went unsung because they lacked their sacred bard. There are saints and heroes since Agamemnon, who have entered the calendar, because they lacked their cross-examiner. It was, no doubt, for that reason that the Church invented the Devil's advocate, but he rarely disposed of the funds and the opportunities which would have enabled him to test the details of the miraculous tales which he was expected to criticise.

Life and Letters.

MONEY.

EVERY night between the hours of two and four he would wake, and lie sleepless, and all his monetary ghosts would come and visit him. If, for instance, he had just bought a house and paid for it, any doubt he had conceived at any time about its antecedents or its future, would suddenly appear, squatting on the foot-rail of his bed, staring in his face. There it would grow and grow, until it seemed to fill the room; and terror would grip his heart. The words "I shall lose my money," would leap up to his lips; but in the dark it seemed ridiculous to speak. Then presently beside that doubt more doubts would squat. Doubts about his other houses, about his shares; misgivings as to Water Boards; terrors over Yankee Rails. They took the shape of owls. Clinging in a line, they swayed, while from their wide black gaps of mouth would come the silent chorus: "Money, money, you'll lose all your money!" His heart would start thumping, fluttering; he would turn his old white head, bury his whisker in the pillow, shut his eyes, and con over such investments as he really could not lose. Then beside his head half-hidden in the pillow, there would come and perch the spectral bird of some unlikely liability, such as a lawsuit that might drive him into bankruptcy; while on the other side, touching his silver hair, would squat the yellow fowl of Socialism. Between these two he would lie unmoving, but for that thumping of his heart, till at last would come a drowsiness, and he would fall asleep.

At such times it was always of his money and his children's and grandchildren's money that he thought. It was useless to tell himself how few his own wants were, and that it would be better for his children to have to make their way. Such thoughts gave him no relief. His fears went deeper than mere facts, they were religious, as it were, and founded in their innermost belief that, by money only, Nature could be held at bay.

Of this, from the moment when he first made money, his senses had informed him, and slowly, surely, gone on doing so, till his very being was soaked through with the conviction. He might be told on Sundays that money was not everything, but he knew better. Seated in the seventh pew on the left side of the central aisle, he seemed to listen—a grandchild on his either hand, his old knees, in quiet striped trousers, crossed, his white-fringed face a little turned towards the preacher, one neat-gloved hand reposing on his thigh, the other keeping warm a tiny hand thrust into it. But his old brain was busy far away amongst the tables of commandment, telling him how much to spend to get his five per cent. and money back; his old heart was busy with the little hand tucked into his. There was nothing in these sermons therefore that could quarrel with his own religion, for he did not hear them; and even had he heard them, they would not have quarrelled, his own creed of money being but the natural modern form of a religion that bade his fathers "Lay up treasure in the life to come." He could not nowadays do more than say that he believed in any life to come, so that his commercialism had been forced to find another outlet, and advance a step, in accordance with the march of knowledge.

His religious feeling about money did not make him selfish, nor niggardly in any way—it merely urged him to preserve himself, not to take risks that he could reasonably avoid, neither in his mode of life, his work, nor in the propagation of his children. He had not married until he had a position to offer to the latter, sufficiently secure from changes and chances in this mortal life, and even then he had not been too precipitate, confining the number to three boys and one welcome girl, in accordance with the increase of his income. In the circles where he moved, his course of action was so normal that no one had observed the mathematical connection between increasing income and the production and education of his family. Still less had anyone observed the deep and silent process by which there passed from him to them the simple elements of his faith.

His children, subtly, and under cover of the manner of a generation which did not mention money in so many words, had sucked in their father's firm religious instinct, his quiet knowledge of the value of the individual life, his steady and unconscious worship of the means of keeping it alive. Calmly they had sucked it in, and a thing or two besides. So long as he was there, they knew they could afford to make a little light, a little free, with what must come to them by virtue of his creed. When quite small children, they had listened rather bored to his simple statements about money and the things it bought; presently that instinct—shared by the very young with dogs and other animals, for having of the best and consorting with their betters—had helped them to see the sense of what he said. As time went on, they found gentility insisting more and more that this instinct should be concealed; and they began unconsciously to perfect their father's creed, draping its formal tenets in the undress of an apparent disregard. For the dogma, "Not worth the money!" they would use the words, "Not good enough!" The teaching, "Business first," they formulated, "Not more pleasure than your income can afford, your health can stand, or your reputation can assimilate." There was money waiting for them, and they did not feel it necessary to undertake even those "safe" risks which their father had been obliged to take, to make that money. But they were quite to be depended on. In the choosing of their friends, their sports, their clubs, and occupations, a religious feeling guided them. They knew precisely just how much their income was, and took care neither to spend more, nor less. A priest-like knowledge led them to the spots where they would be "done well," for to be "done well" they thought the most important thing in life. And so devoutly did they act up to their principles, that, whether in the restaurant or country house, whether in the sale room of some "old" curio shop, whether in their regiments or their offices, they could always feel the presence of the Godhead blessing their discreet and comfortable worship. In one respect, indeed, they were more religious than their father, who still preserved the habit of falling on his knees at night, to name with Tibetan regularity a strange God; they did not speak to him about this habit, but they wished he would not do it, for they were fond of their old father, who continued them into the past. They had gently laughed him out of talking about money, they had gently laughed at him for thinking of it still; but they loved him, and it worried them in secret that he should do this thing which seemed to them dishonest.

With their wives and husband—in course of time they had all married, recognising that in order to be "done well," this was really necessary—they very often came to see him, bringing their children. To the old man these visits were worth more than doctors or hydro-pathy; to help in playing with the toys that he had given them, to stroke his grandsons' yellow heads, and ride them on his knee; to press his silver whiskers to their ruddy cheeks, pinching their little legs to feel how much there was of them, and loving them the more, the more there was to love—this made his heart feel warm. The dearest moments he knew now, the consolation of his age, were those he spent reflecting how—of the young things he loved, who seemed in their light way to love him too a little—not one would have secured to him or her less than twelve or thirteen hundred pounds a year; more if he could manage to hold on a little longer. For fifty years at least the flesh and blood he left behind him would be secure. His eye and mind, quick to notice things like that, had soon perceived the difference of his children's standards from his own; they had perhaps a deeper veneration for the means of living while they were alive, but certainly less faith in keeping up their incomes after they were in their graves. And so unconsciously his speculation passed them by, and travelled on, telling itself that these small creatures, who nestled up against him, and sometimes took him walks, would, when they came to be grown men and women, have his simpler faith, and save the money that he left them for their own grandchildren. Thus, and thus only, would he live, not fifty years, but a hundred, after he was dead. And he was rendered very anxious by the law, which refused to let him tie his money up in perpetuity.

Firm in his determination to secure himself against the future, he opposed this strenuous piety to those temptations which beset the individual, refused numberless appeals, often much against his instincts of compassion; opposing with his vote and all his influence movements to increase the rates or income-tax, for any such purpose as the raising of funds to enable aged people without means to die more slowly. He himself, who laid up yearly more and more for the greater safety of his family, felt no doubt—though cynicism shocked him—that these old persons were only an encumbrance to their families, and should be urged to dwindle gently out. In such private cases as he came across, feeling how hard it was, he prayed for strength to keep his hand out of his pocket, and strength was often given him. So with many other invitations to depart from virtue. He fixed a certain sum a year—a hundred pounds—with half-a-crown in the velvet bag on Sundays—to be offered as libations to all strange gods, so that they might leave him undisturbed to worship the true god of money. This was effectual; the strange gods, finding him a man of strong religious principle, yet no crank—his name appeared in twenty charitable lists, five pounds apiece—soon let him be, for fear of wasting postage stamps and the under parts of boots.

After his wife's death, which came about when he was seventy, he continued to reside alone in the house that he had lived in since his marriage, though it was now too large for him. Every autumn he resolved to make a change next Spring; but when Spring came, he could not bring himself to tear his old roots up, and put it off till the Spring following, with the hope, perhaps, that he might then feel more inclined.

All through the years that he was living there alone, he suffered more and more from those nightly visitations of monetary doubts. They seemed, indeed, to grow more concrete and insistent with every thousand pounds he put between himself and their reality. They became more owl-like, more numerous with every fresh investment; they stayed longer at a time. And he grew thinner, frailer every year; and pouches came beneath his eyes.

When he was eighty, his daughter, with her husband and her children, came to live with him. This seemed to give him a fresh lease of life. He never missed, if he could help it, a visit to the nursery at five o'clock. There, surrounded by toy bricks, he would remain an hour or more, building—banks or houses, ships or churches, sometimes police-stations, sometimes cemeteries, but generally banks. And when the edifice approached completion, in the glory of its long white bricks, he waited with a sort of secret ecstasy to feel a small warm body climb his back, and hear a small voice say in his ear: "What shall we put in the bank to-day, Granddy?"

The first time this was asked, he had hesitated long before he answered. During the thirty years that had elapsed since he built banks for his own children, he had learned that one did not talk of money now, especially before the young. One used a euphemism for it. The proper euphemism had been slow to spring into his mind, but it had sprung at last; and they had placed it in the bank. It was a very little china dog. They placed it in the entrance hall.

The small voice said, "What is it guarding?"

He had answered: "The bank, my darling."

The small voice murmured: "But nobody could steal the bank?"

Looking at the little euphemism, he had frowned; feeling that it lacked completeness as a symbol. For a moment he had a wild desire to put a sixpence down, and end the matter. Two small knees wriggled against his back, arms tightened round his neck, a chin rubbed itself impatiently against his whisker. He muttered hastily:

"But they could steal the papers."

"What papers?"

"The wills, and deeds, and—and cheques."

"Where are they?"

"In the bank."

"I don't see them."

"They're in a cupboard."

"What are they for?"

"For—for grown-up people."

"Are they to play with?"

"NO!"

"Why is he guarding them?"

"So that—so that everybody can always have enough to eat."

"Everybody?"

"Everybody."

"Me, too?"

"Yes, my darling, you, of course."

Locked in each other's arms they looked down side-long at the little euphemism. The small voice said:

"Now that he's there, they're safe, aren't they?"

"Yes, quite safe."

He had given up attending to his business, but almost every morning, at nearly the same hour, he would walk down to his Club, not looking very much at things about the streets, partly because his thoughts were other wise engaged, partly because he had found it from the first a deleterious habit. Arriving, he would take "The Times," and "The Financial News," and go to his pet armchair; here he would stay till lunch time, reading all that bore in any way on his affairs, and taking a grave view of every situation. But at lunch a longing to express himself would come, and he would tell his neighbours tales of his little grandsons, of the extraordinary things they did, and of the future he was laying-up for them. In the pleasant warmth of midday, over his light but satisfactory lunch, surrounded by familiar faces, he would recount these tales in cheerful tones, and his old grey eyes would twinkle; between him and his struggle with those nightly apparitions, there were many hours of daylight, there was his visit to the nursery. But suddenly, looking up fixedly with strained eyes, he would put a question such as this: "D'you ever wake up in the night?" If the answer was affirmative, he would say: "D'you ever find things worry you then out of—out of all proportion?" And, if they did, he would clearly be relieved to hear it. On one occasion, when he had elicited an emphatic statement of the discomfort of such waking hours, he blurted out: "D'you ever see a lot of great owls sitting on your bed? It's—it's—a perfect horror to me!" Then seemingly ashamed of what he had just said, he rose and left his lunch unfinished.

His fellow members, though nearly all much younger than himself, had no unkindly feeling for him. He seemed to them to overrate their interest in his grandsons, and the state of his investments; but they knew he could not help preoccupation with these subjects; and when he left them, usually at three o'clock, saying almost tremulously, "I must be off, my grandsons'll be looking out for me!" they would exchange a look, as though remarking: "The old chap thinks of nothing but his grandchildren." And they would sit down to "Bridge," taking care to play within the means their fathers had endowed them with.

But the "old chap" would step into a hansom cab, and his spirit, looking through his eyes beneath the brim of his tall hat, would travel home before him. Yet, for all his hurry, he would find the time to stop and buy a toy or something on the way.

One morning, at the end of a cold March, they found him dead in bed, propped on his pillows, with his eyes wide open. Doctors, hastily called in, decided that he had died from failure of the heart's action, and fixed the hour of death at anything from two to four; by the appearance of his staring pupils they judged that something must have frightened him. No one had heard a noise, no one could find a sign of anything alarming; so no one could explain why he, who seemed so well preserved, should thus have suddenly collapsed. To his own family he had never told the fact, that every night he woke between the hours of two and four, to meet a row of owls squatting on the foot-rail of his bed—he was, no doubt, ashamed of it. He had revealed much of his religious feeling, but not the real depth of it; not the way his deity of money had seized on his imagination; not his nightly struggle with the terrors of his spirit, nor the hours of anguish spent, when vitality was low, trying to escape the company of doubts. No one had heard the fluttering of his heart, which, beginning many years ago, just as a sort of pleasant habit to occupy his wakeful minutes in the dark, had grown to be like the beating of a hammer on soft flesh. No one had guessed, he least of all, the stroke of irony that Nature had prepared, to avenge the desecration of her Law of Balance. She had watched his worship from afar, and quietly arranged that by his worship he should be destroyed; careless, indeed, what god he served, knowing only that he served too much.

They brought the eldest of his little grandsons in. He stood a long time looking, then asked if he might touch the cheek. Being permitted, he kissed his little finger-tip and laid it on the old man's whisker. When he was led away and the door closed, he asked if "Granddy" was "quite safe"; and twice again that evening he asked the question.

In the early light next morning, before the house was up, the under housemaid saw a white thing on the mat before the old man's door. She went, and, stooping down, examined it. It was the little china dog.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

THE BOY AND GIRL SCHOOL.

It is the habit of all who maintain the conventional view of education to treat the critic as an innovator, if not a faddist, on whom lies the burden of proof. The assumption is that a system which has age on its side must be in some sense natural. So strong is this bias of inertia in England that it can hardly be said that the advocates of the co-education of boys and girls have as yet obtained a hearing.* But, despite the antiquity of the tradition which divides the sexes at school, there is no practice in education which stands in greater need of apology. If, with no past to prejudice us, the proposal to educate boys and girls separately could be made to us for the first time to-morrow, it would strike most of us as a daring and paradoxical suggestion, a defiance of all the spontaneous dictates of nature and society. To leave the sexes together would seem to be the normal course. The daring and revolutionary step was their separation. Brothers and sisters grow up together, and learn the same lessons at their mothers' knee. Neighbours' children of all ranks, in villages and the country, play together, with a natural pleasure in the association of girls and boys. Peasants' children, in every simple state of society, work and play and dance together, and, when the schoolmaster comes at last among them, the class-room is as much the common ground of the sexes as the threshing floor and the village green. In Scotland this primitive traditional system developed undisturbed. In all the smaller Scottish towns, and even in places with a population as considerable as Dundee, boys and girls are still educated together, from the elementary schools, through the High School, to the University. What morbid and artificial conception of society and morals was it which dictated the separation and maintained it?

The common-sense Protestant Englishman who sends his boy to a public school and his girl to a ladies' college, and imagines that he is obeying some unquestionable law of nature, is in reality the victim of a forgotten medievalism. The sexes are separated to-day because education was originally the function of the monastery. The idea behind that separation was a hatred and dread of sex, a turning away from nature, a conception of society in which any association of the sexes was tolerated only as a concession to the world and to the weakness of the human animal. Brothers and sisters were separated, simply because the teachers to whom they were confided were vowed to a sex-less life. It was originally held that girls, even in the upper class, required little education at all to perform their simple and restricted duties, but when that tradition weakened, the girls went as naturally to the convent school as the boys to the monastic college. The system survived from obvious reasons of convenience. The English upper class was scattered in a sparsely peopled agricultural country, and the public school, given the aristocratic tradition, was the only alternative to the private tutor. In Scotland the reformation was at once democratic and Protestant. It destroyed the ascetic conception of sex, and it also broke down the separation of classes. The laird and the minister sent their children, boys and girls alike, to the same school as the ploughman and the farmer. The consequence has been not merely a more natural relationship of the sexes, but a more humane intimacy of the classes, with less of insolence on the one side, less of subservience on the other and, in the strata between the two extremes, a relative absence of snobbishness. The ideal of the English lower middle-class parent in the last century was to send his boy to some such inefficient boarding-school as Mr. Wells describes in "Kips," where he hoped he might acquire not so much knowledge and education, as the manners and sports of the class above him. The Scottish parent of the same rank aimed at the University. It is this imitative instinct, based on a pathetic if contemptible social ambition, which has perpetuated and generalised the type of the upper-class monastic school in England, long after the religious and economic reasons for its existence have disappeared.

It will be said, no doubt, that there is a special spirit or ethic proper to each sex, which co-education might destroy, or, at least, fail to develop. Boys would lose their "manliness," and girls their "womanliness." This is a very singular argument, for if there is anything proper and natural in the idea of a special sex virtue, it is obvious that it ought to arise rather from the association of the sexes than from their isolation. In so far as "manliness" in this connection means anything more than ordinary courage and honesty—qualities as desirable in women as in men—it must mean chivalry. In so far as womanliness means anything more than a sympathetic disposition—as desirable in men as in women—it must mean the queenly grace which encourages and rewards, which exacts respect and inspires chivalry. These qualities are complementary, and cannot be evolved in isolation. The monastery is not the place in which one would look for chivalry. In practice, the conception of a special sex virtue which is cultivated apart, is apt to be a self-conscious and exaggerated ideal. It tends to mean, for men and boys, hardness and brutality, rather than honour and courage; for women and girls, softness and prudery, rather than modesty and grace. It resulted in the grotesque divorce of sex-morality which characterised the Early Victorian era—the ignorant or affected innocence of the women, the after-dinner grossness of the men, the cruelty of the gilded youth who patronised cock-fights, the silliness of girls who fainted at the sight of a mouse. There is in this exaggeration of special sex virtues a sort of spiritual coarseness as unpleasant as the trick of fashion which encourages women to exaggerate by clothing the special characteristics of their form. It is at the same time an insincere and shallow tendency. Popular sentiment, which talks of some monopoly of manliness in men, has always delighted to dwell on the physical courage of a Joan of Arc or a Grace Darling, and is prodigal of its inconsistent admiration for "the strong man" of romance (usually a soldier), who is "as tender as any woman." Co-education might help to bring about a blending of these special sex-ideals; it would certainly not destroy the graces which gain their whole meaning from the reaction of one sex upon the other.

The gains which would spring from co-education are obvious and clear. In the first place, it would remove a grave economic difficulty in the way of higher education. Scotland, with a poorer and sparser population than England, has an older and better system of secondary schools, largely because of the economy which results from co-education. A small country town, or even a mere village, can support one really good school for both boys and girls, where it would fail to maintain two separate schools of the same standard of efficiency. There is an economy in money, and also in teaching talent. It is now quite a usual thing for boys and girls to be taught by women graduates. It is generally believed that women are better teachers than men; and at present, through the closing of the professions, it is easier to get women of high academic qualifications for the work of secondary schools. Where such a woman has any grace or magnetism, she exerts an influence on the boys which few men can wield. Competition among boys alone or girls alone is apt to become a harsh and almost commercial stimulus. The association of boys and girls together introduces a new spur to distinction, which is certainly more pleasing and more educative than mere competition. The possibility of friendship is realised betimes, and in common studies girls and boys learn the meaning of disinterested companionship. In after life such experiences cannot fail to be beneficial. The process of selection and mating can go on in a less restricted circle, with more mutual knowledge, more mutual understanding, and less risk of a precipitate choice based on a momentary physical attraction.

* See "A Natural Education." A Lecture by Mrs. Ennis Richmond, G. Street & Co., 30, Cornhill. Post free 4d.

There will, no doubt, be cynics who will profess to believe that the habitual association of boys and girls of all ages must result in immorality. To make good that point he must admit that the boys and girls of the upper and middle classes are in some way more depraved than peasant children. So far as that is so, if it is so, it must be due to the fact that the boys are herded together, without the restraint of home, or the appeal to chivalry which comes from the presence of girls. They talk and think lightly or grossly of women, because they know nothing of girls. Morality cannot be taught, but it can be learned, and it is absurd to expect that a healthy society can be based upon the unisexual school. In every other region of conduct, the school is supposed to be a preparation for the world, but on this one point we are still the slaves of a despairing tradition, which assumed the natural depravity of mankind. The peasant child, in whose development romance succeeds naturally to play, and love to companionship, leads in this respect the happier and the easier life.

THE LIFE OF A FOX.

THEY found him in the withy bed by the mill—he had a wild duck there only a week ago—and chased him without a break right away to Honey Lane, a good ten miles as the crow flies. There he gave them a loop that would have taken a good deal of unravelling, but some one gave the trick away, and they were on his scent again within ten minutes. It was all up with him then, with those great hounds running almost fresh, and himself the worse for a week's irregular feeding. Nobody expected him to put up another ten mile run, but this is just what he did, taking them close up to the gates of Brotheridge Park before Music ran into him, and received a snap in the face that she will remember.

He was a bit of a nuisance to us this winter. Many a man, however, who has done a hundred times as much harm, has passed away under a mound of flowers and deeply regretted. Vulpes was about four years old, perhaps five next March. This is the third winter that his bark has been heard in the night, seldom unanswered by the scream of his vixen. Their cubs were gambolling in the hill field last May, Vulpes making shy and phantomlike appearances, at any rate while we watched, just dropping a freshly killed rabbit and floating away as though his speed had been of wings rather than feet. The cubs grew up and dispersed into the woods, two of them falling victims to the opening meet, when young hounds are blooded, the others disappearing from the ken of this valley. But Vulpes and his mate kept the same beat: levied their customary toll on the hen-houses of their four or five mile radius; renewed their marvellous knowledge of the country that had so often saved their lives from the hot-footed pack.

A rather unwise change in the routine of our own hens gave the fox a chance that he was not slow to take. The house was placed a little afiel, in the hope that the fowls would forage elsewhere than in the garden that they had frequented too much. But they kept the same daily habits as before, returning in the afternoon to their home in the suburbs. Here Vulpes waited for them once or twice, and bore off each time some scatter-brain that had waited too long for the last worm. The only wonder is that he did not take them all, when we consider the desperate deeds that won for him the detestation of some of our neighbours. About two miles away was a stock of prize birds, the value of which easily topped ten pounds. A night passed in the usual silence, so far as the owner knew, but no ringing call of chanticleer announced the advent of day. Seventeen pedigree fowl lay dead in a rough heap on the floor, while the remaining two were, as they say in battle reports, "missing."

It is the midnight visit of "Mr. adjectival Fox," as he is called here, that is most to be feared. His far bolder raids on another neighbour resulted in considerably fewer victims. Here, it was considered, he could be found during the day more often than not within two hundred yards of the holding. Sometimes, he would even make a dash on the hens as they crowded round the grain that the poultry master had just thrown down. Once, this when the cubs were growing fast, the hens had no sooner been let out in the morning than one vanished "squawking" in the jaws of the brigand. In half-an-hour the fox returned, and went away with some reluctance when he found the irate farmer ready to receive him with a warmth I dare no more than hint at. Some of these exploits are more like the ignorant boldness of a young fox, but nothing is set down here that does not rightly belong to this particular four-year-old villain.

All the fowls that Vulpes took from our valley in the course of a year would scarcely keep one healthy fox in food for a month. Of rabbits, to which he is in the main quite welcome, he must have caught ten times as many. They seemed to know his rabbit seasons and his fowl seasons. When he was not out after rabbit, at any rate, they took little notice of him. Possibly they were as confident at other times. Certainly he seemed able to get rabbit whenever he fancied the diet. Best of all he liked the young things not yet out from the "stop," but it seemed to be rather more the vixen's work than his to scratch out these tender tit-bits.

We were always astonished at the number of voles, short-tailed field mice, as we call them, that Vulpes managed to catch and eat. We are not cursed with many of these unwelcome rascals, a fact for which we seldom give due thanks to the foxes. A vole plague is no light infliction, and even a mild population of the creatures means considerable loss, as anyone can see who digs up the winter hoard of one of them, or marks the grass that is kept short by a single small colony. The removal of a very slight check would enable a sprinkling of voles to bound into millions and it is certain that on this account we owe a good deal to the fact that Vulpes and his friends have a sweet tooth for the "short-tailed field mouse." Even in the winter he used to get this cherished dainty. When the snow was on the ground we used to find yards of the surface scratched up and there or elsewhere unmistakable signs that the hunting had not been in vain.

It was when we were snow-bound with a crust of frost on the top of the snow that Vulpes seemed to be having his hardest time. One day Young Hopeful, aged nine, met him in the orchard. Vulpes was moping round, nosing the base of each tree, in the hope of finding a wounded fieldfare or spent red-wing to stay his sharp hunger. He took scarcely any notice of Young Hopeful, who appeared to be unarmed, and the boy drew to within ten yards and tweaked him with his catapult. Vulpes started, more in anger than in pain, glared at the boy, so he says, and then picked up his back trail towards the hill field and the woods. Through the hedge and up over the smooth white bank he went at a pace just over a walk, and the boy, tucking his catapult into his pocket, followed, lumbering and panting, behind. Of what he should do if he should catch up with the fox, he had not the slightest idea. Neither did Vulpes stop to consider that he would have nothing to fear from a man of this growth in a bare tooth-and-limb tussle. An unreasoning dislike urged the one to follow and the other to shun.

Once, said the boy, and the tracks confirmed him, Vulpes stopped and looked back over his shoulder. Possibly he was thinking, "Why cannot you and I be friends? You could put a meal in my way easily enough, and possibly I could repay you." Here, though the boy did not volunteer the statement, he stopped also. The tell-tale tracks made that clear. Perhaps he began to consider the consequences of catching up this sharp-toothed animal. Perhaps he happened just then to want new breath. May we even imagine that he instinctively accepted the truce proposed by Vulpes, with a view to peace and an alliance? There is no telling which first moved on again. Only the steps were resumed, first at a walk, then at a run, as Vulpes whisked over the big bank, then flashed into the gorse, long before the boy was able to see what had become of him.

The orchard will be a blanker place for the boy, now the red fox is gone. For ourselves, when we have added up the account, even though it includes a few ruined partridge nests to his discredit, we find no cause to rejoice at his death. That remains for those who have chickens, but not voles, or who do not know that they have voles. Pheasants being accounted poultry also, as, indeed, they are, poultry keepers are almost the only ones who will speak ill of the dead. The hundred horsemen who took part first and last in that twenty mile run have nothing but praises to bestow on the gallant quarry.

THE MAKING OF A VILLAGE LIBRARY.

A COUPLE of weeks ago one of our readers wrote suggesting that village libraries and the books suitable for them would be a proper topic for discussion in THE NATION. The subject is particularly interesting at the moment in view of the awakening of village life, and we shall be glad to open our correspondence columns to those who have suggestions to make, or who have had experience or knowledge of the organisation of village halls or book-rooms. In the meantime we offer a few remarks on what we believe to be the main principles that ought to guide those who undertake to form or add to a village library.

In the first place, it should not be forgotten that most people read books not because they have any conscious wish to "improve" their minds, but simply, as Fitzgerald said, "for human pleasure." "A book," said Dr. Johnson, "should help us to enjoy life or to endure it." Our correspondent seems to have some such thought in his mind, for he writes that "it will of course be realised that after physical labour during the daytime, literature must be really attractive to be read in the country." Still, it is surprising to see the power which literature exerts, often in unexpected quarters. Stevenson tells the story of a Welsh blacksmith who at the age of twenty-five could neither read nor write. He heard a chapter of "Robinson Crusoe" read aloud in a farm kitchen, and "painfully learned to read Welsh and returned to borrow the book." Unfortunately, the only copy to be found was in English, but so strong was his resolution that he learned English in order to possess himself of the treasure. Mr. Andrew Lang gives us another example of the spell which literature can throw over minds which seem closed to its charm. "I know," he writes, "that in a remote and even Pictish part of the kingdom, a rural household, humble and under the shadow of a sorrow inevitably approaching, has found in 'David Copperfield' oblivion of winter, of sorrows, and of sickness."

A book, then, being for most people either a stimulus or an anodyne, the well-chosen village library—as, indeed, any general library—will be freely supplied with poets and novelists. Of the poets it is enough to say that as many should be represented as space and money permit. Readers of poetry are to be found in all classes, and it is a mistake to suppose that those who have not been to a public school and university cannot develop an affection for the greatest English verse. We should say, for example, that Crabbe, Burns, Cowper, Scott, and Byron are well within the range and fancy of many village readers. It is likely that there are more readers of poetry among the Populace than in the ranks of the Barbarians. Venables used to tell of a certain notorious peer of the last century whom he met at Lansdowne House, and once asked whether he ever saw "Punch." "Why, no," was the reply, "to tell the truth, I'm—not much of a book-worm!" But though it would be a serious omission if even one true lover of poetry were deprived of the sustenance he needs, the chooser of a village library will have to see that fiction is largely represented, even if he must curtail the poetry. And fiction should be interpreted in the widest sense of the word, not excluding Bunyan on the one hand, or on the other those children's books, lists of which have recently been contributed to our pages by Mrs. Frederic Harrison and Lady Rendel. Such books are of especial value in a village library. The father of Robert Burns, a typical peasant, struggled, his son tells us, to keep him "and his other children under his own eye till they could discern between good and evil. He understood men, their manners, and their ways," and he taught what he knew to his children. But the boy received the best part of his education from an old woman who lived in the family, "remarkable," Burns says, "for her ignorance, credulity, and superstition." "She had the largest collection in the county of tales and songs concerning devils, ghosts, fairies, brownies, witches, warlocks, spunkies, kelpies, elf-candles, dead-lights, wraiths, apparitions, cantrips, giants, enchanted towers, dragons, and other trumpery. This cultivated the latent seeds of poetry." And Northcote, the painter, made a similar confession to Hazlitt. "'Jack the Giant-Killer' is the first book I ever read, and I cannot describe the pleasure it gives me even now. I cannot look into it without my eyes filling with tears. I do not know what it is, whether good or bad, but it is to me, from early impressions, the most heroic of performances. I remember once not having money to buy it, and I transcribed it all out with my own hand. Had I been bred a scholar," he adds, "I daresay Homer would have been my Jack the Giant-Killer." "Think," says Lamb to Coleridge, "what you would have been now if instead of being fed with tales and old wives' fables in childhood, you had been crammed with geography and natural history." Among the books which help mankind to enjoy life or to endure it "the classics of the nursery" clearly must be allowed a place. To include all the representative names in European fiction within the village library is, fortunately, an easy task. By spending a five-pound note on Messrs. Dent's "Everyman's Library," Mr. Frowde's "World's Classics," Messrs. Routledge's "New Universal Library," or Messrs. Cassell's "The People's Library," it is possible to have a hundred volumes neatly bound and clearly printed. To one book in Mr. Frowde's list we would especially direct attention. An excellent selection of Tolstoy's short stories has been translated by Mr. Aylmer Maude. By general consent some of these short stories are to be counted as the greatest work of the greatest of living writers, and they have the direct appeal and power of exciting deep emotion that reach simple minds.

Perhaps next after fiction books of travel have the greatest power of lifting people out of themselves, and are therefore of value to the village library. These have the additional merit of being the work of men who have a first-hand knowledge of what they write about. "The reason why so few good books are written," says Bagehot, "is that few people that can write know anything. In general an author has always lived in a room, has read books, has cultivated science, is acquainted with the style and sentiments of the best authors, but is out of the way of employing his own ears and eyes. He has nothing to hear and nothing to see. His life is a vacuum. . . . He sits beside a library fire, with nice white paper, a good pen, a capital style, every means of saying everything, and nothing to say." Books of travel introduce us to men who have used their ears and eyes in countries where not all of us can hope to use our own and enable us at least to travel "by deputy."

The villager should also find in his library books on history—say, Macaulay, Froude, Green, or such series as "The Story of the Nations" or "The Romance of History"—short and picturesque biography, such as Macaulay's historical essays supply, and studies of natural and country life of the type of J. G. Wood's many volumes. The great value of pictures should also be borne in mind. It is a great misfortune that we have not more and rather better work of the class of Knight's "Illustrated History of England." A good simple "History of Great Britain," illustrated as M. Boutet de Monvel, or "Job" have illustrated imposing scenes and characters in French history, would be a great gift to the British people.

On the general question of the books to be included and those refused admission, we might adopt the words of the Preface to the Book of Common Prayer prefixed at the Revision of 1662, viz., "to keep the mean between the two extremes of too much stiffness in refusing, and of too much ease in admitting" with an inclination to the latter. Some selection is necessary, since the library must be to the villager not only a store-house of books, but also a guide to his use of them.

Letters to the Editor.

"THE RECURRENCE OF DISEASE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The article under the above heading, which appears in the current issue of THE NATION, invites comment.

Its suggestiveness lies as much in what is omitted as in what is indicated. Were it not that action is the law of life, and men are compelled, as it were, to grapple, despite themselves, with life and its problems, they might almost despair of making any all round solid advance in this matter of disease.

It has long been the fashion—the ignorant fashion, one might almost say—for medical writers to ignore or to scoff at the French thinker, Carnot's, alleged law of vicarious or substitutionary mortality. But that theory contains a great truth. Our most famous vital statistician, Dr. Wm. Farr, plainly recognised, if he did not formally acknowledge it, sans phrase. He insisted in the luminous Registrar-General's Reports that healthy conditions of existence, all round, are indispensable to save human life. Otherwise, the stamping out of one disease (he said) merely left the way open for another disease to replace it. "Keep your eye," he said, "on the total death-rate." A low total death-rate was his ideal, and not the mere stamping out of one particular disease, such, for instance, as is (erroneously) alleged in Germany, where the absence of small-pox—through persistent vaccination (?)—leaves the country with a constant higher total annual death-rate than that of England, even with the latter's large neglect of vaccination.

A remarkable confirmation of the soundness of Carnot's theory was unwittingly supplied in 1813 by Dr. Robert Watt, of Glasgow. He carefully tabulated, year by year, for thirty years, the child mortality of that important city. To his amazement he discovered that although vaccination had been as general there as in any other part of the United Kingdom, yet he found it had had no effect whatever in reducing the children's total death-rate. He says he could hardly believe the testimony of his own senses, so unexpected were the results of his careful investigations. Whatever had been won from small-pox, by means of vaccination, had been lost in other ways!

Your contributor, in writing that "small-pox has almost disappeared under the combined effects of sanitation and vaccination," seems to be unaware of Leicester's thirty years, or more, conclusive experience. That city finds it can do better without vaccination. Nor can he be aware that in the eighties—when we in London set up the small-pox hospital ships on the Thames and thus cut down London's small-pox permanently—Germany, owing to the recrudescence of small-pox, had to adopt in essence the Leicester method.

As to diphtheria, that disease has not lost its terrors through anti-toxin. Your contributor has overlooked the fact that, year by year, the Registrar-General reports an increase in the deaths from it. And this when it is claimed that, through anti-toxin, the case-mortality has fallen! How can these contrarieties be reconciled? It is said that in compiling these statistics the worst cases are not counted—anti-toxin being useless with them. Then the presence of the Kleb-Loeffler bacillus is accepted as proof that the disease is diphtheria. And yet this bacillus may be found, at times, in common sore throats, and even in healthy mouths! All these cases are termed diphtheria. Thus it can be easily seen how fallacious must be the tabulations so framed.

Again, if hydrophobia be, as your contributor asserts, "merely a dread memory of the past," it is such in despite and not in consequence of Pasteur's anti-rabic virus—an inoculation process, as was said at the time by some competent observers, which was more likely to impart the disease than to protect from it. And the published necrology of some few hundreds of Pasteur's patients gave deadly point to the criticism. So also in the case of Koch's anti-consumption virus, which was a ghastly failure.

In this particular aspect of disease intelligent laymen are apt to wonder at the apparent negation by ardent advocates of viruses, vaccines, serums, and lymphs—all of which are poisonous animal substances—of all thought as to the possible secondary and long-time consequences of their use.

With one fixed idea they inject these terribly potential substances directly into the blood of human and sub-human creatures. Everything is ignored but the one result sought. But as Herbert Spencer wisely pointed out in this connection how can it be supposed that the human system can thus be protected against one invading agent, and yet be left otherwise totally unaffected? To ask such a question is to answer it.

The evils caused by infecting the blood with such diseased matter may, in some cases, not be visible for years; it may lie dormant and, when the mischief becomes visible, mostly likely all connection between cause and effect is lost. Cattle are tested by means of tuberculin inoculations. If no reaction takes place, the planting of a dose of disease seed in the animal is treated as a mere nothing. But why should not such seed yield a harvest in due season just as any other?

In passing it may be observed that just as the advocates of these various inoculations base themselves on Jennerism, so their opponents oppose them on the grounds that Jenner's prescription has degenerated into something little better than a sordid monopolism. Certainly the Gloucester surgeon could not now obtain £30,000, or any other sum, from the Legislature. His nostrum, having been established, endowed, and vested interests created thereby, will die hard, as do all such things.

Your contributor remarks—either satirically or playfully—that "science is always discovering new maladies which baffle its exultant energies." This is little else than a variant of the adage, "The more doctors the more diseases." It invents new names—as witness appendicitis, not known twenty years ago, as your contributor states. It is merely perityphlitis renamed. The votaries of medicine naturally press onward to new discoveries, if not to new victories over nature, always seeking, of course, to learn her secrets, and to pluck out the heart of her mystery. And this for motives mixed, both high and low; for fame, for fortune, and for desire to benefit mankind.

But how vastly important it is that such energies and abilities should be directed on to right lines! How heavy the price to pay to unlearn. And what sadness was in the heart of that famous French researcher—a typical of his class—who, in dying, exclaimed that while his mouth was full of promises his hands were empty of results. Laymen, who, if not scientific experts, may yet be capable jurymen among such, may well ask themselves whether the correspondences in constitution, structure, and function are such between men and the lower animals as to make deductions drawn from experiments upon the latter trustworthy as to the former.

Rather pessimistically writes your contributor, "Medicine, as distinct from surgical effort, is still largely in the condition of alchemy, stretching blind hands in the darkness towards a secret not yet revealed." And yet what confident claims are made as to the alleged gains from vivisection and vaccination, claims which are as confidently denied by equal authorities! It is the age of the squirt vice the lancet—"that minute instrument of mighty mischief"—and the opprobrium of medicine.

Amid all the heat and dust of controversy one broad fact stands saliently out. It was neither by the lancet nor the syringe that our ancient destroyers, such as the black death, the sweating sickness, the plague, leprosy, scurvy, and typhus, were banished. Improved dieting, housing, draining, water supply, and ventilation, perform these hygienic miracles. Strange that for many centuries our ecclesiastics had the virtual monopoly of the Mosaic ritual of health which they ignored, leaving nineteenth century secularites to rediscover and apply it in modern ways.

In this land there has been for several decades a bitter conflict between two contending parties on this matter. And neither has had its case fully placed before the nation. On the one hand there is a pseudo-science backed by the educated ignorance of conventional opinion, and supported by a legislature, pliant, and at the mercy of plausible scientific sophists, who act as spokesmen for a professional monopoly. On the other are the people, unorganised, and unable adequately to present their case. But these latter have seen much, know a good deal, and have strong opinions on the subject.—Yours, &c.,

J. H.

January 6th, 1908.

"THE DECLINE OF THE OXFORD MOVEMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Would you be kind enough to make room for yet another letter on the Oxford Movement discussion? It seems that no one has read what Mr. Chesterton has to say in this controversy carefully enough to understand what he means. This is probably because everyone speaks condescendingly of Mr. Chesterton as a brilliant and amusing literary critic, who has no business to meddle with so exclusive a thing as theology, on which the expert alone has a right to an opinion. Mr. Chesterton is proud to represent the ordinary man, on whom democracy must be built, and he will not be annoyed if it is said that his exclusion from a theological discussion means the exclusion of the great mass of humanity. The doubts and needs of the ordinary man are seldom the same as those of the theological expert, and it is no answer to him or to Mr. Chesterton to ask peevishly if he has heard of Newman, or to call down destruction on him for having views differing from those of Dr. Lightfoot and the Editor of this review.

To the man in the street some "cast-iron Creed" seems always necessary to progress of any kind. It does not satisfy him in the least to be told that Christianity is simply the love or veneration of a Personality, and that no Creed is wanted. "A Reader" says that he is supported by many great men in holding that as long as a man loves or venerates the Personality he need have no fixed opinions or beliefs about anything connected with Christianity. But surely the love or veneration of a Personality involves a Creed, even a "cast-iron" one. To take an extreme instance. Suppose A is a Conservative, a Protectionist, an anti-Socialist and a Roman Catholic, and that B is a Radical, a Free-Trader, a Socialist, and a Rationalist; and yet that in spite of this A loves or looks up to B—that is, to B's personality. It is surely obvious that if A only thinks the matter out, he will discover that his attitude to B is actually due to something with which he (A) dogmatically agrees. He will perceive that attitude to be due to the dogmatic fact that B has, let us say, energy and a sense of humour. He will feel that energy and a sense of humour are splendid things, and that if a man does not possess them he falls short of an ideal man. So that this dogma is immediately formed in the mind of A: "Energy and a sense of humour are splendid and eternal things."

It may be urged that there is a difference between the attraction of a man for a man—and the attraction of Christ for a man. But this difference proves, if anything, the truth of what has been said. A man sometimes loves an earthly man (whom he has seen in the flesh) for something which cannot be defined, but if he loves Christ (whom he has not seen in the flesh) the love must be due to certain actual facts about Christ's personality; that he was tender, or that he was merciful, or that he loved men. Will "A Reader" say if an ordinary man who loves or venerates the Personality would still do so if instead of being tender Christ was hard, if instead of being merciful he was unmerciful, or if instead of loving men he hated them? Then, if these opposites alienate that man's love or veneration it is a dogma in the mind and heart of that man that tenderness, mercy, and love are splendid and eternal things. Does "A Reader" deny this?

Besides this, "A Reader" fails to see what Mr. Chesterton meant in his last letter to this review. He (Mr. Chesterton) says that progress is impossible without dogma and a "cast-iron" Creed. "A Reader" says firmly and dogmatically that he believes progress to be impossible unless dogma is abolished. Is it not obvious that in saying this "A Reader" has given voice to a Creed and a dogma? Mr. Chesterton himself said that when Mr. Bernard Shaw wrote in the "Revolutionist's Handbook" "the Golden Rule is that there is no Golden Rule," he was himself laying down a Golden Rule. "A Reader's" Creed is: "I believe that a Creed makes progress impossible." The Creed of the Church differs from this only in containing a few more clauses. The fact that your correspondent's Creed contradicts that of the Church does not make it any the less a Creed.—Yours, &c.,

A MAN IN THE STREET.

THE BLACK DEATH IN SPAIN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the interesting article entitled "A Portuguese Monastery," in your issue of January 4th, the writer says: "One thinks of the Black Death, which in 1355 swept through the dormitories of the Cistercians until only eight remained alive." In the British Isles the awful pestilence known as the Black Death began in 1348, raged in 1349, but except in Scotland had come to an end by 1350. I did not know that its ravages continued in the Peninsular so late as 1355. But I write away from all works of reference, and I only query the date given by the writer of your article because of my impression that, in the main, the plague had subsided in south-west Europe before it reached the shores of England.—Yours, &c.,

ROBT. A. HUDSON.

Beach House, Felixstowe,
January 8th, 1908.

"PREMATURE BURIAL."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a letter signed "J. H." on the above subject.

Judging by the mass of correspondence that has reached me since my article, "Premature Burial and the only True Signs of Death," appeared in "The Nineteenth Century" (October, 1907), I am led to believe there must be an enormous number of persons deeply and seriously interested in the question, and impotently clamouring for the adoption of a safeguard against this horrible form of torture.

Indeed that interest in the matter is not confined to our own country may be concluded from information I have just received that the "Nineteenth Century" article has recently been reprinted in the "New York Sun," and that a member of the Massachusetts Legislature is about to reprint it in a pamphlet.

It truly is amazing that the bulk of the general public should remain so grotesquely apathetic in the face of the overwhelming pile of irrefutable evidence we have in almost every language that a proportion by no means inconsiderable of the persons yearly interred are in all probability shut up in their coffins before life is extinct. It took just a century to get Germany to realise that the peril did actually exist, but no sooner did that country become alive to the truth than it at once set to work to establish the excellent safeguards that are still enforced there.

Germany bears the reputation for being a wide-awake country. Certainly the nation is not addicted to hysteria. Consequently we may rest assured that the sums spent in Germany to establish the system of waiting mortuaries was not disbursed without good cause.

This is no party question. It is a matter that members of the various political factions assuredly ought to unite in bringing prominently before the House with as little delay as possible.—Yours, &c.,

BASIL TOZER.

Boodle's Club, St. James's, S.W.,
January 8th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Permit me to say a few words on the subject of Mr. J. R. Williamson's letter. Dr. S. Hooper said, "The subject of trance was of the most vital interest, and they would all acknowledge that more interest was now taken in the psychic aspect of man as well as the material side. They would never understand man in his whole bearings, much less in illness or apparent death, until they understood the tremendous influence exercised by the psychological part of man as well as by the materialistic part. It was the psychological factor which played such an important part in the case of trance. He had himself seen a patient apparently dead after an attack of hysteria. There was to all appearances no life left whatever, and in such a case an ignorant person might go and explain to the doctor that the patient was dead, and if it was very far off the doctor would be within his present rights in giving a certificate of death on the ipse dixit of that friend or neighbour. That was one of the scandals that should be altered in the matter of death certification."—Yours, &c.,

LIVE AND LET LIVE.

December 23rd, 1907.

"THE VIRGIN BIRTH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. W. Windsor objects to my ascribing agreement by the author of the Fourth Gospel with the words ascribed by him to Philip concerning "Jesus of Nazareth the son of Joseph." How much a reported speech implies the agreement of the reporter depends altogether on the nature of the literary work in which it occurs. No one would ascribe to Shakespeare the sentiments of his characters; everyone would assume Plato's unity with the speeches of Socrates in the Republic. Between these there is every variety. No one thinks that we have much reliable verbatim reporting in the Fourth Gospel. Its date and its style as a work of art render that unlikely. Indeed, in the Nicodemus conversation no one can tell where the words of Jesus end and those of the Evangelist begin. Considering that no contradiction is offered by the author to the paternity of Joseph, I thought his weight went with Philip's phrase. The point is arguable and cannot be finally cleared up, but I do not think it unfair or inaccurate.

Mr. Windsor also objects to my statement that Jesus is, throughout the Apostolic teaching outside the Birth stories, regarded as "of the seed of David according to the flesh." He says this phrase only occurs twice. But the entirely equivalent expression "Son of David" occurs many times, and abundantly justifies my description. This is the kind of argument I should call unfair.—Yours, &c.,

YOUR REVIEWER.

January 5th, 1908.

THE REAL IRISH QUESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I think I can explain "E.D.'s" failure to understand the Irish question. "E.D.," like a great many other people, seems never to have attempted to see the Irish question as it really is in itself, apart from the various other questions that call for solution in Ireland as in France, Germany, the United States, England, and, indeed, in every free country. The confusion of the Irish question with those other questions has been the curse of Irish politics for something like a century. The only moments in the history of the nineteenth century on which an Irish Nationalist of the present day can look back with any gladness are the rare occasions—such as the Emmet insurrection, the Young Ireland movement, and the Fenian movement—on which Irishmen did not allow this confusion to take place, but saw the Irish question in all its simplicity as a question of foreign versus native rule.

There is no such thing as the English question. If you were annexed by France, however, and if the seat of Government of the new "United Kingdom" were placed in Paris, and, say, a hundred thousand French troops drafted in among you to look after the preservation of "law and order," an "English question" would be created immediately. The English question would be: how to get rid of those hundred thousand French troops and the Government whose mainstay they were, and to make England a free and independent nation again.

It has always been the policy of British statesmen, however, to refuse to admit that the Irish question was as simple a matter as this. And so, one after another, they caught hold of some purely social question, such as Catholic emancipation, or land purchase, or University education, and declaring loudly and repeatedly that this was the real Irish question at last, taught the Irish people to look for its solution to the London Parliament. In this way, they played off Irish Catholic against Irish Protestant, Irish landlord against Irish tenant—appealed to the sectarian and class selfishness of each in turn—until we had the bewildering spectacle of Irish Catholics looking to England for protection against the Irish Protestants, while at the same moment Irish Protestants were leaning on England with confidence as their bulwark against the wicked designs of the Irish Catholics; and the landlords and tenants played a similar foolish game. In the result, every class of Irishmen—Protestant, Catholic, tenant and landlord—has suffered; England alone has consistently been the gainer. That is why the Sinn Féin policy is making such headway in Ireland to-day. Sinn Féiners see that it is folly for the Irish people to ask England to settle their social problems for them—just as mad folly as it would be for two sheep that had a difference of opinion to call in a wolf as arbitrator.

The great mistake that Irishmen made in the nineteenth century was that, time and again, they listened to British promises and allowed the national question to be put in the background, in order that some urgent social question might first be dealt with. If they had refused to enter into any negotiations with England until the national question had been honourably settled, it is pretty certain that Ireland would have been an independent nation a good many years ago, and that her various social questions would have been solved three times as rapidly and three hundred times as satisfactorily as they have been. If Liberals really want to know the solution of the Irish question, I or any other Nationalist will tell them. Let them not trouble to introduce Mr. Birrell's University Bill during the coming Session of Parliament, but let them occupy their time instead by having copies of the Renunciation Act of 1783 printed and laid on the table of the House of Commons, and by re-affirming that this Act is the law of the land—which it undoubtedly still is, despite the subsequent passing of the illegal Act of Union. This is the simplest solution of the simplest question in the world.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT LYND.

January 4th, 1908.

"THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I point out to your correspondent Lady Rendel, whose delightful letter on children's books appears in your current number, that "Leila" which she speaks of as divided into two parts, "Leila At Home" and "Leila, or The Island," really consists of three parts, viz., "Leila, or

The Island," "Leila In England," and "Leila At Home." The book was written by Miss Anne Frazer-Tytler, a friend of Sir Walter Scott's, and with the exception of Mr. Howard's eternal preaching (Mr. Howard is the little heroine's father) is extremely lively and would, I am sure, amuse intelligent children now.

Your correspondent mentions "Ministering Children" a little doubtfully, but apart from the conventional religious teaching which comes in rather too often, this book has an idyllic beauty of its own which is simply charming. It is well known, I believe, that few English books have had a larger circulation, and it is said to have brought a small fortune to its publishers.—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD FRANKLIN JUPP.

22, Grange Road, West Hartlepool.

December 23rd, 1907.

P.S.—I see your correspondent also mentions both parts of "Mary and Florence" as suitable for children. The first part, "Mary and Florence, or Grave and Gay," is admirable reading for little people, but the sequel, "Mary and Florence at Sixteen," they would hardly appreciate, as it deals with the adventures of an English family in France, and their hairbreadth escape from that country during the hundred days between Napoleon's return from Elba and Waterloo. The narrative is most spirited and it might well be republished, as it is clearly founded on a real experience.

A CROWD'S GRIEVANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—On Friday of last week the London Pavilion Music Hall was the scene of one of those ebullitions of popular feeling with the occurrence of which we have of late grown unpleasantly familiar. The occasion was the wrestling match between two imported champions, Zbysco and Kara Suliman, and the disturbance took the form of continuous interruption during the "turn," culminating in a free fight and the throwing of electric light bulbs after the curtain had been lowered. Ostensibly the cause of the trouble was the action of the management in limiting the contest to twenty minutes' duration. As soon as this intention was announced from the stage the audience broke forth into booing, shouts of "Programme" and "To a finish!" and, as has been said, continued to manifest their displeasure throughout the dreary performance. Dreary it certainly was. The men, monstrosities of muscular development, were on the floor for the greater part of the time. The only incidents that relieved the monotony of the bouts were the violent blows with his hands which Suliman practised on his opponent's head, Zbysco's efforts to shake the wind out of his adversary's body by energetic dumping of himself upon the other's back, and the frequent interference of the referees. The rest resolved itself into an interlacing of brawny limbs, a feast of reddened carcases, a carnival of sweat. And by the end of the time neither man had secured a fall. When they separated, Suliman was allowed to make his exit, bowing stiffly and painfully, amidst a noise that might have been construed into applause, but Zbysco was virtually hissed off the stage. The managers, who came forward with explanatory speeches, were refused a hearing, and the riot began.

The desirability of serious wrestling as part of a music-hall programme is at all times questionable. The building, the atmosphere, and, I am beginning to believe, the audience that frequents the halls, are alike out of harmony with any sport that belongs to the open and untainted air. I have witnessed the games at Grasmere where big dalesmen wrestle with each other, with fellow dalesmen for their audience, a range of purple hills for their background, and their roof that of the world itself. Of wrestling in such a setting one may, whatever its degree of science, carry away an impression of wholesomeness, of honest strength, honestly matched—in a word, of sport without defilement. But transfer the mise-en-scène to a modern music-hall, substitute the glare of footlights for the sunshine, a painted background, tawdry in its falseness, for God's hills, the fog of tobacco smoke for the fairy mists, the reeking exhalations of beer and spirits for the scents of nature, and it becomes very much more difficult to regard even the finest wrestling as a desirable spectacle. When such wrestling as that exhibited at the London Pavilion is given before an audience of the kind that assembled to witness it, the utter undesirability becomes more marked. I would say, however, that it is unnecessary to call in question the "square" character of the fight as between the combatants. Poor and pitiable as the spectacle was, pronounced as became the tendency of both men to honour the "Græco-Roman" rules in the breach rather than in the observance, no looker-on could doubt that the men were in deadly earnest. This sincerity, brutal and brutalising as its effect, was the one redeeming feature of the part played by the wrestlers. Yet it is impossible to recall a single instance of chivalry or even of humour wherewith the audience may be credited. Throughout Zbysco had to stand up to an unreasonable hostile sentiment towards himself that could hardly have been less disconcerting than the ferocious wiliness of his opponent. When both men lay on the ground and Suliman was uppermost, the referee who interposed to prevent an illegality in the latter's grip was greeted with shouts of "Leave him alone!" When, in one of the few moments of excitement, Suliman had almost wrenched his opponent's shoulders round, and the latter only twisted himself free by a mighty effort, there were loud groans of disappointment. Suliman had no lack of encouragement; but Zbysco could only succeed in raising a laugh by wiping the perspiration from his adversary's back on to his adversary's breeches, before he was finally hissed off the stage. So much for the audience's appreciation of the art of wrestling and their sense of fair play.

One may say that this partizanship is characteristic of all crowds, and that the unruliness of the Pavilion audience or of a large section of that audience, is liable to occur amongst every audience of the same class that thinks it is not getting its money's worth. But when one considers the character of the entertainment in conjunction with that of the disturbance, a deeper, more sombre significance seems to lie behind the incident. The wrestling, stripped of the thin veil of science that covered it, was an exposition of human fierceness. The behaviour of the audience was hardly less so. It is no use blinking the latter fact. The outburst was not mere horse-play, the result of high spirits, heightened by drink, the half-savage, half-whimsical protest, neither wholly earnest, nor wholly frivolous, that often follows a disappointing entertainment. It was a deep-down rage, and, worse still, the rage of an animal robbed of its prey; it was wholly earnest and wholly savage—the display not of animal spirits but of animalism. There is all the difference in the world between this sort of feeling and the feeling that takes students to Brown-dog demonstrations and Suffragette meetings, and between this type of savagery and the silly kind of hysteria that created a short-lived glory for the Hero of Camden Town. Those regrettable episodes of recent history suggested the existence of some unpleasant qualities in the London character; but the Pavilion scene laid some worse ones bare. For while the ostensible grievance of the audience was against the time-limit, their behaviour showed plainly enough that the real grievance was against the tacit rules of humanity. They came to see the men wrestle, but they hoped to see one or the other badly hurt.

It is sacrilege to speak of sport in connection with a temper of this kind, and the whole episode is one that one would willingly forget but for a consideration which renders it expedient to bear it in mind. That consideration is the presence in our midst of a class that can afford two or three shillings for a music-hall show, that has been taught everything except the need of self-control in a community, that has been educated out of everything primitive except the blood lust. What, in the event of lacking things more necessary to its existence than music-hall wrestling, in the failure, let us say, of food supplies, in the midst of surroundings more conducive to the rousing of elemental passion than any dross and tinsel entertainment can be, in the grim tragedy of war or industrial ruin, would that class mean to us? One can only hope that before that day comes some real, not superficial, education will have penetrated this unknown stratum of London civilisation. Meanwhile the proprietors of music-halls can help towards that end by following the example of the Pavilion management, which has now been persuaded or frightened—it does not matter which—in excluding wrestling matches from its programmes.—Yours, &c.,

January 9th, 1908.

A SPECTATOR.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

It will interest many readers to learn that M. Paul Sabatier is coming over to London next month to deliver the Jowett Lectures. He has chosen Catholic Modernism as his subject. Very few people understand the spirit and temper of Catholicism as well as the eminent author of the life of St. Francis. Although M. Sabatier is not a Catholic, he is in the closest touch with all the heads of Liberal Catholicism in France and Italy, and it will be deeply interesting to hear what he has to say about the aims and principles of a movement which is causing such a stir in the ecclesiastical world.

AMONG the Spring announcements are two promising books on the drama. Messrs. Macmillan have in preparation "Types of Tragic Drama," by Professor C. E. Vaughan, of the University of Leeds. The book attempts to sketch the development of tragic drama from the beginnings of Greek tragedy to the end of the nineteenth century. It is not a continuous history, but an endeavour to fulfil some of the main ends of such a history by a selection of what seem to the author to be the most typical figures. The writers treated are the three Greek tragic dramatists; Seneca, as being the chief model of sixteenth century tragedy, whether classical or romantic; Racine and Alfieri, as types of modern classical tragedy; Shakspeare, Calderon, Goethe, Victor Hugo, Browning, Maeterlinck, and Ibsen.

THE other book, which will be issued by Messrs. Constable, is a very full study of Elizabethan drama, by Professor Schelling, of the University of Pennsylvania, a recognised authority on the subject. Professor Schelling's book begins with a brief account of the origins of the drama in England and of the development of such early forms as the miracle play, morality, and interlude. This is followed by a connected history of the Tudor and early Stuart drama taking into consideration the whole body of plays written during the period, their authorship, relations, and the involved history of the stage. As Professor Schelling's aim has been to write a history rather than to compile dramatic annals, the different authors are subordinated to their work and the time in which they lived. Shakspeare, for example, is represented not as an isolated genius but in his contact with his fellow workers, and as the natural crown and glory of a great age. The titles of some of the sections into which Professor Schelling divides his book will give some idea of its scope. These include the Old Sacred Drama, the Morality and Earlier Secular Plays, the New Romantic Drama, the Chronicle Histories, and the Domestic Drama, both tragic and comic, together with the Comedy of Manners which grew out of it.

PROFESSOR HARNACK has followed up his monographs on "Luke, the Physician" and the "Sayings of Jesus" by a corresponding study of the "Acts of the Apostles." This new volume is characterised by the same minute and penetrating scholarship as its predecessors. It is well worth study as a masterpiece in the art of critical enquiry. Harnack arrives at the traditional conclusion that the "Acts" are the work of St. Luke. He is of opinion that one of the reasons why modern criticism has been so reluctant to admit the Lukan authorship of the "Acts" is to be found in the miraculous elements contained in the book. He does not admit the historical character of the miraculous narratives but he says that this is not a sufficient reason for rejecting the authorship by St. Luke.

THE third volume of Professor Oman's elaborate "History of the Peninsular War" may be expected from the Oxford University Press early in the season. Napier's great history, though completed as long ago as 1840, remained the standard book on the subject until Professor Oman's first volume appeared in 1902. Apart from the personal and political bias that coloured Napier's narrative, the amount of new material which is now accessible—particularly in the form of the diaries and memoirs of officers, such as Sir Henry Smith, Blakeney, Shaw, Tompkinson, Foy, Fantin des Odouards, St. Chamans, Thiébault, and others—makes a fresh study of the period highly desirable. Professor Oman has also been helped in his researches into the history of the momentous seven years by Sir Charles Vaughan's papers now at All Soul's College, and by the papers at the Madrid Deposito de la Guerra.

ANOTHER historical work which will appear shortly is the second volume of Mr. J. B. Atlay's "Victorian Chancellors," to be issued by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. It begins with Lord St. Leonards and brings the history down to the end of the reign. The book is likely to be of value from the fact that several of the eminent lawyers dealt with—such as Lord St. Leonards, Lord Cranworth, Lord Chelmsford, and Lord Cairns—have not up to the present formed the subject of an adequate biography. In the writing of some of the memoirs Mr. Atlay has been able to draw upon unpublished materials.

MR. MURRAY will publish next week "A Family Chronicle, From Notes and Letters collected by Barbarina, Lady Grey." The book, which is edited by Mrs. John Lyster, is a history of three generations of English women: Lady Dacre, well known in social, literary, and artistic circles during the first half of the last century, her daughter, Mrs. Sullivan, and her granddaughter, Lady Grey. It contains many reminiscences and unpublished letters from Fanny Kemble, Bulwer Lytton, Lord Lynedoch, "Bobus" Smith, and others of note in society and letters during the last century.

